Does any man who knows anything about manufacturing—and I live in a manufacturing district, and claim to know something about it—does any one suppose that our manufacturers will introduce that smoky coal instead of the anthracite which is a free article and which is kept up in its price by a trust? It is cheaper at its present price than foreign coal with the duty taken off twice, that is, with a reduction in price the same as the duty. They do not want that foreign article. Coke is frequently used elsewhere, but you can go to the gas companies in my city and you will find that they have difficulty in selling their coke at any price, and it will not be used by a single manufacturer. The talk about inundating us with coal is like the talk about iron ore coming to this country. Fancy the iron ore and the coal going out West. Fancy the lean ore coming in from abroad and destroying the market for the Bessemer ore of the Upper Peninsula of Michigan, the finest hematite ore in the world, the red hematite. Fancy this coal coming in! It is the most absurd statement in the world. There is no basis for it.

How any man could have the face to put that thing before the public, and then talk about the wages, the American rate of wages, paid to the miserable miners in Pennsylvania.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. May I make a statement to my friend? The Republicans tell us that the coal that will come into this country will probably come from Canada. I want to say that according to the last statistics we have for the year 1892 there were 179,000,000 short tons of coal dug in the United States, and 3,000,000 tons in Canada. So that the coal dug in Canada amounted to one-sixteenth part of that dug in the United States.

Mr. ENGLISH. That is precisely like the cry of some years ago when they wanted a duty put on the anthracite that we use here, the smokeless coal, because, they said, there was such an enormous deposit of anthracite in Canada that if there were not a duty put upon it, it would drive our miners out of the field. Well, the character of that anthracite coal was well described by a savant who was asked to give his opinion upon it. They sent him a specimen, and he wrote back, "My opinion, after a careful examination of this coal, is that the man who sits upon it in the day of judgment will be the last to be burned." [Great laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Who wrote that opinion?

Mr. ENGLISH. I think it was Prof. Silliman; but he was not a silly man by any means.

Mr. HAINES. Was he a Democrat.

Mr. ENGLISH. No; I do not think he was a Democrat.

Now, before I close, I wish to say something about the clamor which has been raised in the country in order to induce the workingman to hound us into violating our pledges to the people of the country, pledges which we made in two hotly contested elections. There has been an organized attempt, I say an organized attempt, among leading manufacturers of this country to induce the mass of the working people to believe that if this bill were passed their wages would inevitably be cut down; and some of them have begun now, while the new tariff is in an inchoate condition. They have three objects in this. One is to intimidate us from passing the bill, which is an idle piece of folly; and another is revenge. For years past the laborers of this country, by combination, have organized toil, so that it has forced from ruthless employers fair rates of wages. They had the sense to combine and the manliness to maintain their combination; and they obtained an increase in their creature comforts.

The manufacturers have determined for some time to cut wages down. The attempt that was made by the potters of Trenton shows how ready they are to spring into it, without or with a pretext; and here we have a pretext. The other is avarice. Now, look to a man who employs a thousand men, and we have manufacturers, I am glad to say, in the city of Newark who employ as many, and I think very few of them engage in the combination and conspiracy; but there are manufacturers who employ a thousand and even two thousand men. But, take the case of one with a thousand, and allowing that they give the magnificent sum of $15 a week as the average, which is a heavy sum for an average, you take 10 per cent off that, and the manufacturer pockets in one week $1,500. In fifty working weeks, $75,000.

There is something for his coffers, and his greedy fingers go out for it. I tell you that this attempt to rouse the workingmen presupposes that they are dupes and fools; but they are neither dupes nor fools. Most of the workingmen of this country have intelligence, many of them have education, and all of them that grand quality which men of genius seldom have—common sense. [Applause.] They are looking into this matter closer than ever. I have been talking with many of these workingmen during the recess, and I know how well they are forming their opinions upon this attempt to dupe them. These men who are engaged in it, or who are back of all these attempts at high protective tariff are doing so for their benefit and not for the benefit of the workingman. These men who are cutting down the wages now are men who are looking to the future. This very saw company, which was spoken of in that letter read here, that is one of the two great trusts through which they control almost every saw manufactured in the country. It is running the Richardson saw works.

There is not a hardware store in this country that does not keep the Richardson saw, because it is the highest-priced saw and is the cheapest for its price, and it is the best article made or ever made. It goes to Canada, where a duty of 35 per cent has to be paid on it, just the same as the British manufacturer pays there, and the Richardson saw commands the market. No Sheffield saw can compare to it. It goes to the West Indies and South America and undersells or rather drives out all competitors, although it is frequently a higher-priced saw than the English article. Disston, another of these saw-makers, sends saws to Australia and drives the British manufacturers out there; and, furthermore, the Richardsons, when the Richardson Brothers were running that mill, sent case after case of saws to Sheffield, the center of the saw manufacture in England, and sold them there.

Now, that company, needing no protection, under the pretext that their duty is a little reduced in this bill, have cut down the wages of their men 10 per cent. Mr. Chairman, I have a certain amount of respect for the burglar and for the highway robber, but I have none for the sneak-thief who enters your hall and carries off your overcoat, yet I think him preferable to the company or the men who, under such a pretext, would rob their laborers of their honest earnings. [Applause.] I tell you, sir, that these men are going too far. They are raising the proletariat of this country, and woe be to them if these once spring to their feet. These men are themselves the fathers of the incendiary torch and the dynamite bomb. They are the breeders of anarchists. They would crucify the Christ of the poor, but on the day of his crucifixion the skies will darken and the graves open and the ghosts of dead wrongs stalk forth to plague the wrongers. [Applause.] I have no patience when I look upon these efforts to warp legislation, to intimidate Congress, to plunder the workingmen, and to deceive the country.

I have no patience with it; and although I do not like all the details of this bill, although I think it imperfect in some of its parts, imperfections which I believe will be removed in the Senate and their removal concurred in by this House, yet take it as it is to-day, so far as the schedules are concerned, although some of them strike hardly at the industries in my district, and I think unjustly, still I take it as a choice of evils in preference to the present infamous act, and would support it were there not one bar in the way. I may, after all, much as I admire the bill, withhold my vote from it, not because of the nature of the bill as a tariff measure, but because it contains one thing that I can never sanction or approve. There is a bounty in this bill which is a subsidy. I am a Democrat after the strictest sect of Jefferson. For fifty years I have fought in the Democratic party, and always against subsidies, and I am not disposed to take the legacy of the Republican party in the shape of a bounty.

The gentleman who made the minority report stated that the Supreme Court has validated bounties by its decision. That is a most extraordinary statement. Let me say something about courts. Let me cite two decisions, one of a State court and one of the Federal court of highest jurisdiction. In the State of Maine, some years ago, the Legislature was called upon to pass a bill affording a bounty to a certain industry on condition that it would establish itself in a certain town. The Legislature had some doubts as to their power, so they sought for legal advice. The attorney-general of the State at that time was named Thomas B. Reed [laughter], a name quite familiar to me, although not as that of a lawyer. I presume, however, that he must have been a distinguished advocate, this Mr. Reed, or he would not have been selected for that high position. [Laughter.]

But, singular to say, the Legislature, with reprehensible negligence, overlooked their natural adviser, the attorney-general, and asked the judges of the highest court in the State for their opinion on the subject, and the judges gave it. It was adverse to the power of the Legislature. The court held that to give a bounty to individuals from funds raised for the public use was a perversion of taxation, a doctrine as old as Bourlemaqui and all the old English law writers, and that it was nothing more nor less than robbery under color of law; and one judge, Dickerson, gave the quaint illustration that it was like setting down a few to a banquet in order that the many might possibly have the crumbs that fell from the table. [Laughter.]

If any gentleman wants to look at these opinions he will find them in 58 Maine, pages 597 et supra. Some years later the same question was raised in Kansas. A certain manufacture proposed to establish itself in Topeka, and it was agreed either to give a certain bounty or to subscribe for stock. I am not sure which, but I think the agreement was to give $100,000 on condition that the industry was established there in order to boom or benefit the town. The contract was made. Bonds were issued and the interest for the first year was paid, but the second year a clamor arose and the people elected officers who refused to pay the interest on the ground that the contract was illegal and therefore void.

It went from one court to another, and finally came to the Supreme Court of the United States. Justice Miller gave the opinion of the court, one justice alone, Clifford, dissenting on the ground that the expenditure was possibly good for the public. Judge Miller, delivering the opinion of the court, laid down the doctrine that while it was within the power of a legislative body to raise money for public use, it must be for public use simply—nothing more: that to divert money thus raised to private uses was a perversion of taxation, and "plunder in the guise of legislation." Now, if that is validating bounties, I must confess that I have no knowledge of the force and effect of the English language. It strikes me that it goes very far to invalidate bounties, for the court held that the contract was illegal and therefore void.

You will now see why I hesitate to vote for the bounty. I hope it will yet be stricken out so that I may give to this bill by my vote the support that I have in my mind for schedules, and that I have given this night with my voice.

I know that in taking this ground I stand apart from many of my colleagues in action, possibly, but not from so many in thought, for I have heard a great many words on this subject uttered in conversation in this House, in the cloak room, and on the floor. I know that I do not stand alone. But that is of no consequence to me, for stand alone or with many, I stand as I think right; I do what I think right, and I let consequences take care of themselves. But with or without my vote this bill will pass, and its passage will bring about a revival of business and an increase of the prosperity of the country. [Loud applause.]

[Mr. WAUGH addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to; and, Mr. BROOKSHIRE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MCKAIG reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. MCKAIG (at 10 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

Also, thirty-three protests of 1,311 citizens of Minnesota, against changes in the barley schedule—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, protest of George H. Hale and others, citizens of Pleasant Grove, Olmstead County, Minn., against the barley schedule, being 34 protests, signed by 1,329 citizens of Minnesota—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WADSWORTH: Resolutions of the citizens of Warsaw, N. Y., irrespective of party, protesting against the passage of the Wilson tariff bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, remonstrance of importers and merchants of the city of New York, and asking that a specific duty be placed upon sardines, in lieu of the ad valorem duty proposed in the Wilson tariff bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WASHINGTON: Papers to accompany House bill 3919—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WEADOCK: Petition of D. M. Pierce and others, to retain iron ore on dutiable list—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WRIGHT of Massachusetts: Remonstrance of Charles Parsons and 79 other citizens of Conway, Mass., against the proposed reduction of duty on foreign wrappers for cigars—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, remonstrance of Philip Hyde and 46 other employés of the Holyoke Paper Company, of Holyoke, Mass., against the passage of the so-called Wilson tariff bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 13, 1894.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of yesterdays's proceedings was read and approved.

FOREIGN COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement showing the principal imports and exports in the foreign commerce of the United States for a series of years; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

HAWAII.

A message from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the message just received from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Congress:

I transmit herewith copies of all dispatches from our minister at Hawaii relating in any way to political affairs in that country, except such as have been heretofore laid before the Congress.

I also transmit a copy of the last instructions sent to our minister, dated January 12, 1894, being the only instructions to him not already sent to the Congress.

In transmitting certain correspondence with my message dated December 18, 1893, I withheld a dispatch from our present minister, numbered 3 and dated November 16, 1893, and also a dispatch from our former minister, numbered 70 and dated October 8, 1892. Inasmuch as the contents of the dispatch of November 16, 1893, are referred to in the dispatches of a more recent date now sent to Congress, and inasmuch as there seems no longer to be sufficient reason for withholding said dispatch, a copy of the same is herewith submitted. The dispatch numbered 70 and dated October 8, 1892, above referred to, is still withheld for the reason that such a course still appears to be justifiable and proper.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
January 13, 1894.

The SPEAKER. This message, with the accompanying documents, will be ordered to be printed, and will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

MAJ. GEN. OLIVER OTIS HOWARD.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 108) authorizing Maj. Gen. Oliver Otis Howard, United States Army, to accept from the President of the French Republic a diploma conferring the decoration of Commander of the National Order of the Legion of Honor.

The joint resolutions was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That Maj. Gen. Oliver Otis Howard, of the United States Army, is hereby authorized to accept from the President of the French Republic a diploma conferring upon him the decoration of Commander of the National Order of the Legion of Honor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If there is to be any discussion on it I must object.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. There will be none.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to consider the joint resolution; which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

RECIPROCITY.

Mr. TAWNEY. I rise to a question of privilege. On the 15th of December last I submitted a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for information concerning the operation of the reciprocity clause of the tariff act of 1890. Upon a suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] that resolution was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, he promising that it should be promptly considered and reported back. It has not yet been acted upon by the committee, or at any rate not reported; and I now move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution and that it be read and considered at this time.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent, under the order of the House which is now being executed. The question which the gentleman presents is a privileged matter; but the order adopted by the House suspends for the time being the ordinary rule on that subject.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I call for the regular order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent that the call of committees be dispensed with so that we may proceed with the debate on the tariff bill, and that gentlemen having reports to make be permitted to file them with the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection that order will be made.

There was no objection.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

The following report from a committee was handed in at the Clerk's desk, referred to its appropriate calendar, and otherwise disposed of as indicated below:

JURISDICTION OF POLICE COURT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 5013) to amend section 4 of an act entitled "An act to define the jurisdiction of the police court of the District of Columbia;" which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (H. R. 1920) to amend section 4430, Title LII, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to inspection of iron or steel boiler plates; when the Speaker signed the same.

THE TARIFF.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order the House will now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the tariff bill.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee in the chair.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I voted for the McKinley law in 1890 as a member of this House, and against a good many protests from some parties in my part of the country. I believed that it was wisdom then to so vote, and time, since the passage of that act, has demonstrated the wisdom of that law; so that to-day, although my State is largely agricultural, I do not know a farmer within its bounds, whatever may be his party affiliations, who does not believe that it is to his interest that this law shall stand, rather than to concede the adoption of the measure now before the House, the Wilson bill, and its provisions in so far as they relate to the interests of the farmer.

WILSON LAW ROBS THE FARMER.

And while I occupy the time of the House, I simply desire to call your attention to a single proposition, or two propositions rather, as to what this Wilson bill takes away from the farmer, and where it is inimical to his interest, as I believe; and, secondly, what it promises him in return.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this bill is aimed at the agricultural classes of the country. It seems to me that the free-trade force of the Democracy is seeking to wreak all of its vengeance against protection, pent up for years past, and has selected the farmer to receive the blow. The Wilson bill—and I say it after a careful consideration—the Wilson bill smites the farmer hip and thigh. It is against him on every article he produces. I believe the McKinley law—and I believe it because I know it from many sources in the country, having been amongst the farmers in many parts of it—that the McKinley law offers more protection to the farmer than any other class of men in this country. I believe the farmer is reaping more advantages from the protection features of the McKinley bill than any manufacturer in the United States.

In that bill the agriculturalist had ample and most liberal consideration, whereas under the provisions of the Wilson bill we find it attacks the farmer on every hand, and I simply refer to the bill in support of that statement. Let us note a few of the reductions and confiscations to which the agricultural community is treated in this bill, and I defy any gentleman to select or name any specific advantage this bill confers on the farmers as a class, more than is conferred generally on all classes by the provisions of that bill. You may claim that he has a little of the advantage from your standpoint, that you propose every one else is to have who is interested in the bill, but even from your standpoint it is only an advantage which all enjoy in common with the farmer. But my proposition is that there is no specific advantage conferred upon him at all or in any respect. You confer no favor whatever upon the farmer, while you protect all other interests and confer privileges and protection to the manufacturers of the country. And the farmer is the only class in the country against whom wholesale attack and onslaught is made.

ITEMS UPON WHICH THE BILL ROBS THE FARMER.

Now, let us see how the professions of this party that we have heard so earnestly and often on this floor in their advocacy of the farmers and their rights is borne out by their acts; let us see, I say, what they are doing in this act and under the provisions of this bill for the farmer's benefit. Here they had an opportunity to care for the farmer's interest. What have they done?

Under this bill they reduce wool from 11 cents per pound under the McKinley law and place it on the free list. They reduce horses from $30 a head under the McKinley law to 20 per cent ad valorem under this. They reduce the tariff on mules from $30 per head under the McKinley law to 20 per cent ad valorem. They reduce cattle from $10 a head under that law to 20 per cent ad valorem under this. They reduce sheep from $1.50 a head to 20 per cent ad valorem. Hogs from $1.50 a head to 20 per cent ad valorem.

Barley, that great crop which, before the McKinley law went into effect, the former law permitted the importation of over $11,000,000 worth in one year, and since that law, less than half a million dollars' worth—what have they done with reference to barley; and what does my distinguished friend from Nebraska do for the barley-raisers of his State, which adjoins mine and has the same conditions, and, as he knows, they have few if any better crops in their State than barley. They reduced it from 30 cents a bushel to 20 per cent ad valorem; buckwheat, from 1 cent per pound to 20 per cent ad valorem. You see that these are all farm products I name. Every farm product of any considerable importance is reduced under this bill, I think, without a single exception.

But I go on with this table. Corn is reduced from 15 cents per bushel under the McKinley law to 20 per cent ad valorem; oats from 15 cents a bushel to 20 per cent ad valorem; cornmeal from 20 cents per bushel to 20 per cent ad valorem; rye from 10 cents a bushel to 20 per cent ad valorem; wheat from 25 cents a bushel to 20 per cent ad valorem; beans from 40 cents a bushel to 20 per cent ad valorem; potatoes from 25 cents a bushel to 10 cents a bushel; onions from 40 cents to 20 cents a bushel; peas, dried, from 30 to 20 cents a bushel; vegetables in their natural state from 25 per cent ad valorem to 10 per cent ad valorem; hay—and in the great Northwest we have enough hay to supply the world; they give the Canadians across the line from our States the opportunity to come and drive out our haymakers and allow millions of tons of our hay to rot on the ground. What do they do for hay?

Hay is reduced from $4 per ton to $2 per ton; hops from 15 cents a pound to 8 cents a pound; butter and substitutes therefor from 6 cents to 4 cents; poultry from 3 cents to 2 cents; poultry, dressed, from 5 cents to 3 cents; apples, green or ripe, from 25 cents per bushel to the free list; bacon and hams from 5 cents to the free list; beef, mutton, and pork from 2 cents to the free list; eggs from 5 cents a dozen to the free list; lard from 2 cents a pound to the free list; milk from 5 cents per gallon to the free list; broom corn from $8 per ton to the free list; straw from 30 per cent ad valorem to the free list; cider from 5 cents per gallon to the free list.

This is the record of the Wilson bill for the farmer. This is what it offers to the farmer, and I say that it smites the farmer hip and thigh upon every article that he produces.

INCONSISTENCIES OF THE BILL.

I desire for a moment to call attention to the argument offered to the wool-growers of the country. The committee say in their majority report that they are to furnish manufacturers with free wool, in order, as they say, that the general public may have cheaper clothing. And then, as the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] very emphatically announced the other day in his argument, they turn around immediately in the next breath and tell us, the wool-raisers of the United States, that we are to have a better price for our wool than we have under the present law.

Now, how is that? How can you tell the people of the United States that you are putting wool upon the free list in order to give them cheaper clothing, and then turn around in the next breath, as you do in this majority report, and tell us, the wool-raisers of the country, that we will have a better price for our wool than we have at present?

These two propositions are utterly inconsistent. If clothing is to be cheaper, as is promised by the committee, as the result of the passage of this bill, which is made the excuse for putting wool on the free list, then it follows as a matter of course that the wool-raisers must take a smaller price for their wool. Certainly there can be no denying this proposition.

It means this, you can not escape it; and it means to rob us of a fair price for our wool and mutton, and in this bill they do so rob us.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have in my State, and in the country north and south and west of there, one of the greatest sheep-raising sections of the Union. We have a particularly well-suited climate for wool growing.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

We have particularly nutritious grasses that cure upon the ground, and when they are not covered by snow furnish good pasturage for horses, sheep, and cattle the year round. We have artesian wells, the greatest in the world, supplying water, flowing from one to four thousand gallons per minute, throwing the water 50, 75, and 100 feet into the air, affording the cheapest and greatest power there is in the country. We desire to raise wool there. We, the people of South Dakota, and the farmers whom I represent, desire to furnish our portion of the sixty millions of sheep that are yet lacking in the United States to supply the people with what they consume of wool and mutton. We want to raise our portion of these sixty millions sheep. We want to produce our part of that wool and mutton, and we want to manufacture it in our midst, because we have the power so to do.

WILSON BILL DESTROYS NATURAL ADVANTAGES.

But the Wilson bill destroys every natural advantage that that country affords us. We know that we are to be driven out of the wool industry. We know that we can not compete with the wool-raisers of these other countries, as has been well said here; our people can not compete with Australians, South Americans, and South Africans; they are a much cheaper people than our free Americans; and, whereas, Mr. Chairman, since the passage of the McKinley bill in my State our sheep have trebled in number, yet since this question became agitated, and the passage of this bill was promised, the sheep-raisers have become despondent and are going out of business, and are despairing of any hope from this source of income.

Mr. CRAIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PICKLER. Under the five-minute rule I will be glad to answer the gentleman, but I can not now, as my time is too limited.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. PICKLER. I will be glad to talk to the gentleman under the five-minute rule. I would not be surprised if gentlemen coming from Texas should find their consciences hurting them a little when they think about this wool schedule.

Mr. CRAIN. In view of that remark the gentleman ought to allow me to ask him a simple question.

Mr. PICKLER. I will later. I want to ask you gentlemen on the other side of this House, if this proposition is true that by putting wool on the free list, or giving manufacturers free raw materials, if that is to cheapen clothing and other articles of consumption, I want to know why it is that you select the farmer to bear all the burdens?

Why do not you distribute them? How is it that you say to the farmer and to the millions of farm laborers throughout this country: "We will protect the Eastern manufacturers; we give the wool manufacturers," as the chairman of the committee [Mr. WILSON of West Virginia] puts it "forty dollars on the hundred yet;" and if that be so, why is it that you protect these industries while you make the farmers bear all the burdens by putting his products on the free list and protecting all others? Why do not you equalize this matter in some respect? Why do not you give to the farmer some reduction and some reduction to the manufacturer, instead of giving it all to the manufacturer and nothing to the farmer?

The farm laborers in this country number 9,000,000 of people, and including those who are dependent upon them number 35,000,000 of our population; and you strike every interest possible in this bill. In the year 1889, before the McKinley law and with an insufficient tariff, there was imported into this country of farm products over $125,000,000, every item of which should have been produced by our own farmers. I submit the items.

More than one-sixth of the $745,131,652 worth of imports during the fiscal year 1889 was made up from commodities coming in immediate competition with the products of American farms, viz:

Animals and meats	$14,010,498
Cotton	1,194,505
Dairy products	1,250,922
Fruits, other than tropical	8,794,272
Flax seed	3,851,685
Grains, hay, hops, etc.	9,252,912
Rice	3,499,437
Skins, other than furs	25,127,750
Tobacco	10,868,526
Wool	17,974,512
Vegetable fibers	20,468,475
Vegetables	3,637,301
Miscellaneous	5,151,650
	125,082,148

This excludes sugar, spices, raw silk, dyes, wines, and numerous other articles, of which many are grown in the United States.

KICK THE FARMER DOWNSTAIRS.

This majority of the Ways and Means Committee, it seems to me, have called in the several classes before them. They have called the importers in before them, the manufacturers of woolen goods, and perhaps the glove manufacturers and shoe manufacturers; and this committee had before them also the farmer. They have called them in and said, "Just stand up, gentlemen, and we will dispose of you." The importer says, "I want a lesser duty so that I may sell more goods." They say to him, "Come up higher. You advance three steps to the front." Then they say to the woolen manufacturer, "Stand back a little," and they jostle him a very little, and they do the same with the glove manufacturer and other manufacturers.

Then it comes to the farmer's turn. They take him by the throat and back to the back door and kick him downstairs and into the alley. I defy anyone to say that this is not the treatment this bill affords the farmer. That is what they have done to the farmer. Then comes to the bruised farmer the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN], with a ball of binding-twine under his arm and rolling a barrel of salt and saying to the farmer, "We will give you free twine and salt." That is the promise they give to the farmer. It seems to me, gentlemen, unfair, unjust, and not right that you should, in carrying out what you say is this great reform, to the Northern and Western farmers especially, to make him bear all the burdens which you do in this bill. Should he, in order to have cheaper clothing, bear the brunt for all the 70,000,000 of these people? Should not the burden be distributed? Why have you made him bear it alone?

CANADIAN PRODUCTS.

I am speaking of what I know, as I live only 200 or 300 miles from the British Possessions; and I say that in this bill you are inviting the horse-raisers of those provinces, the wool-raisers of that country, the poultry-raisers, their butter-makers, and the producers of all articles of farm products they there produce, the vegetable-raisers of Bermuda, the onion-raisers of Spain and Egypt, and all of those foreign countries, and especially those producing wool, to pour their agricultural products into this country and into my State, and drive us out of the business. You have put in a few ad valorem duties here upon a few farm products, but there is not an iota of protection in any of them. It is virtually free trade for every one of the products of the farmers of America.

Oh, you select some articles, talk of the tariff on same, and say protection does not help the farmer any. Then, if it does not help or hurt him, why make any reduction in the duties that are given for the benefit of the farmer? Why put him on the down grade? Why did you not give him the protection he has in the McKinley bill? He asks it, even under your own theory, if it is of no value. This theory of free trade does as a theory, but the farmers in my State, living at no great distance from the British Possessions, know that it is disastrous.

PROTECTION GIVES THE FARMER BETTER PRICES.

It is not guesswork with the farmers of my State. They know that since the McKinley bill was passed they have received better prices for their barley, for their flax, for their horses, for their wool, for their potatoes, for their eggs, their butter, and other articles, than their neighbors across the Canadian line have received. That they know, and no theory can displace the knowledge of this fact in their minds.

We know these things to be facts, and this theory that protection does not help the farmer is regarded a fallacy beyond all doubt in our State. We know that it does; and then, beyond that even, from your own standpoint, if protection to farm products does not give a cent better prices, which it does, there is this point to it: Every horse that a Canadian sells in this country prevents the sale of a horse by an American farmer, and I desire to call attention to the admirable list the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] furnished in his able speech the other day, as to some articles. He shows that the number of horses imported were 62,411, on an average a year for five or six years before the passage of the McKinley law. I see it in evidence before the Committee on Ways and Means that one man states that from Mexico alone there were driven across 250,000 Mexican horses annually. Undoubtedly the large share of these horses came into this country without paying any duty, thus defrauding the horse-raisers in this country as well as the Government of the revenue.

We ought to supply the horses that are used in this country. Our farmers ought to raise these horses, and if we get no more out of protection, it is a great advantage to us to furnish this sixty thousand to one hundred thousand horses annually, and it would give us the market of this country for our horses. Every Mexican or Canadian who sells a horse to our people deprives the farmers of this country of the sale of that animal. So every steer, sheep, hog, bushel of barley, flax, or potatoes furnished by a foreigner prevents our farmers from furnishing these articles. What do you put in this bill on horses? Twenty per cent ad valorem. It is in evidence before the Committee on Ways and Means that that duty, 20 per cent ad valorem, was enforced before the McKinley law and that it amounted to $2 on the horse. The duty of $2 on a horse, as you fix it in this bill, is an insult to every horse-raiser of the United States. Two dollars a head protection; what a humbug!

Of cattle there were imported 88,000 head annually on an average before the passage of the McKinley law. We have the territory, we have the grass, we have the facilities for raising these cattle; and our farmers are anxious to produce these horses and sheep and cattle, and all these other products, and sell them as a livelihood, but by the passage of this act, you nullify every advantage we have to so do. It is a great injustice, great hardship, and a great detriment to my constituents, and I protest against it.

Your pretense for this onslaught upon the farmer is that you want the manufacturer to have free raw material. You destroy our wool industry, you declare, to get cheaper clothing, and yet clothing is cheaper than it has ever been known in the history of the country. A man's all-wool, first-rate suit for less than $11. And while it is an admitted fact that the class of clothing worn by the farmer is not protected and is cheaper than in England, after thirty years of protection in this country the farmer's dollar buys more than ever before, while all of his products bring him a much better price than during any free-trade period.

FOREIGN COMPETITION.

You open our markets to people with whom they can not compete and you drive them out of the business. What are they going to do? What business do you propose that the wool-growers and the cattle-raisers and the horse-raisers of that country shall undertake after you have driven them out of the business in which they are engaged?

SIXTY MILLION SHEEP.

Take sheep. As I said before, statistics show that we need 60,000,000 more head of sheep in this country for our own consumption. We ought to raise them. We have the facilities for doing it, and does any gentleman here doubt that it would give a great impetus to trade in every line if we were producing those additional 60,000,000 of sheep in this country, with the enormous amount of money they would yield?

TWO TAILORS.

The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] argued very eloquently the other day as to what a great advantage it would be for the farmer in this country to have a tailor making a suit of clothes on this side of the water and another one making another suit of clothes in England in opposition to the American, so that the farmer might have two bidders for his wheat instead of one. Now, the farmers in my part of the country would rather have both those tailors near them. [Laughter.] We would rather have them both at our own doors and furnish us a market at home for our products. We want them for their society; we want them to help to pay the taxes in this country while they are making the clothes; to help to build our schoolhouses and our churches, and to develop our great country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

There would be just as much competition between them, so far as the consumption of wheat is concerned, if both the tailors lived in this country. [Laughter and applause.] And if we had them with us we would save the transportation on our wheat to England and on the tailor's goods to this country.

My distinguished friend from Nebraska, my neighbor [Mr. BRYAN], is willing, as I understand, to destroy the sugar factories in his State. He is willing to destroy our sheep-raising and horse-raising out in that country by the passage of this bill. I do not know what the will of his constituents in Nebraska is, but I do know that just across the line in my State the farmers are solidly opposed to this bill. I had a letter a few days ago from the president of the agricultural college of my State, Dr. Lewis McLouth, saying that before the fear about this bill came up they had had men from the East looking to that country for places to locate beet-sugar factories, but that since the agitation of this Wilson bill those parties had declined to consider any proposition whatever.

Mr. BRYAN. Just before the elections of 1880 and 1890 nearly every town in Nebraska had similar propositions.

Mr. PICKLER. Well, my friend, is it not your duty to encourage such propositions and such enterprises?

Mr. BRYAN. But after the election they all disappeared.

Mr. PICKLER. Ah, they did not. Has the one at Norfolk disappeared?

Mr. BRYAN. No.

Mr. PICKLER. Are you not, as a Nebraskan, proud of that enterprise?

Mr. BRYAN. I am proud of anything that stands on its own feet, but——

Mr. PICKLER. Then why do you undertake to cut it down? I tell you, my good friend, you absorbed too much free-trade doctrine when you lived farther East. [Laughter.] You know that you propose to destroy that beet-sugar manufacture. You know that those people fear that.

And you know further, if the bounty of the present law were continued, these factories would spring up all over our countries specially adapted to the business, giving employment to tens of thousands of farm laborers, and saving scores of millions of dollars to this country that now goes abroad for sugar.

PROTECT NORTH AND WEST.

You know that you are going to destroy our wool industry out there. I tell you I think that it is most emphatically the duty of men in that portion of the country to protect the interests of the people there, and I submit to the gentleman from Nebraska that while the South was getting free cotton ties, and while he was consenting to the retention of the bounty on sugar, and while the Southern farmers were getting a high tariff on rice the farmers of the North and the West ought to have had some consideration. I want it understood that I do not envy the Southern farmers a particle; on the contrary, I am glad that the farmers in some part of the country are getting something out of this bill; but I repeat, I think that while the gentleman was agreeing to those things it was his duty to have stood, at least to some extent, for the interests of the farmers of his own section.

BINDING TWINE.

Mr. BRYAN. Will you help us to put binding twine on the free list?

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, I voted for free binding twine long ago in the McKinley bill, and I voted for it at that time, believing then, as I believe now, that it did not amount to a row of pins as far as saving the farmer anything was concerned. What is the history of binding twine? Its price was 14 cents in 1890, and in the McKinley law we put a duty of seven-tenths of a cent a pound upon it, and the result was that it sold for 11 cents the next year, 3 cents lower than before the McKinley law. I was coming to that subject. I know that is the bait that you throw out to the farmers. The majority say in their report to the farmers of the country, "We have given untaxed agricultural implements, binding twine, free salt, and untaxed cotton ties"—the latter with an explanation. That is, after all this tearing down of the interests of the farmers that I have been detailing, you promise to give them this. What does it amount to?

FREE AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS.

Free agricultural implements; what does that amount to? It amounts to nothing. The price of agricultural implements is only about one-third of what it was ten years ago. A binding machine that cost $330 ten years ago costs now only $115. The patents on those inventions have expired and our home competition puts the price as low as the manufacturers can afford. Therefore there is nothing whatever in that. Even if the tariff upon agricultural implements, reapers, binders, mowers, and other machinery was all a tax it would not amount to $2 a year to the average farmer. A binder, reaper, and mower will last ten years with ordinary care and two or three farmers will use it.

There is nothing whatever in this free agricultural implement proposition. It is a shadow without a reality. And while history shows that binding twine was lower after the McKinley tariff than before, even if the seven-tenths of a cent per pound under that bill had been so much tax added to the price, what would it cost the ordinary farmer farming 80 acres?

I want to say to my good friend from Nebraska that any ordinary farmer would lose more under your bill on a dozen chickens he may raise than you can possibly save him on free binding twine. [Applause.] He will lose more under your bill upon one good sheep annually than you will save him annually by making binding twine free. This is a fact; the figures will demonstrate it. Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, the farmers in my State are now largely using headers, and thus dispensing with binders and binding twine.

This talk about lightening the tax on binding twine and agricultural implements does not amount to anything substantial to the farmer; it is mere claptrap.

SALT.

Then the gentleman from Nebraska comes rolling his barrel of salt, and says, "We put salt on the free list for the benefit of the farmer." Now, salt costs 40 cents a barrel with the barrel thrown in, and our farmers do not care to have salt cheaper than that—it will be no cheaper than that. No ordinary farmer uses more than a barrel of salt a year. If he uses more than that he has a large amount of stock for which he requires salt; and on every head of stock he loses more by your reduction of tariff in this bill on stock than he would lose by the duty on salt in ten years.

NOTHING FOR THE FARMER.

There is nothing in what you offer to the farmer. Everyone of your changes in the farm schedule helps to ruin us. You put upon the free list or reduce the tariff so low that it is no benefit upon everything in which the farmer is interested in having a market.

UNFAIR TO THE WEST.

Gentlemen, it is not fair to the great West to treat us in this way. In that region are the homes of your sons and daughters who are coming among us to build up that great country. We do not deny that you ought to have equitable protection in the East: but we say that you ought to treat us fairly. The pioneers in the Western country have great hardships to endure. We are battling there for the development of that country so as to make it an honored part of this great American Union. The farmers, because they are weak, ought not to be trodden upon.

I call upon Democratic members from the North to beware of what they are doing. We can not always stand the treatment we have been receiving. Within the last few years we have been deprived of millions and millions of dollars by the putting of hides on the free list while protecting your leather and shoe manufacturers in the East. In this way the interest of the East has been cared for at the expense of the West. Now, you propose to drive us out of the wool business, because such a measure will conduce to the interest of the manufacturers of the East directly, and, as you claim, indirectly to the people. This is unjust to the people of the great West. It is unjust to the young men and young women who are developing that country.

YOUNG MEN AND WOMEN.

Mr. Speaker, my State is a State of young men and young women. The old men are few. We have young men and young women who left their Eastern homes to acquire homes in the great Northwest, brave, energetic, and determined. They are true pioneers, and the true pioneer is always courageous, hopeful, and persevering. They are building a State. They have many hardships, they undergo many privations, but this young population will develop a State and shape its destiny, an honor to themselves and an honor to the nation. They are entitled to fair treatment as an agricultural and mining community.

They are virtuous, deserving, and brave. We have room for hundreds of thousands more. With a soil unsurpassed in fertility, within twenty-four hours of Chicago, twelve hours of St. Paul and Minneapolis, fifteen hours of Duluth, all things considered we offer the cheapest lands and best facilities for raising stock and all cereals in the West.

They ought to have a fair chance; you owe that much to them. You do not give it to them in this bill. I defy my honored friend from Nebraska or any other gentleman to show a single article produced by the farmer, in reference to which he is not left in worse condition by this bill than he was before. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

[Mr. COCKRAN withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Will there be a session of the House this evening for debate on this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. There will be—at 8 o'clock.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will ask whether the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN] will be recognized to address the House at the evening session?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN] is on the list to speak to-night at 8 o'clock.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to consume a single moment of my time in discussing the constitutionality of a protective tariff. I beg to notify my distinguished friend the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER], whose able argument this morning was based mainly on the ground that there is no warrant in the Constitution for levying duties on imports with a view to the protection of American industries—that that question is closed, and that that proposition is not entitled to the serious consideration of any enlightened deliberative body in this country.

I beg also to remind the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], who has just addressed the House, and whose genius and oratory I always admire, that notwithstanding the assertions he has made, which his friends seem to accept as convincing arguments against the American protective tariff system, the fact, attested by thirty years' experience, is plainly seen looming up above the din and confusion of his fierce assault, that under the operation of that system we as a people have become a prodigy of growth, development, and prosperity in all the elements of national greatness and individual happiness, and a living wonder among the nations of the earth. [Applause.] Yet, in the face of this solemn, burning truth, these gentlemen and their Populist allies are asking us to support a measure now before us for our serious consideration and determination, formulated by the greatest committee of this House, proposing the ultimate if not the immediate overthrow of that beneficent system.

Mr. Chairman, if I could have my way I would change the title of the bill. Instead of "a bill to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes"—as the committee has designated it—I would characterize it as a bill to create a deficiency in the Treasury of the United States; to deprive thousands of American workingmen of the opportunity for employment; to reduce the wages of those who are already employed; to ruin the American farmer by the destruction of his home market; to wreck American industries for the benefit of foreigners, and for other kindred purposes. [Applause.]

If the Committee on Ways and Means had contented itself with the articles it had succeeded in retaining on the free list—such as acorns, fish bait, and balm of Gilead; such as guano, bologna sausage, and sauerkraut; as yams, mud turtles, and tobacco stems, and such other articles of prime necessity, in the estimation of the committee, as worm guts, or whip guts, cat guts, salted guts, and snails, the country might have survived the passage of this bill [laughter]; but unfortunately the committee's free list does not end with these items. As a strict partisan, I would rejoice to see this bill pass Congress as it has come from the committee and become a law without amendment, for following such passage, and at the expiration of its present lease of power, I can see the Democratic party step down and out of this Capitol into its open grave! [Applause on the Republican side.]

But, sir, as it is a question of meat and bread for the millions, viewing it from the standpoint of a citizen of the United States deeply interested in his country's welfare, and who would not seek party advantage at the price of his country's peril, I would kill this bill on the spot, as I would kill a deadly reptile. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I doubt if in all our legislative history a measure more unjust and productive of more harm to the country at large was ever presented for the consideration of Congress. I can not see how it could have been possible for the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means to have concocted a scheme of class legislation more complete and more effective.

If they had set to work, purposely, to make a sectional bill, they could not possibly have framed one more sectional in its operation and effects. Let me show you how it will work. It undertakes to raise revenue to meet the expenses of the Government, and falls short of the accomplishment of that purpose by $75,000,000.

The distinguished speaker who just closed on the other side [Mr. COCKRAN] does not believe this statement, and argues that the revenues will be increased by it rather than diminished. If his position is correct, why is it that the Ways and Means Committee, to which he belongs, has decided to bring in a separate bill here taxing incomes, and is preparing bills looking to the levying of additional internal-revenue taxes upon our people, with a view to raising an amount sufficient to meet this enormous deficit?

Under the Republican plan duties levied on importations from abroad produced the larger part of our needed revenues. This bill shifts the burden of taxation from the shoulders of foreigners and places it upon the shoulders of our own people. As has been suggested by the minority report, under the pretense of affording encouragement to the manufacturer by giving him his raw materials free, it puts no tax at all on what goes into the mill or into the factory, but what goes out of the mill, out of the factory into consumption, is to be made pay all the taxes. Under the operation of this scheme of "free raw materials" the manufacturer is to be allowed to go scot free, while the consumer, who is also the producer, furnishing the "free raw materials," must pay all the taxes.

The manufacturer pays no taxes on what he buys, getting all of his materials free, but the people must pay all the taxes, or the equivalent of taxes, on all they purchase.

This is exactly the way this proposed law will operate. Now, I say that is not fair. The men who furnish the bulk of the raw material, as you Democrats call it in this country, are the men who furnish the wool, the wheat, the cotton, the lumber, the iron ore, and the coal. Who are they? They are the cotton-producers, sheep-raisers, farmers, lumbermen, iron-ore men, and coal men of the United States, more than one-half of our population.

The great bulk of these people and their interests are located in the South and West. Now, this bill legalizes all their products—their cotton, after it has been picked and put through the process of ginning; their wool, after it has been clipped from the sheep and washed; their wheat, after it has been harvested, thrashed, and garnered; their lumber, after it has been cut down in the forest and manufactured into the log; their iron ore, after it has been dug out of the hill and washed; their coal, after it has been taken out of the bed; their coke, after it comes from the oven—as raw materials, when in reality they are as much the finished product of the farmer, the mine owner, and lumberman as is the pick and the shovel and the hoe, the wool clippers and the cotton gin the finished product of the men who manufacture them.

Yet it is proposed to compel these farmers, lumbermen, iron miners, and coal dealers, to turn over to the manufacturer all these products as raw materials, free of duty, while, at the same time, a duty of 40 per cent is imposed on every product of the manufacturer into which these materials enter, thereby forcing—even according to Democratic theory—the producers of the raw materials, so called, to pay to the manufacturer 40 cents on every dollar's worth of goods they buy in order that he may have the benefit of protection.

But this is not all. The work of the men who manipulate the saws in our lumber mills is unprotected, while the work of the men who operate the machinery to plane and tongue and groove the boards as they are transferred from the saws to the planers under the same roof, is protected by protective tariff duties. Labor in the mills and factories of New England is not neglected by this bill—its interests are looked after by shrewd, alert, and watchful representatives. I congratulate the Democratic representatives of New England on their success in procuring what they regard as ample protection for their manufacturers and laborers. But what shall I say of Democratic Western and Southern representation here?

The fact is labor in the shops and factories of New England is protected by this bill, while the labor in the iron mines, coal fields, and other fields of the South and West is unprotected and left to the mercy of charity. I make no comment.

But my greatest objection to this bill is the fact that it is a sectional and not a national measure. It affords 40 per cent of protection for New England, and authorizes absolute free trade for the South so far as her chief staples are concerned.

The South must pay 40 per cent protection to New England on every article of woolen and cotton goods and other goods she buys, while she herself is left to revel in the anticipated glories of free trade in iron ore, free trade in coal, free trade in lumber, with "tariff for revenue only" on marble, "tariff for revenue only" on mica, free trade in wheat, free trade in wool, and free trade in cotton. The South must pay 40 cents on every dollar's worth of goods she buys as a tribute to the New England manufacturer, "protectionist," "monopolist," and Yankee, and that, too, without the slightest reciprocity.

But I do not desire to be understood in this connection as complaining of New England. Would to God this was a patriotic measure and treated all sections alike. [Applause.] I have no fault to find with New England. She deserves to be favored. I congratulate her. As a citizen of the Republic I am proud of New England, for she is the glory of a great nation. Who that loves man in his proudest type, in his grandest development of mind in science and in art, in the useful and in the beautiful; who that loves man in his sublimest appreciation of liberty and noblest manifestation of liberality, does not love New England! [Applause.]

And, sir, the great heart of New England throbs with sympathy, I know, and she is touched to tears, I am sure, as she beholds the ruined West and the stricken South—for patriotic as she is in her participation in all our national legislation, she has always "kept steadily in view the prosperity and honor of the whole country and the preservation of the Federal Union." [Applause on the Republican side.]

In addition to the serious injuries inflicted by this bill to many Western interests, by another bill which passed this Congress in its extra session, and for which the Democratic party will never be able to escape responsibility before the country, the greatest industry of six of the Western States was stricken down at a single blow, and now the Democratic party again steps to the front and proposes through this bill to lay its blighting hand on the chief industries of eight, if not all, of the Southern States.

Crushed down under a heavy burden of debt, individual, municipal, county, and State, the South was fast recuperating, and was on the high road to financial independence until the anticipated change in our industrial system caused a halt in her career of progress and locked fast her growing prosperity "in the paralysis of hard times." The announcement of the Democratic policy has been to the South as a cyclone, unroofing cities and laying low the forests, or as a blighting frost in June, nipping Southern flowers and withering Southern cotton. It has reduced all values within her borders 30 if not 40 per cent. Every interest has been touched by the blighting hand.

It has cut the price of her horses, mules, wheat, corn, cotton, mica, marble, copper, lead, zinc, iron, coal, lumber; it has cut her credit and the price of her real estate and driven into receiverships her principal industries, and her magnificent system of railroads into bankruptcy by the enormous cut in freights. Her working people who were making a decent living in the sweat of their face, and who were able to educate their children, are begging now in vain for work, and trembling lest they shall have to call on the county courts for help or hide themselves in the poorhouses. Thus bleeds the South at every pore. Gentlemen of the Democratic side of the House, what is the measure of relief you offer, what is the remedy you propose?

You say it is the Wilson bill. God help the South! In this hour of her greatest tribulation you propose to withdraw the helping hand of protection from her every industry, at a time she most needs help, and leave her to her fate—a fate which makes her people still the "hewers of wood and drawers of water" to New England and the great manufacturers of the North—whom you have always denounced as "protection sharks and monopolists"—monopolists and sharks grown up under the protective system, as you allege, and yet they are the only people on God's earth now you offer to protect at the rate of 40 per cent, and do protect at that rate by this bill, in the face of your stereotyped declaration that protection is unconstitutional, a fraud, and a robbery. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It has always seemed to me as it seems to me now, that the only hope of the South for present relief and for future prosperity is through the instrumentality of the pick and the shovel and the hoe—of the drive wheel and the spindle, the coke oven and the blast furnace—as well as the plow and the cotton gin! [Applause on the Republican side.] The Southern people must become manufacturing communities. The superior advantages nature has afforded in climate, soil, water power, forests, and minerals, and their necessities have so decreed.

Beginning in West Virginia and running southward far into Northern Alabama there is a body of coal 1,000 miles in length, including the Pocahontas lead, which as yet the hand of enterprise has scarcely touched. Lying on the south side of these immense coal fields and paralleling them all the way there are a succession of deposits and veins of iron ore, covering every variety, inexhaustable in supply and unexcelled in quality, and which only in recent years have begun to attract the attention of capital and enterprise.

In the section where I live these long parallel lines of hidden wealth are only separated by the valley of Eastern Tennessee, from 60 to 75 miles in width. Iron is king, coal is queen. Our great hope has been that these two would meet and become joined together in our magnificent valley—

> Where healthful breezes ever blow,
> And coolest springs and rivers flow;
> Where yellow wheat and waving corn
> Are liberal poured from plenty's horn,

and thus together joined, fill it with boundless wealth and a million industrious, thriving, independent, and happy people. In addition to our iron and coal we expected to derive much benefit financially from our lumber and marble resources. We ship many millions of feet of lumber from my immediate section in almost all directions, but this bill ruins this industry, and the committee justifies its action in placing lumber on the free list on the ground that it "will delay the rapid destruction of American forests." I fail to see the wisdom of a policy which proposes to surrender our markets to foreigners in order that we may preserve our forests until the crack of doom; it may do future generations some good, but I can not see where the present generation is benefited.

The marble industry is a very large industry with us. The marble which decorates this Capitol comes from my Congressional district, but the cut in the rate of duty on foreign marble is so far below the point of protection in the pending bill that our marble men can not stand the foreign competition, and must suspend. Realizing this, I have been informed that some of the great derricks used to lift the immense blocks from the quarry to load them on the car have been actually draped in mourning by the proprietors and their quarrymen—signalizing, of course, the death of the marble industry.

The whole South is in possession of natural advantages of which no other country on the habitable globe can boast. She is blessed with every natural element above all peoples of the earth that enters into the growth, prosperity, and happiness of a country. And yet, industrially speaking, she is distressed, depressed, discontented, unhappy, wretched, prostrate!

Therefore, I say, the only possible hope for the Southern people is through the development of their natural resources—they must become a manufacturing people as well as an agricultural people. They must build up manufactures—and in building up manufactures, build up home markets for their agriculture—furnish opportunities for the employment of their idle labor—supplying their own market with the products of their fields, their mills and their factories, and sending those products to other markets in exchange for other commodities, and bringing back the golden eagles.

When the South reaches this point in her development—as she surely will some day, when tariff tinkering is abandoned—then will the day of her permanent prosperity dawn, then will she flourish as she has never flourished before; then will she become the garden and glory of America; the pride of the nation and the envy and admiration of all the world. [Applause.]

But pass this bill and you palsy the South.

In this great crisis, for one I stand here to-day and plead the cause of that generous, brave, magnanimous, and chivalrous people.

Gentlemen of the South, let me plead with you. It is your peculiar province just now to wield the scepter of power in these Halls and in this Government. You have hitherto taken pride in your devotion to Southern interests. Many of you wear honorable scars to-day in proof of your devotion to what you once believed was the true Southern cause. I appeal to you on this occasion to uphold and defend the true Southern cause of to-day.

Pass this bill, and you paralyze your country. Pass it with the duty reduced on pig iron from $6.72 per ton to $1.90 per ton, the lowest rate ever known in all our tariff legislation, and you endanger, if you do not destroy every Southern furnace. Pass this bill with lumber and coal on the free list, and you substitute the foreign for the native product—largely at least—close up many establishments to the injury of many laboring men, and surrender a part of our market—if not all of it—to Canada and Nova Scotia and other foreign lands.

Pass the bill with iron-ore on the free list and you at once substitute the foreign for the native ores, and enable Cuba, Spain, British Columbia, England, and even far-away Africa, through their cheap water transportation and low-grade labor, to capture the American market to the exclusion of Americans who ought to hold it and use it.

Pass this bill, and in the iron-ore industry alone you render unproductive if you do not destroy $110,000,000 of capital invested and drive out of employment 38,000 men.

Do this and you not only destroy the $110,000,000 of capital engaged in the iron-ore industry, but you turn out the 38,000 men who are engaged in this industry. You also render unproductive, if you do not destroy, the tens of millions of capital invested in every enterprise directly dependent upon the iron-ore industry of this country. Pass the bill and you do this——

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I do not like to be interrupted.

Mr. COX. I will not take your time, if it is a question of time. I desire to ask you this question: If you do not know it to be a fact that Tennessee and North Alabama are now producing iron at such a cost as to control the Eastern market upon pig metal?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. They may be at the present time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR] allow me to make him a suggestion at that point?

Mr. COX. I am talking to my colleague; I do not want to interrupt him if it will consume his time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The freight on a ton of iron from Tennessee to the iron manufactories of New York is $4.40; the freight on a ton of pig iron from Glasgow is how much? It is less than half a dollar a ton.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I accept the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, and that is a complete answer to my colleague.

Mr. COX. I want to submit a word further, and that is if the gentleman does not recognize the fact that there is not a ton of pig metal sold in Pittsburg, the price of which is not regulated by Southern iron?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. But when you put——

Mr. COX. Now, then, one word more. If we can make iron and send it to New York, with nearly $5 a ton of railroad transportation on it, what is the trouble with our country down there, when, without any tariff, we can compete with anybody.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. The $4 a ton duty.

Mr. COX. We are sending it there for a little over $4 a ton, and selling it in Pittsburg for less than they can make it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I can not yield any further.

It is a question of freight rates, but if you go ahead and put iron ore on the free list how long will the furnaces of Tennessee and Alabama be furnishing raw materials? You will be able to revive the 75 or 100 furnaces along the New England seaboard and the coast of New Jersey, where they can get free raw material and the cheap ore from foreign countries, dug by pauper labor and shipped as ballast, but when you do that you strike a death blow to the mines and the furnaces of our State and of Alabama. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, after all is said and done, the decree has gone forth that you must pass this bill. You will pass it under the whip and spur of party leadership. You will pass it under the influence of the party lash in the hands of your imperial master. [Laughter.] But the people of the United States will "repent in sackcloth and ashes" of having given you the power to do it. Four times have they repented as they passed through "the valley of the shadow of death," for four times have they passed through as many different periods of Democratic "tariff for revenue only" and free trade.

When you pass this bill the people of the United States will enter for the fifth time the dreaded valley, if, indeed, they have not already entered it; but they will profit by the "object lesson;" they will again repent. Through that repentance Republican "hope sees a star"—even in Tennessee! [Applause on the Republican side.] When we go down in the struggle here, as we doubtless must, by force of overpowering numbers, we will rise again and confront you in another field of conflict. [Applause on the Republican side.] It will be the open field, the field of our triumphant victory—our Austerlitz—and whoever our chosen leader is he will be our Napoleon!

We will then reëstablish on the ruins you have wrought the most beneficent, the most magnificent industrial system of all the ages—the American protective system. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] A system approved by Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Jackson, Webster, and Clay; upheld by Lincoln, Grant, Garfield, Arthur, and Blaine, and every truly great statesman and patriot of our country—living or dead. [Long and loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DRAPER. Mr. Chairman, I approach this tariff question from the standpoint of a business man, the nature of whose business has made it as necessary that he should make the tariff a study as that he should know the cost of the material he uses, or the prices at which he can afford to sell goods.

My living has come from a protected industry, in which my father and grandfather preceded me, and for nearly or quite seventy years the firm of which I am now a member has been in existence, paying 100 cents on the dollar to all creditors, through all the panics and under all the different tariff laws that have been in force in this country since 1820.

During the most of this time we have been in constant competition with manufacturers of similar goods across the water who have been and are able to compete, in all lines not patented, with American manufacturers, in spite of the amount of protection we have received.

I will say, further, that my business is building machinery for spinning and weaving cotton, and that the amount of protection on such machinery (45 per cent) has not been increased, the makers having neither asked nor received any increase of protective duties under the McKinley bill. Under the proposed bill the duty is reduced to 35 per cent.

Besides my immediate business, I have also been interested in the manufacture of cotton goods, and with others suffered serious loss from the lowering of duties on the finer grades of yarns, made on the recommendation of the Tariff Commission in 1883.

This practical knowledge and experience makes or ought to make me a fair judge of the effect of lowering tariff duties on industries with which I am acquainted; and, reasoning by analogy, on all protected industries where our manufacturers and their employés are now competing in our home market with foreign manufacturers and their employés.

Further than this, the prosperity or otherwise of the manufacturing classes affects in an equal degree the prosperity of the communities or States where manufacturing is the leading industry; and the number and importance of the manufacturing States, and of manufacturing interests in the other States, is so great that the whole country must prosper or suffer with them.

Now, a little more than a year since this country as a whole was prosperous as never before. Our manufactures, under sufficient protection, were not only flourishing, but increasing by leaps and bounds. Labor was in great demand and paid, not only in money but in what money would buy, more than ever before in this country, and double what similar labor commanded in any country whose goods competed in our markets.

Here let me put in a little personal knowledge bearing on the question of wages. I manufacture certain articles, duplicates or substantial duplicates of which are made in certain English shops.

They were invented in this country and introduced abroad, but not made here to be sold there, because that was impossible with our greater labor cost.

The proprietor of one of these English shops told me that his pay roll averaged a pound ($4.86) per employé per week. The average pay roll of the works in which I am interested was last year $2 per day or $12 per week; and these two shops are probably fair averages of those on corresponding work in the two countries. I will not dwell on this point, as this difference in wages is not now disputed by intelligent and candid free traders.

As before stated, the season of our greatest prosperity has substantially corresponded with the time of what is called the war tariff.

Rev. Edward Everett Hale, a man well known the country—nay, the world—over, made the following statement during the 1892 campaign:

If you make an estimate of the wealth of this country for the last two hundred and fifty years, and put it on one side, and then on the other the wealth that the country has gained since 1861, you will find that the increase of these last years is fivefold over the two hundred preceding. In other words, everything has been multiplied fivefold, and this during the rule of the Republican party. Physical wealth is not everything, however, but when, as in the present case, to physical wealth is joined a higher manhood, a higher morality, a broader system of education, and a higher average intelligence; when you can say this of a nation, you can say the greatest things that can be said of any nation. This is the result of this country's taking into her own hands her own interests and making the best out of them.

Dun's Review of Trade in December, 1892, said:

The most prosperous year ever known in business closes to-morrow with strongly favorable indications for the future. * * * For this year the volume of settlements through the clearing houses is the largest ever known. * * * The largest total of exports and imports ever known in any year. * * * Unprecedented purchases for consumption. * * * Manufacturers have made extraordinary progress. * * * The year closes with all woolen, cotton, and silk machinery fully employed and unsold stocks much lighter than usual, while the demand for the coming season already exceeds the capacity of many mills. Shipments of boots and shoes from the East have been 5 per cent larger than any previous year.

But perhaps neither Republican nor business authority will have much weight with our friends, so I quote from one of the best free-trade authorities, Mr. Edward Atkinson. In an article in the Forum for May, 1892, he says:

There has never been a period in the history of this or any other country when the general rate of wages was as high as it is now, or the price of goods relatively to the wages as low as they are to-day; nor a period when the workman, in the strict sense of the word, has so fully secured to his own use and enjoyment such a steadily and progressively increasing proportion of a constantly increasing product.

Perhaps even free trade American authority is insufficient, so I will add an excellent English authority.

Mr. Bryce, in his American Commonwealth, says:

With one interval of trade depression, it (the United States) has for twenty years been developing its amazing natural resources so fast as to produce an amount of wealth which is not only greater but more widely diffused through the populations than in any other part of the world, and the people allow themselves luxuries such as the masses enjoy in no other country.

I am perfectly aware that in spite of all this prosperity a party pledged to make a complete change in fiscal legislation has come into power.

I am also aware that in my section, at least, Democratic speakers and newspapers in the last Presidential campaign insisted that their party platform did not fairly represent the party view; that it was like the platform on a railway car—made to get in on, but not to stand on.

We were referred to the plank voted for by a large minority at Chicago as evidence that the party was divided on this issue, and it was also said that the rejected plank embodied Mr. Cleveland's ideas. The plank, you will remember, was in part as follows:

But in making reduction in taxes, it is not proposed to injure any domestic industries, but rather to promote their healthy growth. From the foundation of this Government, taxes collected at the custom-house have been the chief source of Federal revenue. Such they must continue to be. Moreover, many industries have come to rely upon legislation for successful continuance, so that any change of law must be at every step regardful of the labor and capital thus involved. The process of reform must be subject in the execution to this plain dictate of justice.

These arguments made some votes, or kept some in the party lines who would never have voted the ticket had they believed the platform promises were to be kept.

The most effective argument for Democratic success, however, in my section was the demagogic appeal to class prejudice.

It was said that protection was of benefit only to the very small class of manufacturers, those who owned or carried on establishments devoted to the production of articles upon which duties were levied in the tariff schedules.

On the one side, it was claimed, was the personal interest of these few men, and on the other side the interest of the great mass of the people of the country, including even the employés in the protected industries.

It was asserted that no matter how much protection was reduced, the reduction would simply be taken from the alleged immense profits of these manufacturers, and that they would continue to run their establishments and pay as high wages as before, because the labor unions would prevent reduction of wages.

Under these circumstances even the laboring men in the manufacturing States were to improve in condition, because they would get the same wages as before, if not more, while they would be enabled to buy articles of their own production, and of the production of other laborers, for less money, because of the reduction in prices which would come from lower duties.

The only difficulty with these statements was that they were not true, although perhaps the majority of the laborers in protected industries were misled by them.

The influence of partisanship on all these questions is unfortunate, and I suppose will not be avoided in this day and generation. We are too much inclined, as St. Augustine said, to "seek contention rather than truth." It should be our aim, as reasonable men, to discuss these public questions in a fair and candid spirit and after considering the arguments on both sides to make up our minds as to the proper policy to favor.

There is more unfairness of discussion on the tariff question than on almost any other, and I am thankful that, so far as I can see, much the greater part of it comes from the free-trade side. The profits of manufacturers are immensely overstated; wages double those paid in England are denominated as starvation wages; known and admitted differences between the condition of the mass of the people here and abroad are ignored; and all the arts of the demagogue are resorted to to stir up jealousy between employer and employed.

There is no difference of interest between classes on this question. It is either better or worse for all classes that factories should run here and that their number should increase; and it is a necessity of the case, if they do run, that there shall be a profit in running them, equal at least to the average profit of other business in the country.

A question for fair consideration is, Do manufacturers in protected industries make a larger percentage on their money than men who have invested in other lines of business—a percentage that can be substantially reduced and insure the carrying on of these industries in this country?

I have made some investigations on this point that I will come to soon, but I will first refer to matters of general knowledge.

Few if any of the great fortunes in this country have been made from the profits of ordinary manufacture.

They have been acquired in real-estate operations, in railroad building and management, in banking, in stock speculations, in trade, in the control of patents, and in various other directions in far greater number and amount.

Such as have come from manufacture are generally due to the control of some specialty, by patent or otherwise, and lowering the tariff would not necessarily affect them injuriously. It might even increase them by enabling their owners to manufacture cheaper in England while retaining their selling prices in this country.

As corroboration of the above statements (if they need corroboration), I will read a quotation from authority that ought to have weight with at least one party in this House—Mr. Edward Bellamy, the author of Looking Backward. In a recent article in the New Nation he says:

Mr. John E. Russell, Democratic candidate for governor in this State, in his speech at Springfield, October 25, declared that the vast individual fortunes which of late have been piled up in these United States, are chiefly the results of the protective tariff, and were made by the manufacture of protected goods. It is lamentable that a public speaker should indulge himself in such a loose manner of talk. Of course Mr. Russell, as a man of at least average intelligence, must be aware that the accumulations he refers to have mostly been made by operations which depended in no way on the tariff. Their sources have been chiefly real estate, telegraphs, telephones, mining and petroleum, stock-watering and speculation.

You can analyze the origin of all, or nearly if not quite all, of the first grade of great American fortunes, including the Astor, Gould, Standard Oil and Bonanza mining groups, without coming upon a single one which was to any considerable extent, if indeed in any part, derived from a tariff-protected industry. There are a few considerable fortunes, such as Carnegie's, which have been drawn from protected manufacturing, but their list is very brief. Manufacturing is at worst a fairly honest business as compared with railroad, real estate, and mining speculation, and stock-watering, and does not offer the shortest cuts to wealth. A large number of fortunes have been doubtless made by manufacturers, but they are as a rule moderate in bulk and come nearer than most fortunes nowadays to representing real services to the community.

We care not a pin for the tariff; but the pretense that the tariff reform or free-trade party is in any way or sense devoted to the popular interest or opposed to plutocracy is a transparent lie, which ought to be nailed on every occasion. There are to-day more money and bigger fortunes arrayed for free trade than for protection, and the only reason that the money bags have not already carried the day and overthrown protection is that protection has had hitherto great strength with the wage-earning class, who, rightly or wrongly, have believed it for their interest.

New York City, the center of the moneyed interest of the country, is the center of the free-trade agitation. Among the newspapers of the great moneyed centers of the East, journals that chiefly represent capitalistic interests, for one that stands for protection you will find two that cry for free trade, or at least radical tariff reduction. And those of them, as a rule, which are most bigoted in their defense of every form of corporation abuse and capitalistic aggression are most passionate in their demands for free trade. How, for instance, do papers like the New York Times and Post strike you as champions of the people against the money power?

Brethren, "Take heed and beware of the leaven of hypocrisy."

Again, it is a matter of common knowledge that in all ordinary times a reasonably sure return of 6 per cent interest, yes 5 per cent, with the principal secure, will command all the money that is required for almost any legitimate purpose. If manufacturing stocks paid more than that, and were considered secure, even our free-trade friends would be building woolen mills and iron works, instead of trying to shut them up.

Still again, if there were a large margin of profit in manufacturing, coöperative production would be generally successful when undertaken, instead of being almost universally a failure.

All this is generally known to business men, but perhaps it is not fully realized by other classes in the community.

In that view, a few facts that I have gathered together may be of interest.

It is known that my State of Massachusetts is a manufacturing State. Over 300,000 people are employed in her shops and mills (when they run), and, in connection with the capital invested, they substantially support the rest of the inhabitants.

Now, anyone would naturally suppose that most of the millionaires in Massachusetts would be manufacturers, even if there was no protective tariff, and certainly if that tariff was of benefit to manufacturers only.

Such, however, is not the case. There are 46 individuals or firms in business in Massachusetts that were estimated a year ago by the commercial agencies to be worth a million dollars. Of that 46, 19, or less than half, are manufacturers proper; 20 are merchants; 4 distillers and brewers, and 3 bankers.

The manufacturing firms are divided in business as follows: Paper, 4; leather, 3; cotton goods, 2; woolen goods, 1; shoes, 1; machinery, 1; pistols, 1; jewelry, 1; chairs, 1; sugar refining, 1; chocolate, 1; pork-packers, 1; fertilizers, 1. Several of these lines of business are not generally supposed to be materially affected by the tariff, and the entire list shows very much less concentrated wealth derived from the profits of manufacturing firms than is commonly supposed. The wealth of men not in active business is not so easily estimated, but no one conversant with the facts can doubt that the general capitalists and owners of real estate in Massachusetts who possess more than a million dollars greatly outnumber the millionaires of both manufacturing and mercantile business combined.

I confess that I was astonished at the result of this investigation. I have carried it a little farther (as Massachusetts is a manufacturing State), and have made similar investigations regarding New York City, which is more particularly a banking and trading center, although there is much manufacturing there. There I find 181 individuals and firms in business that are said to possess over a million of dollars. Of these only 35 are manufacturers proper, 102 merchants, 25 bankers, and the rest are in sundry lines of business. These figures do not indicate that manufacturing yields larger profits than other lines of business, but, on the contrary, quite the reverse.

It may be said, however, that corporations are not included in this statement, which is correct. The profits of corporations, however, can be gauged by the amounts of dividends they pay during a term of years. More than a year ago, while no political campaign was pending, I made certain investigations on this point, which were printed in two or three magazines, and commented upon somewhat by the press, and no one has questioned the correctness of my calculations.

I took all the manufacturing companies in Massachusetts, whose dividends were payable in Boston or in Fall River, that were in operation the 1st day of January, 1882, and ascertained the market value of their stocks at that date.

I then found the entire amount of dividends that they paid in the ten years from January 1, 1882, to January 1, 1892, and also the amount of additional capital that had been put into those companies during the same time.

I then learned the selling value of the stock of all these companies on January 1, 1892.

By combining these figures, it is easy to ascertain what amount of interest on investment a man would have made who had bought the stock of all these companies January 1, 1882, and sold them on January 1, 1892, meantime paying in all the money that was paid in and receiving all the dividends that were declared.

The companies were 65 in number. I can give the detailed statement to any party who is interested to examine or criticise the figures; and, in fact, I think I will attach it as an appendix to these remarks, as it may be more interesting to read than to listen to.

These companies had an average capital for the ten years of $50,415,500; the selling price of the stocks January 1, 1882, was $70,324,725; the selling price January 1, 1892, was $58,601,883; the total dividends paid amounted to $31,140,163; and the amount of cash paid in was $6,135,000. Deducting the cash paid in from the dividends, leaves $2,500,516 per annum. This is equal to 4.86 per cent on the capital stock. The average selling price, ascertained as before, was $64,463,304. On this sum the average dividend was 3.87 per cent. The loss in value of all the stocks for ten years was $11,722,842. Deducting this from the dividend leaves $13,282,321, or 2.06 per cent per annum on the average value of the capital invested.

My list of 65 companies included 41 that had gone through the ten years with unchanged capitals, and 24 that had been unfortunate or put in additional capital during the same time.

Omitting the 24, the figures are somewhat better, and show what has been done by the average of the manufacturing companies that may be called successful.

The entire par value of their stocks is $37,078,000; the selling value of all their stocks January 1, 1882, was $55,496,350; the selling value of all their stocks January 1, 1892, was $44,490,883; the total dividends of all these companies for the ten years amounted $24,420,913.

This amount of dividend for ten years is equal to an average dividend of $2,442,091 per annum, or substantially 6.58 per cent per annum on the par value of the stocks of the above-named companies. I also find the above annual dividend to be only 4.88 per cent of the average selling price for 1882 and 1892, which is $49,993,616.

The change in value of manufacturing or other stocks may, of course, be said to depend in part upon the years selected for the comparison. If the selection of one year was during a particularly prosperous time, and the selection of the other year was during a panic, differences would appear which would not be normal.

If the valuation of to-day instead of January 1, 1892, had been taken, it is possible that all this business as a whole would have shown an absolute loss. I do not, however, consider the prices of to-day as normal, because they are unusually depressed from the uncertainty of the pending tariff legislation.

So far as general business is concerned, however, the year 1892 is reckoned as good as the year 1882, and the comparison of those two years would, in that view, appear to be a fair one.

Assuming this to be the case it is evident, from the figures of selling price at the two different periods, that these corporations, as a whole, have been paying out in dividends more money than they have earned during the past ten years, proper depreciation being taken into account.

But waiving this, as the average dividend paid, saying nothing about loss of value, was 3.87 per cent on the value of the stocks, it looks as though either these great corporations have been particularly unfortunate during the last ten years or that the profits of manufacturing are not so enormous that any substantial reduction in prices can be taken from them. The latter statement is undoubtedly the true one.

I have taken the average of industries, successful and otherwise, because with material at standard prices and labor at standard rates average results should be considered as a basis for argument rather than those exceptionally favorable or unfavorable.

Taking these averages as a basis, and taking into account also the facts that loans can be made on real estate even in New England at 4 to 5 per cent and that savings banks pay 4 per cent interest, it would seem that if manufacturing profit is to be reduced below present figures a large part, at least, of that business would go out of existence here.

But let us compare the manufacturing dividends of the last ten years with other dividends. I have taken for this purpose the dividends of sixty Massachusetts banks having an average capital of $52,755,000. The average dividend paid by these banks for the last ten years was 5.56 per cent on par or substantially 4.63 per cent on the average market value. This should be diminished by assessments paid to make up losses of $600,000 during the ten years, which is an average of $60,000 a year, or about one-tenth of 1 per cent. Deducting this would bring the average income of all this property for the ten years to 4.53 per cent.

Let us now take the railroads operating in New England, since in New England roads as a whole the stock represents money paid in, while in Western roads that is not always the case.

These roads (29 in number in 1882 and 36 in number in 1891) have an average capital of $126,530,600. The average dividends paid by them for the ten years was 4.88 per cent on par, or about 4.15 per cent on the selling price. Besides this, there have been extra dividends amounting to $2,079,020. Averaging this for ten years it comes to $207,902 a year, or about fourteen-hundredths of 1 per cent. Adding this to the amount divided would bring the average income of this railroad property for the ten years to 4.29 per cent.

The result of this comparison shows that the average investor in Massachusetts manufacturing stocks for the past ten years received 3.87 per cent per annum.

The average investor in Boston bank stocks has received an average of 4.53 per cent.

The average investor in New England railroad stocks has received an average of 4.29 per cent per annum.

It thus appears that for the last ten years either banking or railroading has been a better business for the investor than manufacturing; and that even under the circumstances existing before the present depression capital would not seek manufacturing, with all the advantage it might derive from the tariff, as readily as the other lines mentioned.

Now, following out my former argument, the average duties on goods similar to those manufactured by these companies are undoubtedly as high as the average of tariff duties on protected goods, which I understand to be about 50 per cent.

The annual production of these establishments, which embrace the cotton and woolen manufacture, bleacheries, belting, and machinery, is substantially the same as the amount of capital invested in these lines of business.

In the cotton manufacture, according to the last census, the entire annual product is only 76 per cent of the capital invested, but in the other lines the annual production would exceed it. The annual production, therefore, being substantially the same as the amount invested, any percentage taken from the selling price of goods must result in the same percentage of reduced profit or of actual loss on the invested capital unless the cost of production is also reduced.

Under these conditions, which indicate that a reduction of 5 per cent in competing lines would more than sweep away the entire profit of these establishments if no change were made in wages, it surely does not appear that the average manufacturer is a substantial beneficiary from the tariff, except so far as it is a benefit for him to invest his money at the ordinary rate of interest.

The benefit comes, first, to the country, from the diversification of industry, which everybody agrees is essential to a strong and prosperous people.

Daniel Webster put this great truth more forcibly than I can in his last protection speech, July 25, 1846:

> The interest of every laboring community requires diversity of occupations, pursuits, and objects of industry. The more that diversity is multiplied or extended the better. To diversify employment is to increase employment and to enhance wages. And, sir, take this great truth; place it on the title-page of every book of political economy intended for the use of the Government; put it in every farmer's almanac; let it be the heading of the column in every mechanic's magazine; proclaim it everywhere and make it a proverb, that where there is work for the hands of men there will be work for their teeth. Where there is employment there will be bread. It is a great blessing to the poor to have cheap food, but greater than that, prior to that, and of still higher value, is the blessing of being able to buy food by honest and respectable employment. Employment feeds and clothes and instructs. Employment gives health, sobriety, and morals. Constant employment and well-paid labor produce, in a country like ours, general prosperity, content, and cheerfulness. Thus happy have we seen the country. Thus happy may we long continue to see it.

In the second place the benefit comes to the mechanic and laborer, who have been enabled to receive wages far above those received by men engaged in similar occupations in other countries. If manufacturers are to receive interest at all—and there is no inducement for them to do business without it—any reduction of the tariff that renders necessary a reduction of prices of manufactured goods in this country must be met by reductions of wages to substantially the same amount.

The present disturbances in the manufacturing industries are a sufficient corroboration of my statements. Mills are stopped because a large part of the goods ordinarily produced are made in advance of orders for sale at certain seasons of the year. Now, no one but an idiot, or a wild enthusiast, would think of piling up goods, at present cost, when the selling price is to be reduced by act of Congress, and when it is still uncertain what selling price is to be fixed. Those receiving absolute orders can, and will undoubtedly fill them; but even such concerns must run from hand to mouth if they wish to avoid loss and failure.

The reductions of wages that have already commenced, and that are generally accepted by the laborers as a necessity, are simply a preparation for the coming change; and the amount of reduction necessary can only be fixed when the amount of tariff reduction to which the dominant party is pledged is definitely crystallized in the form of law.

Of course the changes proposed by the Ways and Means Committee of this House are embodied in the bill under consideration; and, although they are bad enough, it is evident that the proposed legislation is not the purely revenue tariff called for by the Chicago platform. For purposes of raising revenue, in fact, it is admittedly less valuable than the present McKinley bill.

For the measure of protection left the country should be thankful, and far be it from me to attempt to remove or lessen this protection by any accusation of inconsistency. It is better for you gentlemen on the other side of the House to be somewhat inconsistent than to pass legislation that would destroy instead of injure a large part of our industries, or reduce our wage level to that of England, instead of an average reduction of perhaps 25 per cent.

One thing, however, the country has a right to demand of you and the party that you represent, namely, that you shall yourselves respect the scale of duties you now propose for ten years, at least, if they are embodied in law.

Without this assurance business will be uncertain, new enterprises will be checked, and our prosperity will be retarded more than it would be under a worse tariff, that could be considered secure against further reduction.

There would be this advantage in absolute free trade, that after conditions were adjusted to it there could be no further depth to be sounded.

I shall be glad to hear all the assurances possible on this point, and feel sure that the entire business interests of the country, including importers and traders as well as manufacturers, will agree with me.

The change of duties proposed by the committee from specific to ad valorem means simply opening the door to fraud, and making the collection of all duties, either from a protective or revenue standpoint, uncertain.

Statesmen of both political parties have pointed out the evils and dangers of the ad valorem system in the past, but I will take time to quote only two.

In 1842 James Buchanan, on the floor of the Senate, said:

> I am not only opposed to any uniform scale of ad valorem duties, but to any and all ad valorem duties whatever, except where, from the nature of the article imported, it is not possible to subject it to a specific duty.

In 1846 Daniel Webster, presenting also an argument before the Senate, said:

> It has been the experience of this Government always that the ad valorem system is open to innumerable frauds. What is the case with England? In her notions favorable to free trade has she rushed madly into a scheme of ad valorem duties? Sir, the system of ad valorem duties is not free trade, but fraudulent trade.

On the authority of the financial column of the New York Mail and Express it appears that the experience of all other nations has induced them to levy specific rather than ad valorem duties.

According to this authority, "England has 38 duty items, all specific; France, 619, all specific; Austria-Hungary, 357, all specific; Russia, 440, all specific; Sweden, above 300, all specific; Norway, about 500, all but six specific; Spain, 369, all but one specific."

It thus appears that the Ways and Means Committee propose a plan of collecting revenue which is discredited by our former experience and by the practice of all other nations.

It would seem that neither a protective nor revenue tariff is aimed at, but a tariff for the benefit of the fraudulent importer.

Considering the bill as it is, I will not attempt to go through the schedules now, but hope to refer to several of them when they are considered later.

I will now simply say that the bill makes heavy reductions in the cotton, wool, iron, stone, jewelry, and other schedules in which my district, in common with many others, is greatly interested.

The manufacture of these articles in fact supports the larger part of the people I represent, directly or indirectly, as before said. The duties on all have been reduced, and on some, like cotton yarns and fine cotton and woolen goods, disproportionately reduced.

All these reductions of tariff mean reduction of wages and probable decrease in the development of industry.

In lines where the duties are to-day needed for protection, where foreign producers compete to-day under present duties, a lessening of duty will lower the wholesale price of foreign goods. This done, American prices must be lowered to correspond, or American producers go out of business.

I believe the former will be the alternative in most cases, though some weak concerns may fail or retire, and some industries may be destroyed by disproportionate reductions. The great mass of our industries are too firmly established, however, and on too large a scale, to be crushed out by the reductions proposed, or even by absolute free trade.

If the prices of our home products are lowered by act of Congress they must be produced cheaper if they are to be made here at all; and they are pretty certain to be cheapened in the way foreign goods are made cheap—by low wages.

Give the American manufacturer foreign wages, and he will fear no foreign competition.

It may be said that our workmen will not accept lower wages; that their unions will keep them up. To this I say that trade unions may keep up or raise wages when there is a profit made from hiring the labor they control; but there is no union—no government even—that can force men for any great length of time to carry on a losing business.

The inevitable will be recognized, and perhaps, after some friction, be submitted to; and business will go on, with the laborers permanently degraded, unless by the exercise of their right of suffrage they change the party in power and undo what is now being done.

Let it not be supposed either that the wages in these special trades will be lowered and other wages remain the same, or keep up the advance of recent years. To quote a motto of one of the labor organizations, "The injury of one is the injury of all;" and they will all be likely to learn the practical truth of this statement if free-trade legislation prevails.

All movements for shorter hours, or other ameliorations of the laborer's condition, would be stopped temporarily or permanently, and the hand of human progress be turned back on the dial.

Farmers and other alleged unprotected producers would lose by the lessened consumption of the wage-earners, and the consequent loss of market, quite as much as they would save in the lessened price of manufactured products, which after all might not be so much lessened at the retail store.

I have noticed that retail prices for such manufactured goods as are consumed by the masses are substantially as high in England as in this country, in spite of the present tariff. Witness cotton cloth, ready-made clothing, boots and shoes, and railway fares and freights, which is where the duty on steel rails and other articles entering into the construction or operations of railroads hits the people.

It may be said that even if the wages of our mechanics and operatives are reduced, or if, taking the other horn of the dilemma, many of them are thrown out of employment by the stoppage of factories, they ought not to find fault, since this present so-called tariff reform Administration was elected by their votes, or at least that it could not have been elected without them. It may be noticed, however, that they seem to have changed their minds quite largely at the recent election.

Well, gentlemen, if these men trusted you, do not betray them. You can better afford to disappoint the doctrinaires than the laboring men. If you could waive all legislation on this subject your lease of power might be a long one, while if these reductions are persisted in, and the result of lessened employment and lower wages continues and follows, as seems to me inevitable, your control of the Government will be short, and deservedly so.

My argument so far may seem to be made almost exclusively from the manufacturing or Eastern standpoint. This is natural, as I am a Representative of an Eastern district largely engaged in manufacturing. I wish, however, to call attention to the importance of New England as a customer for all the other sections of the country, and I can not do it better than by reading a quotation from a recent statement of Hon. William C. Lovering, of my State, before the Ways and Means Committee:

> It is not frequently considered how important to the country as a whole is the prosperity of New England and the full employment of its vast army of people engaged in manufactures.
> While there is no other section of the country so densely populated as New England, there is also no section which produces so small a proportion of the articles needed to support life and to carry on manufacture. With three-fourths of the spindles of the country, it produces not a pound of cotton, but consumes one-fifth of the cotton crop of the United States, and was thus a consumer of the South for this one article alone, in 1890, to the value of nearly $77,000,000. It grows less than 4 per cent of the wool grown in the country, but uses one-half of the total clip. It mines not a pound of coal, but uses not less than 10,000,000 tons yearly in its homes and factories.
> Of all articles of food for man and beast, it produces a sufficiency of hay and potatoes only, and is an annual customer of the West for not less than 3,000,000 barrels of flour. Manufacturing fully three-fourths of all the boots and shoes worn in the country, it is of necessity the purchaser of a very great proportion of the hides which are to be tanned into leather. Its beef and pork are not raised at home, but are imported from the West. It is dependent upon the Northwest and South for its supplies of lumber to build its houses and factories.
> In short, there is no other section of the country which is required by its lack of natural resources to draw upon other parts of the country for anything like so large a proportion of all that it must eat and wear and manufacture. In this respect it is even more startlingly dependent upon communities without itself than is Old England, which contains vast stores of iron and coal, and produces a very material part of its food, while New England is almost totally lacking in all these resources.
> The question is, whether it is desirable at this time to hazard the welfare of a community which, man for man, and family for family, consumes a larger part of all the products of the country than any other section.

As compared with Old England, New England is a far greater customer of the rest of this country per capita (the ratio being about 6 to 1), and figures that have been carefully prepared by Mr. Edward Stanwood indicate that her people, in spite of their smaller number, are larger buyers from the South and West than the people of England as a whole. Besides this, the injury or destruction of the New England market will not be compensated for to other Americans by a like increase of the foreign market, because most of the articles bought in New England principally from Americans are, and will continue to be, bought in Old England principally elsewhere. I refer particularly to iron, coal, wool, hides, salt, lumber, crockery and glassware, spirits, beer, and perishable food products.

Even for cotton and grain the New England market is secure for our countrymen, while England has other sources of supply, which she uses largely.

Further, as a New England Representative, I wish to say that I am not one of those protectionists that believes in protection for what he sells and free trade in what he buys. As a builder of machinery I believe that the producer of iron is as much entitled to protection as I am—in proportion to the disabilities under which he labors as compared to the foreign producer.

The same argument that sustains protection to woolens would give it to wool also, and the men who favor the one and not the other are, I fear, largely misled by selfishness, consciously or otherwise, and unenlightened selfishness at that.

Protectionists must stand together or fall separately.

I suppose this bill will pass as it is or amended in certain details.

There seems to be no way to settle this question for this generation, except by a trial of an alleged revenue tariff; and while I will not be responsible by my vote for bringing it about, I have no doubt of the result. The more of the free-trade principle there is in your bill, the more reason it will give when carried into effect for repudiating it and the party responsible for it.

As a partisan, therefore, I would say to my Democratic friends, pass your bill and take the consequences; but as a citizen, interested in the immediate prosperity of the country, as well as its future, I hope that wisdom will finally prevail in your councils, and the tariff be permitted to stand substantially as McKinley left it.

In closing, I desire to present the memorial of the Home Market Club, which represents the great mass of New England's industries, against the pending bill.

THE HOME MARKET CLUB'S MEMORIAL TO CONGRESS.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The undersigned, members of the Home Market Club, a national association organized under the general laws of Massachusetts, with office at Boston, for the promotion of American industries, the investigation of political science and the dissemination of correct ideas concerning the same, respectfully represent that as individuals we are largely engaged in the manufacture and distribution of merchandise, and it is roughly estimated that our business in the aggregate employs, in prosperous times, not less than 2,000,000 of people directly, and about as many more indirectly. Having this large stake in the economic policy of the country, we believe that our opinions should have some weight with Congress in its work of revising the tariff, though it is impossible to state all the reasons for them within the proper limits of a petition.

First. Let us say that we believe protection should be the settled policy of this country.

Second. That it should be national in scope and impartial in application, the true rule being to protect every important domestic industry that is subject to foreign competition.

Third. That while duties should be reasonable and occasionally readjusted to correct errors and meet economic changes, they should be sufficient for both revenue and protection.

Fourth. That the doctrine of Jefferson, which was indorsed by Madison, Monroe, and Jackson, that industrial independence is as necessary to our happiness as political independence, and that it can be secured and maintained only by a protective tariff, is as true to-day as it was in the time of those great founders and leaders of the Democratic party.

Fifth. That the experience of our own and all other enlightened countries proves that whether a tariff be partly for protection or for revenue only, duties should be, so far as possible, specific instead of ad valorem, and that the laws for their collection, while avoiding unnecessary inconvenience to honest importers, should be framed for the rigorous discouragement of frauds upon the revenue and domestic industry.

Sixth. That we see neither justice nor expediency in depriving the finished products of the farmer and the miner of protection and leaving a measure of protection, however inadequate, upon the finished products of the manufacturer.

Seventh. That even if it were in the power of Congress to obtain for American producers free access to all the markets of the world, in exchange for a freer admission of foreign goods to the home market, the gain would be small in comparison with the loss.

Eighth. That nearly all foreign markets are barred against us by protective tariffs, and Congress has no power to open them except by reciprocity, and every concession of duties without consideration throws away the bargaining power of the nation.

Ninth. That in fixing duties reference should be had to present conditions rather than to the rates in former tariffs, for it is well known that modern improvements have largely overcome the natural barriers that afforded protection in the earlier years of our history, so that in many cases a duty of 50 or even 100 per cent is less protective to-day than one of 30 per cent in the time of Washington, or even as late as the day of Polk.

Tenth. That duties should be sufficient to offset the higher cost of labor, plant, interest, and incidentals in this country over the cost of those items in competing countries.

Eleventh. That the danger of high duties is more fanciful than real, because competition is sure in a short time to bring the price of the protected commodity into a fair relation with the prices of all other articles. The duty is not added to the price except when we are dependent upon foreign supply, and in such cases it is a fundamental principle of the protective policy to abolish the duty unless its continuance affords reasonable assurance of the timely development of an adequate domestic supply.

Twelfth. That the benefits of protection are not limited to the employments to which they are applied, but when conferred upon all that are exposed to foreign competition they diffuse themselves by the sure working of economic laws equitably to all classes.

Thirteenth. That the profits of domestic manufacturers are not excessive. Statistics prove that in Massachusetts, where manufactures form the leading industry, their average profits are smaller than those of banking and transportation, though the risks are greater.

Fourteenth. That the United States set out to promote the happiness of the common people and declared this purpose in its fundamental law. It is beyond dispute that after a century of protection, prosperity is more universal here than in any other country. We believe this is chiefly due to the diversification of industries and the general employment of the people at high wages, which could not have occurred and can not be maintained without protection. Hence the tariff question has become almost wholly one of employment and wages, for under the free-trade system of Great Britain the customs revenue is as large per capita as that of the United States under the present tariff, and it would be easy to raise in this country as much by duties on imports as we raise now, without protecting a single domestic industry.

Fifteenth. That while in adjusting wages with our employés we are obliged to consider the rates of competitors whose goods are sold in the common market, we desire to pay all that the market will afford. Without claiming extraordinary consideration for humanity, we present the important business fact that the profit and stability of business depends upon the high purchasing power of the people. The more there is paid for labor, the more the wage-earners can buy, and the more efficient, as a rule, is their service. We shrink from the necessity of discharging old and trusted coworkers from employment or reducing their wages.

Sixteenth. That whatever change may be made, Congress ought to postpone the day of effect at least six months and in some cases at least one year from the date of passage, so that the ordinary courses of business may be as little interrupted as possible and opportunity may be afforded to conform to the new conditions of production and sale.

Seventeenth. That a bill, though professedly protective, which is accompanied by the declaration of its framers that it tends toward free trade and is designed to reach that goal, can not, in our judgment, restore confidence to business and revive industry beyond the small demand of immediate necessity. This tendency and purpose, therefore, are even worse than the pending bill, and as for the bill itself, we fully indorse the facts and arguments presented against it by the minority of the Committee on Ways and Means.

For these and many reasons pertaining to the intricacies of business, which can not be set forth here, but which we should be glad of an opportunity to explain to the appropriate committees of the Houses of Congress, we pray you to defeat the bill known as the Wilson tariff bill and to take more time for preparing a careful and scientific measure, by means of which the Treasury may be replenished and the depressed industries of the people may be revived.

Signed by the subcommittee appointed by the executive committee to prepare this memorial, at Boston, this 28th day of December, 1893.

[Mr. WEADOCK addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman, for the past thirty years the policy of the Government of this country has been American, and at no time until the advent of the present Administration has there been an opportunity for the party now in power to make the attempt to carry out its own peculiar doctrines in the establishment of policies or the management of the affairs of this country. During the past thirty years a broad, liberal spirit of patriotism has at all times pervaded governmental legislation, and the same spirit and disposition displayed by the hundreds of thousands of brave men who fought in the defense of the integrity of this nation during the war, and the same spirit of lofty self-abnegation which animated the families of those brave men has, ever since 1865, been manifest in the laws of this country in the protection they afford primarily to American labor and to the industries and development they have encouraged.

Under this wise system the inventive genius of the American people, always remarkable in fertility, has been stimulated and encouraged to a greater extent than has ever been the ingenuity of man before, and while labor-saving machinery has been invented, perfected, and adopted in all lines of manufacture during the past thirty years, so that one man, with the machinery he operates, performs the work that many men were required before to do, nevertheless such has been the increased demand for products that labor has not gone seeking employment, and under the stimulus of protection wages have constantly climbed the scale until never in the history of the world have laborers been housed, clothed, fed, and their children educated as have those who have been the wage-earners of the United States during the past three decades. Under this system wages have been increased wonderfully, and the burdens as well as the hours of actual labor have decreased correspondingly.

Since the beginning of this debate I have heard from out of the stores of wisdom from which the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, who is in our midst, seems to draw as his occasion demands an attempted statement in effect that our great national growth, wealth, and increase in wages paid to the laborer had all resulted from the fact that the United States was a new country of unparalleled resources, and that the natural development of these resources had brought about the condition of great prosperity the people have enjoyed. While possibly no other one country in the world contains so great a variety of climate and production from field, forest, mine, and waters as does the United States.

Yet probably nearly all of these conditions exist in European countries separated only from each other by political boundaries, where problems of overcoming long distances in no way interferes with exchange of commodities, and where no protective tariffs impose serious barriers to interchange; and if the theories of free trade in all their perfection as theories were truthful in application, the conditions surrounding labor and the masses of the people in European countries would have certainly shown some of the beneficial effects claimed for it in this country in wages, development, and surroundings.

Russia, within the boundaries of the home country and her possessions, contains inexhaustible natural wealth in the fertility of her soil, her mines, forests, and the waters that surround the empire of the Czars, yet the people of that great country have never been visited by the affliction of high wages, which the eloquent gentleman from Illinois, who addressed the House during the afternoon of the second day of this debate, so eloquently and feelingly pictured the laboring man of this country to be suffering from, and even in that country where harvests repay the husbandman for his efforts so abundantly, the most wasting famines that the children of men have ever suffered from are frequent, and want, squalor, and misery always abound even in agricultural districts. No one can truthfully say to-day that Russia is, in the development of her resources, an older country than the United States. Since the days of Peter the Great there has not been the advancement we have seen within our own borders in the past twenty years.

Can any sane man doubt that had the populations and governments of the two countries been exchanged twenty-five years ago that Russia to-day would not have been far in advance of her present position in wealth and advantages for her people? In other words, can any one doubt that if the policy which has prevailed in this country during these years, protecting the people in their industries and labor and encouraging them in the development of the natural wealth of the country, had been adopted by the Russian Government instead of its arbitrary and selfish sway, that Russia and her people would have been infinitely further along in the way of progress than that country is at the present time? And so, we might proceed by way of comparison through all the list of countries outside of our own and be forced to the conclusion in the end that the Government which has best protected its people and best encouraged progress along all desirable lines has been the Government of our own land during all the days since the rebellion.

It is not true that the great prosperity we have enjoyed has resulted to this country on account of the rapid development of extraordinary resources unaided by the policy of protection, nor would such unexampled prosperity have ever been known in this country but for the laws that have been so wisely enacted within the past thirty years. There have been but few demands suggested by our civilization which could not have been supplied out of the products of the United States easily and well during the past quarter of a century.

But now an evil day has befallen us. An Administration and a Congress unfriendly and hostile to the prosperity which has been the fruitage of successive Administrations of an opposing party is in power, and like a country occupied by an invading foe, and threatened with every evil incident to such occupation, our country is at a standstill. No one knows what acts of vandalism or injustice may be visited upon us. Business is everywhere paralyzed, even the hopes that prior to this change of Administration animated the hearts and faces of our citizens everywhere, has died out. To-day the American people are an apprehensive, disturbed, and well-nigh a hopeless people. All this change from a great and advancing prosperity to present adversity has come about since the country realized that the elements that attempted to destroy once before were in full power and again busy in the destruction of its industries.

I will not accuse you men of the South, who are in truth the Democratic party of this country—those claiming that name in the North being simply your allies—of an entirely deliberate intention to bring ruin to the very dregs, and a blight to the length of extinction upon all of the industries and opportunities for wage-earners that have been builded up almost entirely under the influence and by the hands that in the days of the sixties carried the muskets of the North in support of the old flag; but I do charge that you in the intoxication of power and the determination to perpetuate yourselves in office are now prepared and willing to lend yourselves to this process of destruction.

You have never been the brothers of toilers. You yourselves have never worked under the fierce sunlight with blistering backs and aching hands in a close communion with nature in the fields. Your hands were never taught to grasp the woodman's ax or send its shining blade to the heart of the trees of the forest; your arms have never wielded the hammers that beat into useful forms the iron and steel of this age; your backs have never borne the burdens of the physical and material progress of mankind.

Neither have your sympathies gone out to those who have toiled and labored, because you have not been of them. Men with darkened skins or occupation alien to your own in all ways have performed the labor of the States from whence you come.

All of your history and traditions exhibit you to the world as men having no contact whatever with the labor of the busy world or the laborer. And now, for the purpose of weakening and injuring the strength of the sections of the Union from which you can expect no permanent aid to the perpetuation of party rule, you would wreck the values of great accumulations, the result of the intelligent toil of the lives of countless thousands of American freemen in the North and West, heedless (if no harsher term is used) as to the suffering already preceding the act and the disgrace and infamy of the act itself; but in this you are no more than consistent with the character you bear in history.

It is said that exceptions prove the rule, and I would be unjust to myself if I should not willingly and cheerfully record my admiration for the character, liberality, and broad patriotism displayed by some of the noble men whose homes are in the South and who represent Democratic constituencies in this Congress, in both its branches. It is true that, like angel's visits, they may be few and far between, but notwithstanding that fact, they are a delight and the soul of a hope for better things in the hearts of their countrymen.

Of the great benefits that have resulted to this country from the policy of legislating in behalf of our own people and labor, instead of legislating in behalf of the subjects of foreign countries and governments not friendly to ours, one need but look upon a few of the demands that have grown up in the United States during the last thirty years and the industries here builded which have supplied those demands. In 1860 all the country west of the Mississippi River contained 4,236,746 inhabitants. The country lying east of the Mississippi River contained at the same time about 27,206,575 inhabitants. Cities containing 8,000 people or more in the region lying to the east of the great river contained at that time 4,783,090 inhabitants, and the cities of the same class to the west of that line about 289,166 inhabitants.

West of the Mississippi, in 1865, there were only 6,858.21 miles of railway and east thereof 26,137.45 miles of railway, and in this brief period of time, and all of that time under Republican rule, let me again remind you, the country has grown until in 1890 there were of American people residing on the prairies, along the streams and in the valleys, and everywhere between the surges of the Pacific and the Mississippi River, 15,774,557 inhabitants. Of this number about 2,800,462 people reside in cities of the class before mentioned.

For the purposes of transportation there has been builded over those prairies, along the rivers, and over the mountain ranges to the western ocean, 88,620.12 miles of railway, as against 6,858.21 miles in 1865. And now the country lying east of the river I have spoken of by way of division, is peopled by 46,847,693 American citizens. The population of the cities in the East containing 8,000 and over has increased since 1860 from 4,783,090 to 15,483,923 inhabitants in 1890, and 48,739.48 miles of railway transportation lines have been added to the 26,137.45 miles you possessed a quarter of a century ago. Twenty-five years ago there were very great supplies of timber within the eastern area.

The forests of Michigan, Wisconsin, and other States were no more than being fairly developed, and lumbering in Minnesota was only well under way. When you recall the enormous demand that our increase of population and building and improvements of all kinds has created during the period mentioned and that the United States possessed within her limits and is yet in possession of supplies sufficient to last many generations to come, all of the materials, including lumber and timber, out of which structures of all kinds have been completed both east and west of the Father of Waters, it will be readily admitted by every candid, unbiased judgment that the United States during the three decades past has been the greatest lumber and building material market the world has ever known or probably ever will know.

Under the protective policy adopted at about the inception of this marvelous increase of wealth and population, a policy was inaugurated for the purpose of putting into the pockets of our own people the money which should be expended for all of the materials out of which all the cities have been builded, as well as the homes and improvements upon the farms, along the railways and everywhere over this land. So it was that acts of our National Legislature said to the Canadas and other countries where great and cheaper forests have remained to this day comparatively untouched, we will first use the resources we have at home, and employ in the manufacture from these trees which have grown upon American soil, the labor of our own people in preference to employing the labor of your people upon your soil, and we will in this way encourage the ingenuity and industry of our own inventors and skilled mechanics in constructing constantly improving machinery to be used in the manufacture of this supply, thus keeping all the beneficial fruits of labor and development under the Stars and Stripes.

It is estimated conservatively that during these years the enormous sum of twenty-six to thirty billion dollars has been paid for the building material that has been put into construction. Will anyone tell me that this country would have been better off or its labor more justly treated or that her values would have been as great as they now are had this sum of twenty-five to thirty billion dollars been paid out for building material to the citizenship of Canada or other countries? The effect of our policy has been to retain this enormous sum within the United States, and it has been used by those who have earned it for the building of homes, the clothing of men, women, and children, the education of the young, the building of churches and the establishment of industries, and the bringing of intelligence, happiness, and appreciative contentment all over this land, until the United States has become the wonder and envy of the nations of the earth.

Other countries have been and are blessed with great natural resources of kinds largely similar to our own, as I have shown; but the policies of other governments has been different and their opportunities for prosperity have not been embraced as have ours, and it would seem that opportunities for comparison are abundant enough everywhere, and that the whole subject is not one difficult to be understood.

In my own State, of which I now speak by way of illustration, which contains about 69,994 square miles, lying between the forty-fifth and forty-ninth parallels of latitude, and the one hundred and seventeenth to the one hundred and twenty-fifth degrees of longitude, bounded on the north by the Straits of Fuca and British Columbia, and on the west by the Pacific Ocean, we possess almost every natural resource that all of the other States of the American Union possess combined; and it has been said with much truth that "you could build a Chinese wall around Washington, and the State will yield all that her inhabitants need, without contributions from the outer world." Nearly all of the area lying between the mountains of the Cascade Range and the ocean is naturally timbered land, and six and eight millions of feet of lumber are frequently cut from a quarter section of forest land in the Puget Sound Basin, instead of the one hundred and sixty to two hundred thousand feet that were often furnished by the same acreage of timber land in Wisconsin or Michigan.

Besides this great timber wealth, the first crop of nature upon a soil prolific in its fruit, vegetable, and cereal producing ability when cleared, the mineral wealth, consisting of gold, silver, copper, coal, iron, zinc, lime, and other minerals exist to such an extent as to make that section of our State richer by nature than any other area of the same extent that can be found in the world. Besides timber and the deposits of minerals, the most productive agricultural lands in certain lines known are found in the valleys and along the tide waters of Puget Sound, while perfect fruits of every kind save those of the citrous species are everywhere produced in every clearing with no care save the planting, and as if by nature. The hops raised in this section are noted the world over for their excellence.

In the waters of Puget Sound (where fifty to a hundred fathoms of water are under every ship's keel visiting us and the whole Sound is a harbor) and its tributaries, and the Straits of Fuca, in the Gulf of Georgia, and in the waters of the ocean off our coast we have a greater variety of food fishes than the waters of the Atlantic have at any time supplied. This supply and resource is inexhaustible, and no inclement weather makes the taking of this food supply either disagreeable or dangerous, as it ever has been in Atlantic winters.

The climate of the section of our State I have already spoken of is exceedingly equable, it scarcely ever in summer being warmer than 75 degrees, with the nights cooler, and the winters are practically snowless, never bringing zero weather. East of the Cascade Mountains and west of the Columbia River are valleys and table-lands with rolling prairies of most wonderful fertility. In many places these lands are being, and will eventually all be, irrigated—where irrigation is required—and most localities are now producing great yields of grasses, grains, vegetables, and fruits without the smallest possible interruption from dry weather or blight or injury from storm, so even and favorable is the climate of that section.

In the counties of Walla-Walla, Columbia, Garfield, Asotin, Whitman, Adams, Franklin, Lincoln, Spokane, and the Big Bend of the Columbia, and in many other portions of the State, is produced the finest wheat that is known to commerce as well as the best barley for malting and other purposes harvested from any land on the American continent. Besides grain growing in the section last mentioned, nutritious grasses and fruits are grown with great success. And no such thing as failure of crops has ever been known in the portion of the State naturally grain-growing, and no storms of violence have ever visited that country. And no country has ever been fuller of promise to home-seekers or of plenty to its inhabitants than has been the State of Washington. The sun has never shone upon a fairer land than that lying east and west of the Cascade Mountains in that State. Lying along the entire northern boundary of the State is the English province of British Columbia. In that province are forests equally great and heavily timbered, with as valuable timber as we possess in the State of Washington, and that province possesses in fact every resource we have in the States of Washington and Oregon, with the exception of the vast areas of our agricultural and fruit lands. Every mineral resource we possess is paralleled by another in British Columbia.

In that province timber lands can be purchased for from 40 to 60 per cent of the money charged for timber lands in Washington or Oregon, and coal and other mineral lands with the same proportionate difference, attributable entirely to the protective duties of the United States. Labor in British Columbia is paid much lower wages for from twelve to fourteen hours work than within any of the States on the Pacific coast for ten hours work. For instance, the scale of wages paid in sawmills at and about Vancouver, where the largest mills of British Columbia are located, are as follows: For head sawyers, $2.75 per day, while in the States on the Pacific coast sawyers are paid $4 per day; setters at Vancouver are paid $2.25 per day, while in the States adjoining they are paid $3.50 per day; edger men at Vancouver are paid $2.25 per day and in the States $3 per day; engineers at Vancouver are paid $2.50 per day, while in the States the same character of labor when employed is paid $3.50 per day; common laborers about the mills in Vancouver are paid $1.37½ per day, while on the other side of the line the same labor is paid $2 per day; and the same difference in wages is paid for coal production and in all labor-employing lines, and yet gentlemen have undertaken to say during this debate, in the light of all the facts before them, that wages in the British provinces are as high as they are in the United States. Every barrel of flour these men in British Columbia consume, every pound of meat they use, and nearly everything in fact they live upon, is shipped to them across the line from our Western States, after first paying a high protective duty to the Canadian government, so that living to-day in British Columbia is more expensive than in the United States, if they live as well as we do, and wages that are paid are much less.

Some one may ask why it is that the labor of British Columbia endures this condition when it might better itself by coming across the line. The facts are these: The white labor comes to British Columbia direct from the old countries, where even less wages are paid than the figures they are offered in British Columbia, and men coming from Great Britain to the province locate themselves among those with a history more in sympathy with their own than is the history of the people across the line, and there is that in the make-up of many of the laborers of Great Britain which kindles a respect and renewed attachment for the flag of that country when oceans separate them from the islands of their birth, and an English or Scotch laborer or mechanic when first coming to this continent almost without exception prefers life in a British province with smaller wages than he would receive if he labored on this side of the line.

Besides this fact is another one of still greater significance to our people, Chinese and Japanese cheap labor is employed in all of the mills, logging camps, mines, fisheries, and in every industry in British Columbia without stint, while in the State I represent in part such labor is not employed save to a slight extent as cooks and laundrymen, and somewhat in the canneries at the mouth of the Columbia River, and never will the intelligent white labor of my State submit to being placed in rank with this debasing and degenerating heathen labor of Asia, either by association in labor or wages.

The resources of British Columbia have been but little developed owing to the fact that they have not had access to the world's greatest market for the products of their forests or their mines, or the demand which as existed in the United States, as the figures I have heretofore given show beyond controversy. So that this province has done but very little in the way of supplying even the foreign demand upon our coast for lumber, and the same conditions exist as to all the other resources of our northern neighbor.

Now, then, the bill pending places logs, lumber, shingles, piling timber, hoop poles, and nearly every form of wood finished for some purpose as well as iron ore, copper, and in fact nearly everything of value we possess in nature on the free list. The annual cut of our sawmills is 3,000,000,000 of feet for foreign and coastwise shipment, and our shingle mills 4,000,000,000.

The States of Washington and Oregon, besides being near the injuring competition of British Columbia of which I have spoken, and that will surely follow the passage of this bill, are situated upon the Pacific Ocean and sailing vessels coming from all ports of the world are only too anxious on a voyage to our ports for the products of our country, to bring ballast of some value instead of earth or stone. By ballast of some value I mean something the result of cheaper labor and cheaper materials than we employ in this country, where such ballast will pay for the taking of it from the holds of ships.

The yield of wheat in the State of Washington for the year 1892 is placed conservatively at from twenty-five to thirty million bushels. The surplus, after our own demands have been supplied, finds its way over the various railway lines in the State to the seaboard, and is there shipped, as a rule, in English sailing vessels with registered tonnage varying all the way from 1,200 to 4,000 tons, and the finest vessels I have ever seen in American waters come into Puget Sound ports. Magnificent steel four-masted, square-rigged ships are the rule in the great wheat-carrying fleet visiting the Northern Pacific Ocean, and the English flag floats from nearly every masthead.

These foreign vessels on their voyage from foreign ports will bring to us as ballast Chinese, Japanese, Australian, and English coal, very much cheaper than coal can be taken from our own mines with the class of labor we there employ. And all these various coals are on the free list. They will also bring, as ballast, building brick, flooring and ornamental tiles, drainage pipe and all sorts of terra cotta, and all kinds of heavy and coarse articles manufactured from clay, under the diminished ad valorem duties proposed by this legislation, cheaper than our people can manufacture such products on account of the wages we are paying labor engaged in these occupations on the Pacific coast. Iron ore, copper, and several other minerals are free listed also by this bill and come to us in ballast in these ships, cheaper than our labor can produce them.

This bill strikes at the industries of the Pacific coast everywhere and directly. Our fruit-growers are hurt irreparably; our barley-raisers are left to the mercy of the cheaper farm labor and cheaper lands of Canada. Our lumbermen are driven out of the forests of Washington and Oregon; our miners of coal and iron must give up their occupation: our sawmills and shingle mills will be silent; our cities in the State of Washington, which have become so beautiful and prosperous and such scenes of bustling activity in manufacture of the materials we have, with the crowds of life and commerce upon street and wharf and at railway warehouse, must give up their hopes of growth, of commercial and manufacturing importance, and wait for the good day to come when Republican patriotism and the love of the United States and her people and industries shall again throw about the people of my State and the people of this Union the strength of protection, which has borne such glorious fruits to labor and the industries we have established. But while this waiting in patience is going on, industries will be established in British Columbia, with its cheaper labor and cheaper materials, to plague and harass us in foreign markets for many a long year to come.

What do you think will become of the men who are driven out of the forests, mines, factories, and mills in the United States by the passage of this law? What do you think will become of the agricultural classes of this country who are dependent upon the soil for their gains, and of the other countless thousands who have been deprived of employment by this law? Do you not think this will make them know that they are brought into direct competition with the classes now engaged in agricultural pursuits, and that they will be driven to tilling the soil for a subsistence in one way or another?

What will be the effect on wages and the prices of farm products when our agricultural classes are subjected to this competition and when the farms of the United States are shorn of their home markets as they will be by the turning out of employment of all the hundreds of thousands of these men, then unable to buy farm products out of the earnings they have always enjoyed? All this you say is for the purpose of cheapening some fabrics, or rather the foreign materials out of which such fabrics and articles are made, so that, as you profess, certain lines of goods may be bought cheaper in the United States than they have been under the laws enacted by an opposing party.

I might have spoken of other industries and business crippled by this unjust and unwise bill in my own State, but Representatives from Idaho, Montana, and Oregon are interested in sheep-raising and silver-bearing lead ores as well as the State of Washington, and these subjects will be treated in this debate by Mr. SWEET of Idaho, Mr. HARTMAN of Montana, and Messrs. ELLIS and HERMANN of Oregon, the able and conscientious Republican Representatives from those States.

In my State there are about a half a million of people, American by birth and citizenship, and as industrious, frugal, and intelligent a people as are found anywhere within the limits of the Union, who are wide awake to the natural resources of their chosen home, and full of appreciation of the bounteous gifts nature has showered upon that State, and they are also alive to the dangers that are threatened them in this measure. They have petitioned this Congress, and protested against the passage of this bill with all their might. You must remember that our industries have been built up under the guaranty of this country for protection, and under the law that has protected.

These men of my State have broken the virgin soil of Eastern Washington and have cultivated its rolling prairie lands all these years, and made for themselves and their families homes in that land of bounteous harvests. They have builded towns and cities in Eastern Washington, some of them in the midst of undulating prairies, and others where beautiful streams, fed by the snows of the mountains, rush whitening by over basaltic rock and boulder, turning the whirling wheels of the mills and machinery; and one of them, bearing the name of the "Spokanes," the beauty and pride of that inland empire, has been builded where the great volume of the waters of that river makes the descent of more than 300 feet in traversing a distance of a little more than a mile, by broken leaps down the rocky bed of that stream, furnishing water power equal to any in the world.

The men of my State have gone into the Puget Sound Basin and have there builded large cities and flourishing towns. They have builded sawmills that have cut a million feet of fir lumber in less than twenty-four hours with machinery for this purpose, which, under protection, has become as perfect for these uses as any machinery the hand of man has ever rested upon. They have built mills for the manufacture of shingles, and are engaged in the manufacture of wood finishings of all descriptions for modern buildings, and they are making furniture of perfect kinds for dwellings and business buildings. They have constructed flouring mills to supply the demand of their section of the country and to export to China and Japan, with capacities of 1,000 barrels a day. They have erected wharves and warehouses for the export of the grain from the fields of Eastern Washington and great bunkers for loading our coal into ships. They have opened the mines of our State, both east and west of the Cascade Mountains, and in all things and all ways, under the protection that has been guarantied them by the laws of their country, they have with long strides proceeded in the development of the natural resources of our State.

If one hundred or even ten of the citizens of my State had gone with their means to a foreign country and had the government of that country confiscated their property and destroyed their values, as you will confiscate and destroy the values and business of the 500,000 people in my State by this iniquitous bill should it become a law, the citizenship, army, and navy of this country would be at the command of this government at once to right such wrongs. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

And no one gives an answer in any way worthy of the intelligence of the American people, why this thing should be done or this gigantic wrong perpetrated. It is without excuse, and in violation of all lessons taught by experience. It blights all hope, and disregards the free and manly protests of labor. It defies the warnings of humane and careful employers of men. It denies bread and shelter to the formerly prosperous but now idle and poverty-stricken artisan and mechanic. The cries and distress of mothers, wives, and children are scoffed at and derided. Its originators and promoters are not laborers, and their hands have never borne the stain of honest toil in the fields, forests, mines, or workshops, but they are Democratic politicians with a tariff bill on their hands.

This country by reason of the advancing shadows of this measure in the past year has lost more capital, many, many times over than would have builded the Nicaragua Canal, thus shortening the distance between Puget Sound and New York nearly 11,000 miles and uniting forever the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans for the great good of mankind all over the earth, and a work of inestimable value and overwhelming importance to the United States, permitting the people of the Pacific Slope to land their products from the farms, vineyards, orchards and forests, mines and waters, in Liverpool within twenty days from the time of sailing.

Why will you not in common fairness respect and regard to some extent the intelligent protests and wishes of the people of that section, united as it is with the cries and demands from every city, farm, forge, factory, and hamlet all over the North and West, as well as the indignant objections that reach your ears from many, many places in the Southland. Give to this country the Nicaragua Canal, or assurances of its speedy completion, as wise and patriotic men have planned it, and as skillful engineers have demonstrated its practicability, uniting the oceans and giving the people of the East and West a cheapened means for transportation for their products not profitable for railways to handle over the long distance, and leave us the protection as wise, strengthening, and beneficent as the greatest of all parties has made it, and an "American" financial policy, recognizing American silver as it should be recognized, and we shall have a country within whose limits the problems affecting the weal of mankind for the future will be speedily worked out and more beneficially than elsewhere in the world.

We shall have a country then whose limits from east to west and north to south will be filled with prosperity among the people, the like of which the world has never known, and this prosperity will become the servitor of education and justice among men, the promoter of the arts and sciences and the encourager of invention. A man will then have reason to be proud indeed of being an American citizen by birth or adoption.

Other gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate have so thoroughly exhausted the figures and statistical information, showing, as I believe beyond doubt, the unwise and pernicious character of this attempted legislation, that I have not felt that good ends would be subserved by attempting to repeat such useful and necessary data. It is before the country in these speeches, and has been presented with much more ability than I could hope to equal, and consequently I have endeavored to confine myself to matters that have come under my own observation and with which I am personally familiar, well knowing that the people are the higher court in this country, and that they will speedily know the merit of service rendered and be ready to condemn the shifty expedients of the insincere and incompetent. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

During the delivery of the above remarks the time of Mr. DOOLITTLE expired.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. The committee must rise at half past 5 o'clock. The Chair has indulged the gentleman for forty-two minutes in order to take up the time, and the hour for taking the recess has now arrived.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I do not see how any great wrong will be done if the gentleman be permitted to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would not object if the committee had power to do it.

Mr. MARSH. The gentleman could have leave to proceed by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has no power to give unanimous consent. The House could extend the time, but the committee can not do it. The Chair asks the indulgence of the committee to state that the general debate has now closed, by order of the House as to day debate. There have been thirty-one hours and twenty-two minutes of debate during the daytime. The friends of the bill have consumed, as shown by the statement of the time clerk, fifteen hours and forty minutes, and those who are opposed to the bill have consumed fifteen hours and forty minutes—exactly the same time. The committee will now rise, under the order of the House.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROOKSHIRE] will discharge the duties of the Chair at the evening session; and now the House will take a recess until 8 o'clock, the evening session to be devoted to debate only on the pending bill.

And accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes) the House was declared in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 8 o'clock p. m., by Mr. BROOKSHIRE, as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is in session for the purpose of general debate only on the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, pursuant to the special order.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the tariff bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. WRIGHT of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chrirman, It is a fact generally admitted that the existing depression in the industrial and commercial affairs of the country is entirely due to want of confidence; it is equally true that this want of confidence is almost entirely caused by the proposed legislation embodied in this bill, which might more properly be entitled "A bill to reduce the wages of labor, to increase pauperism, and to disturb and harass the people."

It is said that this bill has been prepared in response to the voice of the people as indicated at the last Federal election, but now that it is ready and its effects are made apparent in advance, the people do not seem to be so anxious for a change. In this connection I am reminded of a letter which I received last summer from a merchant at Troy, Pa., in which he said:

A customer of mine brought his wool to town and sold it to-day. He came to my store and loitered about for a time, apparently much depressed; finally he said: "Well, I voted for free wool last fall, and I'll be d——d if I haven't just about got it."

So it is with many thousands; they voted for free wool and free trade, and now, when they are distressed and suffering, they find that they have "got it," but its reality is not what they anticipated in their desire for a change.

Theories are fine things and sophistry is often alluring, but hard facts and common sense often disprove them and are, to my mind, worth a thousand times more than both.

Until the election of 1892 prosperity was the rule, and labor was well paid, while capital well managed brought fair returns. We were, as a people, doing well and thriving under an industrial system of thirty years' trial which was constantly making us as a nation richer and stronger, while it brought increasing reward to the laborer. Not a man in the United States who could work and who would work need want for employment, but the party in power was displaced and a revolution in our laws under which we had developed a magnificent industrial system and prospered was decided upon. Even now we begin to see the preliminary results.

The entire industrial and commercial system of the country is demoralized; large numbers of operatives are out of employment and dependent on charity; the number of commercial failures is rapidly increasing; the building trades are at a standstill and the development of new enterprises has ceased. If the final outcome shall be the employment of more labor and better paid labor, I shall be happy to see it; but from my standpoint and in my opinion it seems that a very brief experience with "free trade revenue reform" will convince our people of the folly of taking the bread out of their own mouths to feed it to those on the other side of the ocean, that the foreigner may grow fat while our own citizens are starving.

The proposed bill does not make a new market for our manufactured goods or for our crude products to the extent of one dollar. Our manufactured goods must pay duty when they enter France or Germany, because this bill makes no provision for retaliation or reciprocity in any direction. It seems almost like the will of a man who bequeathed all his property and effects to clothe the poor heathen Hottentot and left his old invalid wife and helpless children destitute and starving.

A protective tariff serves a double purpose. It is the most effective agent for producing the necessary revenues for the support of the Government, while it furnishes the widest field of employment to our own labor at better wages than can be obtained under any other system; it promotes industrial activity, thereby increasing competition, which prevents monopolies and keeps fair prices for all.

As a nation we have absolute interstate free trade throughout the entire length and breadth of our national domain. As a nation we now under existing laws offer to trade on reciprocal terms with other nations who are in a position to meet us on a fair basis.

This is the best condition. If our manufacturers are producing in excess of domestic requirements they must adjust themselves to the inexorable law of supply and demand. It will not help them to open our domestic market to the world's factories, nor will it open the world's markets to them, and if it did they would prove a poor return for the loss of our own. Our manufacturers understand this very well and know that they can only meet the world's competition by scaling wages to what is paid by their foreign competitors. Of course free trade in merchandise would be illogical without free trade in men. If our gates are to swing open for the products of the foreign artisan's labor, it is but fair to presume that they will open as freely for the artisan himself.

It appears to me that the gentlemen on the other side of the House have decided to ignore the well-being of a majority of the people for the purpose of using a supposed party advantage to enable them to experiment with a political dogma. They have caused it to be stated on the floor of this House that this is a "political bill." They must be acting on the assumption that the people are very stupid and slow to anger. This is an error into which, as a partisan, I have no objection to see them fall, knowing that the consequences will in the end be fatal to their party, but I am alarmed at the suffering and general disaster that must inevitably occur before the evil results of the measure they now propose are cured and normal conditions restored.

The history of the protective policy in the United States comprises the essence of all that is peculiar and distinctive in the history of this country, from colonial to the present time.

The history of colonial times shows that the grand object, the impelling necessity, for the formation of the Federal Government in 1789 was to obtain a power for the protection of the commercial rights of the people; in accordance with this design, the earliest action of the new government was upon the question of forming and establishing a protective system. The bill, or act, which was the great object of the Federal Constitution, on motion of Mr. Madison, the father of that instrument, was presented promptly under the following preamble:

Whereas it is necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and for the encouragement and procection of manufactures, that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported, be it enacted, etc.

And after having been passed, was signed by President Washington, the 4th of July, 1789.

The same necessity which begat the Revolution was the parent of the Federal Constitution and of this law—this law, or its policy, established and secured, being the end of all.

The principles of protection to domestic industry were prominently and forcibly urged upon Congress by Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and J. Q. Adams. Andrew Jackson, in his second annual message to Congress, December 7, 1830, confirms this action of his predecessors, and clearly explains the constitutional right to so adjust duties on imports as to afford protection to and promote development of the domestic industries. In that message President Jackson said:

The power to impose duties on imports originally belonged to the several States. The right to adjust these duties with a view to the encouragement of domestic branches of industry is so completely identical with that power that it is difficult to suppose the existence of the one without the other. The States have delegated their whole authority over imports to the Federal Government without limitation or restriction, saving the very inconsiderable restriction relating to their inspection laws. This authority having thus entirely passed from the States, the right to exercise it for the purpose of protection does not exist in them; and consequently if it be not possessed by the General Government it must be extinct. Our political system would thus present the anomaly of a people stripped of the right to foster their own industry and to counteract the most selfish and destructive policy which might be adopted by foreign nations. This surely can not be the case; this indispensable power thus surrendered by the States must be within the scope of the authority on the subject expressly delegated to Congress.

In this conclusion I am confirmed as well by the opinions of Presidents Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, who have each repeatedly recommended the exercise of this right under the Constitution, as by the uniform practice of Congress, the continued acquiescence of the States, and the general understanding of the people.

The advocates of the so-called Wilson bill make the following claims in behalf of the proposed measure:

First. It will so enlarge our markets that the manufacturer can do a larger and more profitable business.

Second. That it will give employment to more labor.

Third. That it will give higher wages to the individual operative.

How all these benefits can result from the passage of this bill is something no one has yet been able to explain to me, and until I receive some better explanation than has yet been advanced on the subject I shall look upon the above claim very much as I do upon that of the empiric who has a compound to cure every ill to which humanity is subject; and any person advocating such physical impossibilities is, in my judgment, a fit candidate and fully qualified for membership in the St. Ananias Club.

It is a well-known fact that nearly every town and city has a board of trade, organized for the open and avowed purpose of inducing manufacturing establishments to locate in their respective communities, and to secure this result offer not only free land, but free buildings, free rent, and generally a bonus in cash. The majority of these boards of trade are as often composed of Democrats as Republicans, and in their efforts to secure for their own localities the benefits accompanying the establishment of such industries in their midst are quite as zealous as Republicans; and in this line of effort I have never known politics to cut any figure. The reason openly assigned for all this effort and expenditure is not that the manufacturer himself may be enriched, but that more employment may be given to labor in their midst. And in fact, this employment of labor, and its resulting benefit to the community, is the only reason assigned and the only end in view. Not only is the town itself benefited, but every person engaged in agricultural pursuits within miles takes equal interest with those therein residing.

Now, if in a given locality, through this practical form of indirect protection, the erection of an industrial establishment, and the employment thereby given to labor is a benefit to that locality, why, on the same grounds, should not the country as a whole be entitled to receive the same benefits as against foreign countries that this local system would give to the individual town as against those surrounding it? If encouragement to local manufactories is advocated by Democratic boards of trade, why should the same Democrats oppose encouraging a system which indisputably does build up the material wealth of our whole country? This, Mr. Chairman, is Democratic consistency!

The chief disadvantages with which the American employer contends is the greater cost of money and labor—in other words, of labor itself—in this country as compared with its price in foreign parts. It is the difference between the freedom and the bondage price of labor. This difference affects capital, as well as labor, in the same manner and degree; for all capital is the product of labor, the cost of which must necessarily be graduated by the price of labor. By the rights or institution of property, as secured by every civilized society, capital or property, when acquired by industry and prudence, comes to occupy the position of the employer of labor, in order that labor in its turn, enjoying a freedom price under adequate protection, may rise to the same condition by the same means.

This is the American wheel of fortune, free to all. It is what we have fought for, and are bound to maintain.

It would be hard, indeed, that labor, which, when applied, produces all the means of enjoyment in civilized society, should never itself be able to come to such enjoyment. The very design of American society is to keep open these chances which European society, as a general rule, forever bars. Since capital is nothing more nor less than labor in another form or state, it follows that it must have cost in proportion to the price of labor that produced it, and that it can not be employed in the same ways as foreign capital which has cost only half as much without protection; it is also evident that the protection of this capital is the protection of labor itself, not only because it is labor in another form as being its product, but because it can not employ labor in these ways without protection so that the interests of the employer and the employé are strictly mutual in their necessity for adequate protection.

This tariff question is not merely a question of party politics with me, because it deeply affects the prosperity not only of my constituents, but of the great body of the people. I know that upon it depends the interests and the happiness of the bone and sinew of the country. While I do not pretend to an intimate acquaintance with its complexities, nor an ability to sound its uttermost depths, yet it is evident to me that the Democratic party is consistent with the entire recent history of its actions on this question in one thing, and that is to belittle the breadwinner and cheapen the price of his labor. It has by its actions confirmed the statements of a former Democratic leader (Gen. McDuffie, in 1832, Debates of Congress, page 3827), who said on the floor of this House that the natural price of the manufacturing labor of the United States is precisely the same as that of other countries, and not a cent more.

The effect of the proposed law will not directly reach a large part of the late Confederate States of America, for the reason that, with few manufactories there established, they expect to exchange their cotton for a little larger than usual return of manufactured goods from English and continental workshops; hence I can easily account for the free-trade proclivities of the cotton States.

The clause in the constitution of the late Confederate States of America, which provided for practical free trade as a constitutional right and fundamental law, was placed there by the same sentiment and belief in its righteousness that exists among those who to-day represent that same section of the country in Congress, and who constitute not only the majority of their party representatives on the most important committees, but who absolutely control the action of these committees and the legislation of the country and the policy of their party.

We are told by the advocates of free trade revenue tariff that the tariff is a tax, and therefore should be reduced and destroyed. I shall not now take time to argue whether the tariff is a tax paid by the consumer or by the foreign manufacturer; but even if I should admit, for the sake of argument, that tariff taxes are paid by the consumer, I would say that the Government requires a revenue from some source of several hundreds of millions per annum, and this revenue must either come from duties on imports or from an internal tax; it can be nothing more than a tax, be it paid in either way, and I believe the former way the best.

Then, as to the needs of the Government, what easier or more equitable mode of securing revenue than by a duty on foreign manufactures which compete with similar manufactures here, large enough to permit the operation of our own institutions by covering the full difference between the cost of labor in this and foreign countries.

NO NECESSITY FOR ANY CHANGE.

There is no necessity for a change. Such a change as this bill involves must upset all business for a long time, no matter what the final outcome. The drain of gold caused by increasing purchases from foreign countries will cause a worse financial effect than was last summer experienced and which this Democratic Administration claim was produced by the late Government purchases of silver bullion.

It will close our mills and workshops; it will throw out of employment our mechanics and operatives who have been earning good wages with which they have purchased freely the products of the soil; they have thus not only prospered themselves, but have brought prosperity to their localities and to those engaged in other pursuits. It will disturb existing industrial, commercial, and financial conditions and put us back half a century in material progress. It will close the iron mines, the coal mines, and remove the source of employment now afforded by their transportation.

It will not open to us any foreign markets for our goods or products, but will give to foreign manufacturers a monopoly of our trade. "Charity should begin at home"; yet our lawmakers propose to exercise that greatest of all virtues for the benefit of foreigners, and, meanwhile, to let our own citizens starve through lack of employment.

It will be the inauguration of a period when no laborer can provide education or any of life's comforts for his family, and when father and mother and children must drudge every day as their competitors in the labor market of the Old World are forced to do, or in lieu of such drudgery must starve or go to the poorhouse.

Advocates of this bill claim that it will reduce the tariff income of this country some $75,000,000 per annum on the basis of present importations, but that one-half of this falling off in revenue will be made up by the largely increased importations which will surely be made in consequence.

This claim is, no doubt, partially correct; but if so, and on an average duty of about 20 per cent ad valorem the sum of $35,000,000 is raised by increased importations of such goods, there must be an aggregate of $175,000,000 of said goods imported more than at present; and as this increased importation of foreign manufactures must and will displace an equal amount of the same goods now manufactured in this country, it is a self-evident fact that our factories and industrial establishments must curtail their product to the full extent of said increased importations, and at least 100,000 operatives, laborers, and mechanics now engaged in manufacturing will be thrown out of employment.

If this will tend to make our country prosperous, then my ideas of political economy are based upon false premises. It has all ways been my belief that two bodies could not occupy the same space at the same time; that we could not eat our pie and keep it, too. To me it seems an axiom that we can not manufacture our goods and at the same time buy the same goods abroad. And if we manufacture them here we can not import them, while if we import them we can not and will not manufacture them here, and the result of the latter condition will be lack of employment for labor; the mechanic and laborer of to-day must either take up a tract of land and compete with the farmer or else emigrate to the Old World, there to perform the labor of manufacturing the same goods he formerly did here, but at a new and much lower scale of wages. There is only one way of escaping this result, and that is by accepting the same rate of wages here that are paid abroad and by beginning a new industrial era with cheap labor as its foundation.

If the laborers of the United States will be content with such an outcome I am greatly mistaken.

Why our lawmakers should devote themselves, their time, and ingenuity toward inventing some mode or scheme of building up factories and workshops in Great Britain and the Continent, and as an absolute necessity and inevitable result destroy a corresponding amount of our home industries, is beyond my power to comprehend.

It is argued by the friends of free trade that no tariff affects the wages of the bricklayer, the house carpenter, and those who work on our lines of railroads, etc.; but I would ask how long could the bricklayer, the carpenter, the railroad mechanic, or the laborer retain his present rate of wages should those now employed in other manufactures be permanently thrown out of employment?

In the first place, there would be less work for the house-builder, because no new homes would be needed; and less demand for employment of the railroad workmen because, the coal and ores now carried to the mills to make the finished product would be transported on English and continental lines, and the transportation lines of this country would simply get the distribution of the goods from the seaboard. Simultaneously with this decreased demand for labor would come a struggle by those thrown out of industrial pursuits, by reason of the ruin of the business they were engaged in, for any employment whatever that would keep them from starvation. The result will be that labor in this country will fall to the same commercial value as in foreign countries.

Take any possible view of the situation, and it is plain that on the laborer of this country will fall the chief loss which will result from the operations of this bill. It will be a serious and a disastrous experience for which this legislation will become responsible.

Last spring I had a conversation with a former member of Congress, now officially near to the head of one of the Departments of government, in which I said, "How is it that you, who at one time, and not long ago, believed and advocated on the floor of the House the same principles as did the late Samuel J. Randall, have become a blind follower of 'free trade revenue reform'?" He replied that he had studied the question, and his reason told him he was formerly wrong, but he now was sincere in his present belief. I asked him if he did not fear the terrible results of a trial of his theory in his own State, which is largely devoted to manufacturing. I spoke of the largest cities in the State and asked what would become of the thousands of factories and industrial enterprises in those cities if his present ideas of tariff were put in force, and if such action would not injure his own party. His reply was, "The manufacturer is the man the Democratic party has to fight in my State, and year by year these manufacturers, who are almost all Republicans, help to carry on a fight against my party, and from them we get no aid. If they were all legislated out of business, the loss would be to the Republican party, not to the Democratic, as but few of them are Democrats." "Very well," I replied. "Suppose you do ruin or drive these manufacturers, even if they be Republicans, out of business; will not the laborer in those factories ultimately be the greatest sufferer?" He replied that no doubt labor would suffer and that want of employment would result; but added, "It's a case where great suffering must come, but it's like a man with an immense carbuncle on the back of his neck, and, although the agony will be intense, yet the surgeon's knife must relentlessly cut out the carbuncle, roots and all, that the man may be free therefrom." I could only reply that his theory and his illustration were plain enough to understand, but that in every such case the man would not survive the operation, and a live man with a carbuncle was better than a dead man without. In the same interview I asked him if he did not think that the proposed pension policy would hurt his party, and he replied, "No; because practically all the pensioners are Republicans anyway, and the Democratic party has nothing to gain by liberality in that direction."

I only mention this matter to show the indifference to results displayed by Democratic leaders, providing its principal injury falls upon the man who votes the Republican ticket. But I prophesy that when this free trade revenue tariff scheme for political purposes has ruined the labor interests, Democrats and Republicans alike, the party which causes the ruin will learn by something more tangible than sophistry and theory that it was not good American policy to build up foreign manufactures at the ruin of our own.

We hear so much of the immense profits of the manufacturer. In exceptional cases I acknowledge that for a brief time certain factories have made large profits, but in every case competition has soon brought the profits down to so low a point that only those most advantageously situated and who have best managed their business have survived or continued the same.

Where is the woolen manufacturer who has made a fortune in many years? I think they will be few and far apart, and the same is the case in most all our industries. The laborer had employment at good wages until the elections of 1892 were understood to be a verdict for free trade. Then the manufacturer began curtailing production and working off his stock in preparation for the execution of the sentence, and to-day we see only the beginning of the result in the thousands of unemployed and the many more who will be unemployed until they will accept the wages current abroad, where the dominant party proposes that our goods shall be made.

It is argued by advocates of this bill that our present depression can not be ascribed to the results of the election of 1892 because we are yet governed by the McKinley protective tariff, and that the Democratic party has as yet not put in force any of its promised tariff reforms. They argue that having done nothing yet, why should manufacturers abandon or curtail their business while a protective tariff stands on our statute books and is the law of the land? They say, "We have done nothing yet, so why do manufacturers get scared before they are hurt," and they go to the laborer and tell him all this as proof that protection does not protect labor, and that labor meets all this suffering while a protective tariff is in full force.

Well, if any one of the gentlemen who talk this stuff was condemned to be executed on, or even about, a certain day, I suppose he would be cheerful and happy until the sentence had been carried out, on the ground and for the reason that "nothing had been done to him yet." It is my opinion that in such a predicament the person condemned would use every effort to escape the execution of the sentence, even if he did have to sacrifice much of his worldly possessions.

And so the manufacturer who knows that the party in control of making and executing laws has decided to destroy his business as soon as it could put the machinery of legislation into motion, like the man condemned to death tries to get out of his predicament just as fast and as far as is in his power, and he is a wise man who does thus prepare for the storm. A sailor at sea, when a storm is approaching, or even when the barometer indicates its approach, although he may be assured of a brief continuance of clear sailing, yet he would be criminally negligent should he not reef sail and prepare for the worst. Thus, if one of the gentlemen who are now crying, "Why, we have done nothing yet," was captain of that vessel and I should ask him why he took in sail and prepared for a storm because it "had done no damage yet," I am quite sure he would be justified in thinking of me as I do to-day of him when he tries to prove that "having done nothing yet," the manufacturer should not prepare for the ruin which is proposed to be dealt out to him. Yet if only the capitalist and the manufacturer were to suffer it would not be so bad, but this verdict of "death to American industries" means distress, want, and destitution to millions of laborers who will not be able to save anything from the general wreck.

THE BENEFITS OF TARIFF PROTECTION TO FARMERS.

By the operations of this bill the farmers are to be deprived of protection and the revenues of the Government will be reduced more than $15,000,000 annually of duties now collected on agricultural products, that being the difference between what is now collected and what will be paid should this bill become a law.

This loss of revenue is divided as follows:

Wool	$8,000,000
Tobacco	2,500,000
Other products	5,000,000
Total	15,500,000

The history of tariff debate shows that the advocates of free trade and of its counterpart, "tariff for revenue only," have always admitted the great benefits resulting to the farmer from a protective system which has created industries supporting millions of persons who are consumers of farm products at the highest prices. This bill will take our home market from us and give it to the foreigner, and will throw into agricultural pursuits those who are now the best customers of the farmer. It will affect the farmers living in proximity to manufacturing towns, who have had a steady market for all their garden produce and vegetables, most of which will not bear transportation to Europe.

What will become of the truck-farming industry if it loses the trade of manufacturing cities and has to depend entirely on the patronage of New York and other distributing depots of imported goods?

Truck farming has attained great proportions and enables a diversification of product which is a necessity to profitable farming. It is distinct from market gardening; the former is carried on at a distance from market, water and rail transportation being necessary, while the latter is conducted near local markets, the grower of vegetables using his own team for transporting his products direct to either the retailer or consumer.

A summary of the number of acres under cultivation for truck-farming purposes and the value of products raised, given by districts, as shown by census reports, is herewith appended:

Districts.	Acres.	Value of products.	Districts.	Acres.	Value of products.
New England	6,838	$3,184,218	Southwest	36,889	$4,979,783
New York and Philadelphia	108,135	21,102,521	Central	107,414	15,432,223
Peninsular	25,714	2,413,648	Northwest	1,083	204,791
Norfolk	45,375	4,092,859	Mountain	3,833	531,976
Baltimore	37,181	3,784,696	Pacific coast	14,357	2,024,345
South Atlantic	111,441	13,183,516	Total	534,440	76,517,155
Mississippi Valley	36,180	4,982,579

Upward of $100,000,000 are invested in this industry, the annual products reaching a value of $76,517,155 on the farms after paying freights and commissions, realized upon 534,440 acres of land. There are employed in this industry 216,765 men, 9,254 women, and 14,874 children, aided by 75,866 horses and mules, and $8,971,206.70 worth of implements.

SURPLUS FARM PRODUCTS.

The principal agricultural products of which we now produce a surplus are cotton, tobacco, and wheat.

In the old days the cotton-planters were the champions of free trade because they could produce the crop by slave labor and exchange it readily for foreign manufactures. But the new generation in the South is learning that it is better not to depend solely on the raising of cotton year after year, and that the development of manufactures in their midst will give them a home market for diversified crops and enable them to gain their freedom from the dictation of the cotton factor and his satellites, the local merchants.

We are now manufacturing about one-third of our production of cotton, there being 904 mills, of which 239 are located in the Southern States. The cotton manufacture is in a healthy condition, exporting its product to the value of about $3,000,000 annually, and the number of Southern mills will continue to increase if properly encouraged. Is the policy of this bill calculated to do this? I think not.

Our mills now consume $117,392,576 worth of cotton and turn out $267,981,724 worth of product. The difference of $150,000,000 between the two amounts is nearly all wages, which are expended in this country.

TOBACCO.

The Wilson bill plays havoc with our Northern tobacco-growers, reducing the duty on wrappers from $2 to $1 per pound, while on other leaf the tariff is untouched. Why this vicious stab is made at the people of my section I am at a loss to understand, since a large proportion of them are loyal adherents to the Democratic party, but I do know that it will kill the industry.

The result of the law of 1890 on the production of tobacco in the United States has been great prosperity to the tobacco farmers.

About 25 per cent of the crop is suitable for wrappers and now brings a fair price; prior to 1890 the farmer was obliged to sell it as fillers at a less price.

WHEAT.

Viewing the world's wheat-producing area and its markets, we find that India, Australia, Eastern Europe, and Canada, raise a surplus of wheat which they produce at a much lower labor cost than ours. The market for all this surplus wheat is comparatively limited averaging an annual demand of about 200,000,000 bushels. With such a competition for this limited foreign market it behooves our wheat producers to diversify their products and develop the home market which will enable this, because the farmer gets his share of every dollar of wages paid out by the manufacturer.

LOCAL MANUFACTURES MAKE GOOD PRICES FOR FARM PRODUCTS.

The average price of such staple products as corn, wheat, rye, oats, barley, potatoes, and hay is much higher in States largely engaged in manufactures than in those principally devoted to agriculture. The extension of manufactures has been of inestimable benefit to the farmer, and there can be no doubt that the decrease of manufactures will be of corresponding injury.

WHAT THE WILSON BILL DOES FOR THE FARMER.

Now, let us see how the direct action of the Wilson bill is to benefit the farmer.

In 1889 the duty on horses was 20 per cent ad valorem, and there were 48,784 horses imported as compared with 2,263 exported. Most of these horses came from Canada and paid a tax of about $9 on a value of about $45 per head. The McKinley bill made the duty a specific one of $30 per head on horses valued at less than $150, while those valued at $150 or more paid an ad valorem duty of 30 per cent.

The result was that in 1892 we imported only 10,762 horses and our own stock-raisers furnished the difference of 38,022 horses, valued at more than $1,000,000. Why need we go to Canada for horses? The last census shows that we have 15,000,000 in this country and that we are raising them at the rate of 2,000,000 annually, of which 60,000 are foaled in the State of Pennsylvania. The Wilson bill, however, restores the old duty and the American horse must give way to the Canadian stock.

Previous to the passage of the McKinley bill there were about 90,000 head of beef cattle imported annually which paid a duty of $2 per head. The present duty is $10 per head, and the average importations since 1890 have been about 2,000 head annually. The Wilson bill practically restores the old duty, since it puts all live animals in at a uniform ad valorem duty of 20 per cent; when these animals arrive at the international boundary under the operation of this ad valorem feature it is found that their cost is abnormally low, so low that what little duty is collected will necessarily have to be disbursed by the Government in the support of an army of customs officials to ferret out and prevent frauds.

Previous to 1890 we imported from Canada about 11,000,000 bushels of barley and malt annually, which paid a tax of 10 cents per bushel. The McKinley bill raised this to 30 cents per bushel, and the importation fell off from over 11,000,000 bushels in 1889 to about 3,000,000 bushels in 1891, a gain to our farmers of about $6,000,000, for, I take it, the brewers have used just as much barley all the time, and appear to be making money. Why is it necessary, in a bill to raise revenue for the Government, to make such radical reductions in the materials for malt liquors? The Wilson bill reduces the tariff on hops from 15 cents to 8 cents per pound, when this country can raise all the hops the world requires. In 1889 we imported 4,176,158 pounds of hops, but the McKinley bill reduced this to 2,506,224 pounds in 1892, and our hop-growers were correspondingly benefited.

In 1889 we imported about 900,000 bushels of potatoes, which paid a tax of 15 cents a bushel. The McKinley bill raised this tax to 25 cents, and the average annual imports since have been 175,000 bushels. The Wilson bill restores the old duty.

And so I might go on with every item of farm products, all receiving ample protection under the McKinley bill, but some of which are now to be put back to less than the rates which preceded the passage of that bill, while many are transferred to the free list.

It is absolutely impossible to show that the cost to the consumer of any of these products has been increased by the amount of the McKinley tax, but its effect has been to check importations and thereby enable our farmers to supply these products at such prices as their local competition and conditions enabled them to get.

Nor is the protection afforded by the existing law restricted to the products of the Eastern States, but its provisions have been made to cover the farm products peculiar to the South and to the Pacific Slope. Has anyone discovered that he is paying more for food since 1890 than he did before? Presumably it is with the expectation of making food cheaper that these reductions are made in this proposed reform tariff on farm products, but what is the use of placing cheap food before our mechanics if we take away from them the ability to earn the means to buy it?

HOW IT WILL HELP CANADA.

The Canadian government not only imposes duties on all agricultural products imported from the United States, such as 30 per cent on cattle, sheep, and other animals, 2 cents a pound on hogs, 75 cents a barrel on flour, 4 cents a pound on butter, 3 cents a pound on cheese, 5 cents a dozen on eggs, 15 cents a bushel on potatoes, 40 cents a bushel on apples, and so on, but it imposes heavy duties on all manufactured products and then pays a bounty on many things produced in Canada.

The Wilson bill not only admits the agricultural products of Canada into the United States free of duty, but it also reduces the duty on Canadian manufactures far below that imposed by Canada upon American goods. The Dominion government gives a bounty of $2 upon every ton of iron manufactured in Canada. Under the Wilson bill the duty on pig iron will be equal to about $1.60 a ton. With the Canadian government paying a bounty of $2, it will be seen that the Canadian producers can pay the tariff on this side and still have 40 cents left.

When their lower rate of wages is taken into consideration, it will be seen what a fine field the Wilson bill is opening in the United States to the Canadian iron manufacturers, as well as for the Canadian farmers.

The Wilson bill puts agricultural machinery on the free list, whereas the Canadian government imposes a heavy duty on it. This duty is so high as to be absolutely prohibitory, and no American agricultural implements are sent to Canada. Since 1890 the manufacture of reapers, mowers, etc., in Canada has been in the hands of the powerful and energetic combination which has pushed its business with much success in Europe and South America and which has undersold American manufacturers even in this country in spite of the present tariff.

This Canadian combination has certain decided advantages. Labor is from 20 to 33 per cent cheaper in Canada than it is in the United States for workers engaged in the production of this machinery.

The McKinley bill reduced the tariff on pine lumber from $2 to $1 per 1,000 feet, but left the duty on spruce lumber at $2 and the duty on hemlock at $1. All lumber is made free by the Wilson bill, and we thus propose to annually present the Canadians with over $1,000,000, the amount of duty which we are now collecting annually on importations of their lumber. No one acquainted with the subject can suppose for an instant that lumber will be cheaper by the smallest amount, but the remission of duty will at once accrue to the value of the stumpage, which is all owned and controlled by the Canadian Government.

It is indeed no wonder that Canadian statesmen are boasting that they get more by this bill than they could hope to get by the most favorable reciprocity treaty, and this without the surrender of a single advantage on their part. While the Democrats pretend to denounce trusts, agricultural machinery is to be put on the free list for the benefit of a Canadian combination which is to all intents and purposes a trust, but which can not be reached by American antitrust laws, even if we had a Democratic Attorney-General not disposed to nullify those laws.

The Wilson bill proposes to open the United States market free to the Canadian manufacturer, while the Canadian market will remain closed to the American. The only way that this competition can be met will be by scaling down wages.

EFFECT OF THE BILL ON A FEW MANUFACTURES OUT OF MANY—THE WOOL MANUFACTURE.

My knowledge of this industry has been obtained by practical experience as an operative in woolen mills, and I am also familiar with the causes which make the wool manufacture one of the most precarious and hazardous of all lines of manufacture for capital employed therein.

One of the principal reasons for this is its dependence on the changes of fashion, which fluctuate in this more than in any other of the textile industries.

In modern wool manufacture the requirements of fashion demand new patterns every season, thus adding greatly to the cost of manufacture.

The material requires great skill and experience in its purchase and manipulation. An error in the purchase of wool, in its preliminary preparation, its fabrication, or its dyeing and finishing, means the loss of a large amount of money.

Another feature in the industry, which breaks down many manufacturers, is the long period which elapses between the beginning of manufacture and the placing of the product on the market and obtaining its avails in cash.

There were 267 idle establishments reported at the census of 1890, having invested capital amounting to $6,107,360. The volume of capital which has been sunk in this industry is larger, in its proportion of the total capital invested, than in any other. Instances are frequent where the money expended in equipping a woolen plant has been entirely lost before that plant had been finally brought to the point of earning a return upon the capital required for its active operation. It is due to this cause that the Eastern States are full of woolen mills which have passed through many hands. At the census of 1890, the greatest number of idle woolen mills was found in the State of Pennsylvania, where 47 establishments represented inactive plants which cost $1,265,460.

This was the condition of the industry in 1890 under the operation of the tariff bill of 1883, but still the operatives who had employment were earning good wages. The census reports show that their average annual earnings were $350, as compared with $293 at the census of 1880.

The number of persons employed had increased from 161,557 in 1880 to 219,132 in 1890.

The total employés in 1890 were divided into 98,446 men, 105,993 women, and 14,693 children.

During the decade the number of men employed had increased 30 per cent, the number of women 59 per cent, while the number of children had decreased 24 per cent.

The great increase in the number of women employés shows the effect of improved machinery upon the present condition of mill operatives.

The tendency of these improvements is to lessen the physical exertion required, and thus to increase the efficiency and the employment of women.

The added protection given by the McKinley bill, which reduced importations of woolen goods from $56,582,432 in 1890 to $35,565,879 in 1892, has enabled some of the idle mills to start up, thus furnishing employment to many additional operatives and a market for our domestic wool, and all this without increasing the cost to the customer of a yard of woolen goods.

GLASSWARE.

The McKinley bill increase the duty on green and colored glassware from 1 cent per pound to 1¼ cents per pound; and on cut glass the duty was increased from 45 per cent to 60 per cent.

The Wilson bill changes the specific duty imposed on green and other colored glass to an ad valorem duty of 30 per cent, while on cut glass the present ad valorem duty of 60 per cent is reduced to 35 per cent. The collection of ad valorem duties in the past because of undervaluation has practically resulted in the payment by the foreigner of only about one-half of the tax contemplated by the law, so that for the same reason the actual tax in this case will be only 12 to 15 per cent on the cost of green glass and 15 to 20 per cent on the cost of cut glass in Europe. This action shuts up every factory engaged in the manufacture of these goods in this country at the present rate of wages.

The products of this branch of the glass industry reported at the last census comprise flint or lead and lime glassware, both cut, blown, or pressed, lamps and lamp chimneys, and flint druggists' ware.

But little cut glass was made in this country previous to 1890, but the degree of protection afforded by the McKinley bill has encouraged its manufacture, and nearly one thousand workmen are employed in my district in this industry.

Here is the scale of wages earned in one factory in my district:

	Per day each.		Per day each.
2 managers	$5.00	1 engraver	$3.05
4 pressers	5.00	4 mold-makers	4.00
8 finishers	4.50	1 machinist	4.00
15 gatherers	2.50	3 mixers	2.00
15 stickers-up	1.25	2 teazers	2.00
15 cleaning-off boys	.80	1 pot-filler	2.00
15 carrying-in boys	.90	5 packers	2.00
10 mold-holders, boys	.90	2 drivers	2.00
15 blowers	5.00	5 laborers	1.75
60 cutters	3.50	2 engineers	3.00

From the foregoing statement we find that, with 186 hands employed, the average daily earnings per hand are $2.75.

Carroll D. Wright in his published report of 1891, on Cost of Production, says:

One thousand two hundred and seventy-six families employed in the glass industry in the United States had an annual average income of $859.04, while 60 families employed in the same industry in England and Belgium had an average income of $362.16.

It is very evident from this showing that glassware costs more to manufacture by the wage-earners in American factories than that made by the foreign operative, and when my Democratic brother pats them on the back and tells them that they are so much smarter than their competitors across the water and have such superior facilities in mechanical appliances that they require no Federal protection, it sounds absurd, because mechanical appliances are but little used, the products of this industry being almost entirely the results of manual labor combined with the highest degree of artistic skill.

Taking the total cost of manufacturing glassware we find that the labor directly employed constitutes 65 per cent of it, and that this labor now receives 53 per cent more wages than is paid in Europe. What is to become of the industry under this bill we are now asked to railroad through Congress?

Nor will the annihilation of the industry in this country bring lower prices to the consumer. In 1890 the average factory prices of tumblers and goblets were $3.77 per gross for the Pennsylvania, and $1.22 for the Ohio product, while for lamps the average price was $1.65 per dozen in Ohio, and $2 in Pennsylvania. The average value of lamp chimneys per dozen, according to census statistics, is 13½ cents in Ohio and 35½ cents in Pennsylvania, and 41½ cents in New York—all these differences of price being due to the different classes of goods made.

The census returns of 1890 classify 125 establishments as engaged in the manufacture of glassware. They had $15,448,196 capital invested in plant and appliances: they paid $70,000 in local taxes; they employed 23,313 people, who received more than $10,000,000 dollars in wages during the census year 1890. They used the following materials:

	Cost.
115,746 tons mixing sand	$365,915
36,070 tons soda ash	1,274,382
250 tons salt cake	7,258
6,955 tons nitrate of soda	274,686
255,333 pounds English clay	2,699
1,417,644 pounds German clay	11,792
4,219 pots purchased	255,535
28,000,000 feet of lumber	353,518
10,000 kegs of nails	28,018
23,660 tons of straw and hay	177,426
1,650,000 casks and barrels	405,033
Miscellaneous materials	1,768,972
Total	$4,925,234

The total gross value of their products was $18,601,244.

The foregoing only refers to glassware, including cut-glass products, and out of the gross value stated has to be paid the expenses of selling, cost for the depreciation of plant, mercantile risks, etc.

The proposed reduction is particularly severe and unjust to the cut-glass branch of the industry, which will be entirely unable to compete with cheap foreign labor in the manufacture of goods which are essentially an article of luxury.

A plain article of glass, made ready for cutting, is worth about 30 cents per pound. An ordinary decanter, weighing about 3 pounds, is worth 90 cents as a plain decanter. The actual cost in wages to cut upon it any of the designs now running is from $3 to $6, so that the cost of cutting will average not less than 80 per cent of the entire cost of the output of this particular class of glassware.

In this connection I quote from petitions before me signed by all the glass-cutters in two of the largest cut-glass works in the country, the signers being mostly Democrats, who I know were not coerced:

It was generally expected that the result aimed at by the Wilson bill would be to reduce the tariff on raw materials and the necessaries of life, which was calculated to help manufacturers and also enable the American people to live a little cheaper, but in proposing to reduce the tariff on cut glass it would appear that the framers of that bill went out of their way to reduce the tariff on an article which, in a great measure, is a luxury, and one in which none but the wealthy can indulge.

We reasonably and urgently request that our petition be given a fair consideration, for if the proposed reduction in the tariff is carried into effect, it will be of no benefit to any but people of wealth and to importers of glass; but, on the other hand, it will be disastrous to all engaged in the manufacture of glass in this country.

We will now consider the manufacture of green and black glass, and we find that at the census of 1890 there were sixty-nine establishments engaged specifically in this branch of the glass manufacture. They had $7,165,078 capital invested in plant and appliances and paid $33,323 in local taxes.

They employed 10,400 people, who received $4,454,304 wages for the manipulation of materials costing $2,594,216, from which they evolved products having a gross value of $8,521,464.

These products consist of green and black bottles and vials, beer bottles, fruit jars, demijohns, carboys, telegraph insulators, and similar articles. The workmen employed in these industries may now take a cut of at least 30 per cent in their wages or the factories must be closed.

FREE RAW MATERIALS.

As a panacea for the distress which the authors of this bill plainly foresee, they propose to give the manufacturer free raw materials by admitting wool, coal, and iron ore free of all tariff charges. They say this will enable domestic manufacturers to enter the world's markets with the products which they can not sell at home.

But how can it be shown that these articles are "raw materials," since they all represent the product of labor? Why should the miner and the farmer be selected as a scapegoat for the manufacturer?

Moreover, under the McKinley law a manufacturer of any class of goods whatever may import any material he sees fit, raw or otherwise, and use the same in his factory, and when his goods are ready for market he can export them to any foreign country and have refunded all the duties he had paid on said materials which entered into said manufactures, less 1 per cent of the duties levied on said material imported. By reason of this law an iron manufacturer may have his ore, lime, and fuel brought to him practically free of duty, providing he can find a market abroad for the iron produced therefrom. As a matter of fact, the manufacturers of this country have not availed themselves of this opportunity to have free raw material with which to manufacture goods for export, for the very reason that combined with said material must be the high-priced labor of the American artisan. I think this clause was put in the McKinley bill more to prove absolutely the fallacy of the free-trade claim that with free raw material we could enlarge our market and furnish goods to the whole world, and still pay current rates for American labor.

When I hear my friends on the other side of the House clamoring for the wider markets of the whole world so that more labor at present rates can be employed, I wonder why they do not take advantage of this clause of the McKinley act, and prove by something besides theory and sophistry the possibility and practicability of our country furnishing manufactured goods to the rest of the world. If they can succeed in profitably manufacturing goods for the foreign markets from practically free raw material already provided for by existing law, I will be very willing to be convinced of the consistency of their arguments.

The current wages paid to mine employés in this country are twice those paid in England, and about four times higher than in the Spanish mines.

Every ton of imported coal takes the place of a ton of domestic product upon which the average labor cost of mining is 77 cents, to which must be added the labor cost of transportation to the seaboard points which are now to be supplied with the foreign product.

So with iron ore. Each ton imported deprives our miners of $1.06, the average labor cost per ton of mining.

WOOL.

Are American farmers doing well with their wool under the existing tariff? I think not, and what will their condition be when the last remnant of protection is swept away? We are now growing over 300,000,000 pounds of wool annually in this country, besides importing about 100,000,000 pounds, which pays a duty of 12 cents per pound, but is now to be admitted free.

Since there were in 1890 about 44,000,000 sheep in the United States growing a fleece which has an average weight of 6¾ pounds, and the average value of those sheep was $2.51 each, it follows that the abolition of the present duty means a reduction in their value of at least 79½ cents each, or $34,848,000.

THE CHANGE FROM SPECIFIC TO AD VALOREM DUTIES.

The reductions which this bill proposes in the duties on manufactures will really be much greater than appear in the estimates which have been published, because there are so many changes from specific to ad valorem duties.

This will invite persistent and systematic undervaluation, an unknown factor which will tend to wipe out any remnant of protection this measure might afford.

Our experience has demonstrated conclusively that it is only under the specific form of duty that the full measure of revenue intended by the law can be collected.

The late Secretary Manning, Democratic Secretary of the Treasury, in his report on the revision of the tariff, dated February 16, 1886, well stated the reason why this is so in the following words:

Perhaps the chief advantage of a specific over an ad valorem system is the fact that under the former duties are levied by a positive test, which can be applied by our officers while the merchandise is in possession of the Government, and according to a standard which is altogether national and domestic * * * Under an ad valorem system the facts to which the ad valorem rate is to be applied must be gathered in places many thousands of miles away and under circumstances most unfavorable to justice.

Secretary Manning's reasoning is that duties, to be effective, must be specific in form.

THE BILL IS UNPRINCIPLED AND DISHONEST.

The majority of the committee in reporting this bill say that they are legislating for the benefit of the masses, so that there shall be a substantial and beneficial reduction in the cost of the laborer's living expenses, in order to compensate him for the loss of wages which this bill will inevitably cause.

Of the proposed reduction of $75,000,000 in the Government's revenue, I find that more than $10,000,000 will result from the removal or the reduction of duties on such items as the following:

	Proposed reduction.
Perfumery	$74,177
Opium prepared for smoking	400,073
Decorated china	1,361,218
Cut glass	154,584
Cigars	921,029
Cigarettes	17,210
Laces and embroideries	3,085,277
Silks	3,196,612
Playing cards	1,189
Ostrich feathers	1,514
Jewelry	47,797
Kid gloves	1,008,428
Paintings and statuary	339,264
Total	10,611,372

Why have the committee scaled the tariff to such an extent on articles of luxury, such as are shown in the foregoing list?

Is this legislation for the masses?

How inconsistent is this with their statements, and how false to their promises. Are these so essential to the happiness of the miner or the farmer that their admission at a decreased duty will compensate for the free entrance of the products of foreign mines and farms to compete with him in a market already crowded?

To what extent will our mill operatives, working at European wages, or out of work entirely, be able to indulge in perfumery, kid gloves, jewelry, paintings, or statuary?

Why is the duty on a deadly drug, imported only for immoral purposes, cut down from $12 to $6 per pound?

This bill, which purports to be a revenue measure, should not be railroaded through this House, carrying such incongruous and inconsistent features, which are not only false to the principles of the party represented by a majority of the committee, but designed to disturb the business of the country at a time when the greatest amount of disaster will result.

And I appeal to you, my Democratic friends, to hesitate and consider well before you place upon the statute books of this country this unwise and unjust law, which will bring ruin and untold suffering to the American laborer. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the time of Mr. WRIGHT of Pennsylvania expired.

Mr. BRYAN. How much longer does the gentleman desire?

Mr. WRIGHT of Pennsylvania. About ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to proceed for fifteen minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. Before the gentleman proceeds, I ask that ladies accompanying members and the friends of members may be admitted to the floor for this evening session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that members be permitted to bring their ladies and friends on the floor of the House this evening. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The time of Mr. WRIGHT of Pennsylvania was further extended five minutes, on request of Mr. SAYERS.

Mr. WRIGHT of Pennsylvania resumed and concluded his remarks as above.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remind our visiting friends that a very unusual privilege has been granted, that of admission to the floor, and the Chair feels that it is necessary to remind them of this fact and to ask them to observe the most proper decorum. If conversation must be indulged in by our friends, under the rule they must retire to the cloakroom. Conversation on the floor will not be permitted. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SAYERS. Before the gentleman from Nebraska begins, I understand that no other speaker is to follow him this evening. I therefore ask unanimous consent that he be permitted to speak without limit.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BELTZHOOVER] was to have followed the gentleman from Nebraska, but he is not here; and therefore there is no other speaker to follow. Without objection, then, the gentleman will be recognized without limit.

There was no objection.

[Mr. BRYAN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BROOKSHIRE having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HAINES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 11 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, January 15, at 11 o'clock a. m.

PUBLIC BILLS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, a bill of the following title was introduced, and referred as follows:

By Mr. McGANN: A bill (H. R. 5207) for the protection of honest industries from unjust and ruinous competition of convict-made goods transported from one State or Territory into another—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PRIVATE BILLS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills of the following titles were presented and referred as follows:

By Mr. BURROWS: A bill (H. R. 5208) granting a pension to Jerusha Sturgis, widow of Brig. Gen. Samuel D. Sturgis—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GRESHAM: A bill (H. R. 5209) for the relief of A. M. Shannon & Co., of Galveston, Tex.—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. LINTON: A bill (H. R. 5210) authorizing the Secretary of War to remove the charge of desertion against the military record of James H. Deal, and to issue to said Deal an honorable discharge for service rendered—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky: A bill (H. R. 5211) for the benefit of M. S. Elkins—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5212) for the benefit of Mrs. Elizabeth Moore—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5213) for the relief of Mary Elkin—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. McRAE (by request): A bill (H. R. 5214) for the relief of the heirs of William Wesley Turner, deceased—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BAILEY: A bill (H. R. 5215) for the relief of the estate of Sylvanus Sandford, deceased, late of Cass County, Tex.—to the Committee on War Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, the following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ALDRICH: Petition of William R. Harper, president, and 51 professors of the University of Chicago, for the removal of the duty on books printed in the English language—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of the officers of the Arnold Toynbee Club, of Chicago, for the removal of the duty on books printed in the English language—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. AVERY: Petition of Hon. Silas Moody, George L. Huffman, and others, citizens of Gratiot County, Mich., protesting against the passage of the Wilson bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BARWIG: Petition of citizens of the town of Trenton, Dodge County, Wis., protesting against any change in the existing import duty on barley—to the Committee on ——.

By Mr. BLAIR: Papers to accompany House bill 5188—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. BUNDY: Petition of Elliott Pemberton and 51 other citizens of Lawrence County, Ohio, protesting against the passage of the so-called Wilson tariff bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of F. M. Dever and 87 others, citizens of Hamilton Township, Jackson County, Ohio, protesting against the passage of the so-called Wilson tariff bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of W. R. Rose and 100 other citizens of Union Township, Lawrence County, Ohio, protesting against the passage of the so-called Wilson tariff bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BURROWS: Petition of the citizens of Baltimore, Md., protesting against the passage of the Wilson tariff bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CABANISS: Petition of citizens of Culloden, Ga., in favor of House bill 3188—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. DALZELL: Petition of the cigar-makers of Wheeling, W. Va., against increasing revenue duties on cigars—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of glass workers in W. H. Hamilton & Co.'s works, Pittsburg, Pa., against the passage of the Wilson bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of blast furnace employés of Pittsburg, Pa., against the passage of the Wilson bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DOLLIVER: Two petitions of the citizens of Manilla, Crawford County, and of the citizens of Farnhamville, Calhoun County, Iowa, protesting against any change in the existing import duty on barley—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DRAPER: Protest of employés of the Dudley Mills, of Newton Lower Falls, Mass., against the passage of the Wilson tariff bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. GROUT: Protest of H. B. Powell, of Putney, Vt., and 60 other farmers, against the passage of the Wilson tariff bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HARMER: Memorial of the employés of the Dyottville glass works, of Kensington, Philadelphia, Pa., protesting against the proposed reduction in the Wilson tariff bill of duties on green and flint bottles, or the change from specific rates—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HAUGEN: Petition of the lithographers of the cities of New York, Brooklyn, and Jersey City, against the proposed reduction of the duty on lithographic products in the Wilson bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HITT: Memorial and resolution of the directors of the Chicago Board of Trade, indorsing House bill 4182, providing for an international maritime conference for the better protection of animals in transit—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana: Remonstrance of 136 citizens of Madison County, Ind., against the reduction of the duty on window glass, as proposed in the Wilson bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, remonstrance of citizens of Muncie, Delaware County, Ind., against the reduction of duty on glass bottles, as provided for in the Wilson bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

ALLOWANCES FOR MILITARY PURPOSES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of November 1, 1893, a report of the Third Auditor of the Treasury relative to the allowances made to the State of New York by the Third Auditor under the provisions of the act of July 27, 1861, etc.; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE presented the memorial of William Trebilcock and 139 other citizens of Ironwood, Mich., remonstrating against the passage of the Wilson tariff bill; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of Cigar Makers' Union No. 46, of Grand Rapids, Mich., praying that no change be made in the internal-revenue tax on cigars; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Milwaukee (Wis.) Malt and Grain Company, remonstrating against any reduction of duty on barley; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of W. R. Sturtevant and 106 other citizens of Ironwood, Mich., remonstrating against the placing of iron ore on the free list; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CULLOM presented petitions of sundry citizens of Monmouth and Ottawa in the State of Illinois, praying for the imposition of a uniform duty of 35 per cent on unstemmed leaf tobacco; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of sundry manufacturers of clothing and cloaks in Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against the passage of the Wilson tariff bill; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of S. N. Tarpley, of Kewanee, Ill., remonstrating against the imposition of a uniform duty of 35 per cent on unstemmed leaf tobacco, and praying that the tariff be raised so as to prevent the shipment into the country of every ounce of this grade of tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I present a resolution adopted recently by the Portland (Oregon) Chamber of Commerce. The paper is brief, and I ask that it be read, if there is no objection.

There being no objection, the Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolutions passed by the Chamber of Commerce of Portland, Oregon, January 6, 1894.

Whereas on Christmas Day Sylvester Pennoyer, governor of Oregon, addressed an open letter to the President of the United States, in which he said, "To-day is the first Christmas in the history of Oregon when more than two-thirds of its people are without employment, and more than one-third without sufficient means of support, and "the debtors are powerless to avoid the seizure of their property and their homes to satisfy, at a small percentage of their value, the claims of creditors;" and as the statements have been given wide-spread distribution by the Associated Press, and emanating from the governor, the highest official of the State, may be taken by those unacquainted with the conditions existing in Oregon as authentic and thus prejudice our State in the eyes of the world at large, and work great injury to its general interests; and

Whereas careful investigation throughout the State does not show any material percentage of unemployed or destitute outside of Portland, and fails to show in Portland, the largest center of population in the Pacific Northwest, any alarming or unusual number of unemployed, considering the present financial depression and condition of trade existing throughout the country at large; and

Whereas, using the census of 1890 and Bradstreet's published report of December 23, 1893, as a basis for calculation, investigation shows that Portland has the third lowest percentage of unemployed and dependent of fifty important cities selected from various sections of the United States; therefore be it

Resolved, By the Chamber of Commerce of Portland, Oregon, in special session assembled, that, in defense of the fair name of our State, we condemn the statements of the governor as erroneous, misleading, injurious, and not warranted nor substantiated in any manner by the facts or conditions existing in any section of the State or throughout the State as a whole.

FRANK METTER, Secretary.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. I desire to state that I have received a duplicate of the resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of Portland, Oregon, presented by my colleague, which I shall not present to the Senate, inasmuch as it has already been submitted.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon presented a petition of sundry citizens of the United States, residents of the Pacific coast, praying for the enactment of legislation protecting the salmon in Alaskan waters; which was referred to the Committee on Fisheries.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of 35 citizens of Libertyville, Iowa, honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the United States, praying for the enactment of legislation which will prevent the suspension of pensions until after alleged fraud in their procurement shall have been proved; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHOUP presented memorials of Thomas I. McMahon and 15 other wool-growers of Canyon County; of R. B. Campbell and 49 other wool-growers of Logan County; of Isaac I. Lewis and 18 other wool-growers of Alturas County; and of E. G. Burnett and 4 other wool-growers of Bellevue, all in the State of Idaho, remonstrating against any change in the present woolen schedule; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOAR presented a petition of the Hoisting and Portable Engineers' Association of Boston, Mass., and a petition of Boston (Mass.) Lodge No. 264, Independent Association of Mechanics, praying for the governmental control of the telegraph service; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. SHERMAN presented memorials of 175 citizens of Toledo, of 114 citizens of Braceville, of 127 citizens of Erie County, of 43 citizens of Sharon, of 22 citizens of Center, of 244 citizens of Cleveland, of 68 citizens of Marion, of 175 citizens of Cincinnati, of 47 citizens of Farmington, and of 78 citizens of Coal, all in the State of Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the Wilson tariff bill; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of 37 citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for a reduction in the salaries of all Government officers; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of the Central Labor Union of Cleveland, Ohio, praying for the governmental control of the telegraph service; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the memorial of E. A. Gilbert and 173 other green and flint glass bottle-makers of Newark, Ohio, remonstrating against the reduction of duties on green and flint glass bottles to 30 per cent ad valorem, as proposed in the Wilson tariff bill; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VEST presented a memorial of the employés of the Broderick & Bascom Rope Company, of St. Louis, Mo., remonstrating against the passage of the Wilson tariff bill; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HANSBROUGH presented the petition of A. M. Michelson and other citizens of Bismarck, S. Dak., praying for the imposition of a uniform duty of 35 per cent on unstemmed leaf tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAWLEY. I present the memorial of A. J. Spencer and 490 other wage-earners of Massachusetts and Connecticut, remonstrating against the Wilson tariff bill in general as a measure which will deprive American labor of employment at remunerative wages. They are mostly out of employment, and they desire to be let alone, as the occupation in which they have been engaged is their only way of getting a living. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY presented the memorial of A. E. Potwine and 24 other farmers and growers of leaf tobacco in East Windsor, Conn., remonstrating against any change in the duty on leaf tobacco and cigars; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of John B. Talcott and 339 other employés of the American Hosiery Company of New Britain, Conn., remonstrating against any reduction of duty on cotton or woolen knit goods; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PETTIGREW presented a petition of the South Dakota Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, assembled at Brookings, S. Dak., on the 11th of October, 1893, composed of 85 ministers, representing about 10,000 church members, praying for the repeal of the so-called Geary law, excluding Chinese; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the American Society of Naturalists, praying for the removal of all duties on scientific and philosophical apparatus whose chief use is for instruction or research; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of Boston (Mass.) Lodge, No. 264, Independent Association of Mechanics; of the Hoisting and Portable Engineers' Association of Boston, Mass., and of the Rubber Garment Workers' Local Union, No. 51, of Boston, Mass., praying for the governmental control of the telegraph service; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. WASHBURN presented memorials of citizens of Virginia, Tower, and Soudan, in the State of Minnesota, remonstrating against the passage of the Wilson tariff bill; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PLATT presented a memorial of hat manufacturers of South Norwalk, Conn., remonstrating against any reduction of the present duty on hats; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Sons of Temperance of Connecticut, praying for the appointment of an impartial national commission of inquiry to investigate and report upon the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2896) for the relief of Henry James, residing in the original Hot Springs Reservation, in the State of Arkansas, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1280) for the promotion of anatomical science and to prevent the desecration of graves in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. VILAS, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4610) to improve the methods of accounting in the Post-Office Department, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1260) to improve the methods of accounting in the Post-Office Department, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 655) to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in the District of Columbia, and to regulate the proceedings before them, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 755) granting the right of way to the Albany and Astoria Railroad Company through the Grand Ronde Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon, reported it with amendments.

Mr. DANIEL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 914) for the relief of the legal personal representatives of Henry H. Sibley, deceased, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

KANSAS RIVER DAMS.

Mr. VEST. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 340) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a dam or dams across the Kansas River, within Shawnee County, in the State of Kansas.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of the bill. It has been pending here quite a while, and is a matter of great importance to our people there. There can be no sort of opposition to the bill. The committee has reported in favor of it unanimously, and I should like very much to have it disposed of now. It is purely a local matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I am not quite sure that I heard the bill perfectly, but as I listened to it it seemed to me to provide that the dam should be torn down if anybody gave a notice to the Secretary of War that it was interfering with navigation.

Mr. MARTIN. No, sir; I think there is no such provision in the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I withhold objection to its consideration for the present that that may be ascertained.

Mr. MARTIN. I think there is no provision of that kind in the bill. It provides that if the Secretary of War shall deem the dam or dams material obstructions to navigation they shall be removed.

Mr. HOAR. To see whether I am right or not, let the first section be read again.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the Chicago-Topeka Light, Heat, and Power Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Illinois, its successors and assigns, be and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to construct and maintain a dam or dams across the Kansas River, at any suitable place or places within the county of Shawnee, in the State of Kansas: Provided, That on notice by the Secretary of War that said dam or dams are material obstructions to navigation, said dam or dams shall be at once removed, or suitable lock or locks provided by the owner or owners thereof at his or their expense so as not to interfere with navigation.

Mr. HOAR. I thought it was read, "Provided, That on notice to the Secretary of War."

Mr. MARTIN. No, sir; "on notice by the Secretary of War."

Mr. HOAR. Then I make no further objection to the bill.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 105) granting to the Chicago-Topeka Light, Heat, and Power Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Illinois, the right to erect and maintain a dam or dams across the Kansas River, within Shawnee County, in the State of Kansas, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HUNTON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1426) to provide an American register for the steamer Goldsworthy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. QUAY introduced a bill (S. 1427) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Helen G. Heiner; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORGAN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1428) to amend section 6 of an act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. DANIEL. I introduce a bill for the relief of William Wheeler Hubbell. I beg leave to state that I know nothing of the merits of the bill; I simply introduce it because I think the claimant is entitled to a hearing.

The bill (S. 1429) for the relief of William Wheeler Hubbell, and to pay just compensation for his invention of armament made for the Army and Navy service, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon introduced a bill (S. 1430) for the protection of salmon, trout, and other fish in the streams and tide waters of the Territory of Alaska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Fisheries.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1920) to amend section 4430, Title LII, of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1378) to amend an act of Congress approved May 12, 1890, granting to the Aransas Pass Harbor Company the right to improve Aransas Pass.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate to print the annual report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries for the year ending June 30, 1893.

The message also announced that the House had passed the concurrent resolution of the Senate to print the annual report of the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey for the year 1892, with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 108) authorizing Maj. Gen. Oliver Otis Howard, United States Army, to accept from the President of the French Republic a diploma conferring the decoration of Commander of the National Order of the Legion of Honor; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. 1920) to amend section 4430, Title LII, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to inspection of iron or steel boiler plates; and

A bill (H. R. 4414) to amend an act approved September 4, 1890, authorizing the New Orleans, Natchez and Fort Scott Railroad Company to construct two bridges across Bœuf River, in Louisiana.

DES MOINES RAPIDS POWER COMPANY.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask leave to call up the bill (S. 1126) granting to the Des Moines Rapids Power Company the right to erect, construct, operate, and maintain a wing dam, canal, and power station in the Mississippi River in Hancock County, Ill. It is the bill which was laid over the other day because it was not printed, with the amendments of the committee.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments reported from the Committee on Commerce have been agreed to as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FOG SIGNAL NEAR CAPE ARAGO, OREGON.

Mr. DOLPH. I expect to be absent for some days. The second bill on the Calendar under Rule VIII is a small bill to which no one has any objection. I should like to have it considered for fear that it might come up in my absence.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon for the present consideration of the bill (S. 757) to provide for the erection of a first-class fog signal at or near the present position of the Cape Arago light station?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $5,000 for the erection of a first-class fog signal at or near the present position of Cape Arago light station.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask that there be inserted in the RECORD in connection with the bill a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury which is only ten lines long. There being no report on the bill, the letter will explain it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon ask to have the letter read?

Mr. DOLPH. No; not read, but inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be inserted in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, September 8, 1893.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a letter from your committee of September 5, 1893, inclosing Senate bill No. 757 appropriating $5,000 for the erection of a first-class fog signal at or near Cape Arago (Oregon) light station.

This bill with your letter was referred to the Light-House Board, which returned them with the statement that commerce and navigation would be greatly benefited by the establishment of this fog signal, and that it can be done for the amount named in the bill.

Recommendation is therefore made that the bill be passed.

A copy of Senate bill No. 757 is inclosed.

Respectfully yours,

CHARLES S. HAMLIN,
Acting Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, Washington, D. C.

CHOCTAW COAL AND RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. PLATT. On Thursday last I reported favorably from the Committee on Indian Affairs the bill (H. R. 299) to extend the time for the construction of the railway of the Choctaw Coal and Railway Company. I said then that I thought the bill ought to be immediately considered, but that I would wait until the report had been printed and call it up this morning. The report has been printed and laid on the tables of Senators, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered at the present time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TELLER. I shall not object to this bill, but give notice that I shall hereafter object to bills being called up out of order. I shall insist that we go to the Calendar in regular order after this bill is disposed of.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GRANT OF LANDS TO ARIZONA.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (H. R. 3627) granting certain lands to the Territory of Arizona.

Mr. TELLER. I gave notice a moment ago that I should object to any further taking up of bills out of their regular order on the Calendar. I do not like to do that, but it seems to me the better way would be to go to the Calendar regularly.

Mr. BERRY. I hope the Senator will allow the bill to which I have referred to be considered.

Mr. TELLER. Unless there is some particular reason why the bill should be taken up out of its order, I think we ought to go to the Calendar.

Mr. BERRY. The bill has been on the Calendar for quite a while. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that the bill has been reported for some months, and the Delegate from the Territory from time to time has been urging me to call it up. There have been two bills passed this morning and I hope the Senator will not object to this bill.

Mr. TELLER. If we can go to the Calendar after the bill of the Senator is disposed of, I shall not object to its consideration, but I do not think this is a good way to do business.

Mr. BERRY. I hope the Senator from Colorado will allow the bill to be considered and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SHERMAN. I should first like to hear the report read.

Mr. BERRY. I will send the report to the desk to be read. It is very short. The Senate committee adopted the House report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. BERRY, October 30, 1893, as follows:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3627) granting to the Territory of Arizona certain lands for the use of the Territorial prison, beg leave to report the same, adopting the report (No. 94) of the House of Representatives, and recommending that the bill pass.

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3627) granting to Arizona certain lands for the use of Territorial prison, beg leave to report that the said bill has received the careful consideration of the committee, and its passage is recommended.

At the junction of the Colorado and Gila Rivers in Arizona, and lying between said streams, are fractional sections 12, 13, 14, 15, 22, 23, 24, and 25 of unoccupied and unclaimed public lands. This land in its present condition is worthless for any purpose whatever on account of the frequent overflow of said rivers. The land can not be utilized without great expense in construction of levees to prevent the overflow of said streams.

The land lies directly adjoining the Territorial prison grounds in the village of Yuma, and can be reclaimed by prison labor and made valuable as a prison farm and thus relieve the people of the Territory of some of the burden of taxation under which they labor. Arizona has never received one acre of land or one dollar of aid from the Government in the construction of any public building. The land granted in the bill is now worthless, and will in all probability forever remain so. It can be made valuable and productive under the provisions of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY REPORT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution of the Senate to print the report of the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey for the fiscal year 1892, which was, in line 4, to strike out "1892," and insert "1893."

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives. It is merely a change as to the date.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HILL. I was about to submit a motion for an executive session, but my attention has been called to the fact that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] gave notice that to-day, immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business, he would like to address the Senate on the subject of the tariff. I ask the Senator whether he can just as well postpone his remarks until to-morrow at the same hour?

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to say to the Senator from New York that my matter is not of sufficient importance to stand in the way of an executive session. Furthermore, as I am suffering from a severe cold to-day, I should regard it as a courtesy if the Senate would change the date until to-morrow.

Mr. HILL. With that understanding, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After six hours and eighteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 7 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 16, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate January 15, 1894.

DISTRICT JUDGE.

Charles Parlange, of Louisiana, to be United States district judge for the eastern district of Louisiana.

MARSHALS.

J. Shelby Williams, of Texas, to be marshal of the United States for the eastern district of Texas.

O. J. Carroll, of North Carolina, to be marshal of the United States for the eastern district of North Carolina.

John W. Walker, of Pennsylvania, to be marshal of the United States for the western district of Pennsylvania.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE, ETC.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of an appropriation submitted by the Secretary of State to meet the share of the United States in the expenses of the special bureau created by article 82 of the general act concluded at Brussels July 2, 1890, for the suppression of the African slave trade and the restriction of the importation into and sale in a certain defined zone of the African continent of firearms, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

FINDINGS OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Court of Claims, transmitting copies of the findings of the court in the cases of Alfred Blackman, deceased, and S. S. Eason against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY.

The SPEAKER. The Senate, in compliance with the request of the House of Representatives, has returned the Senate concurrent resolution, with a House amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed of the report of the Coast and Geodetic Survey for the fiscal year 1892, 1,500 copies of part 1 in quarto form; 200 copies for the use of the Senate, 400 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 900 copies for distribution by the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey; and 2,800 copies of part 2 in octavo form; 200 copies for the use of the Senate, 400 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,200 copies for distribution by the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the amendment was agreed to here a few days ago and sent to the Senate. The House later requested the Senate to return the resolution in order that we might correct an error. The resolution as passed provides for printing the report for the fiscal year 1892, whereas it should be for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893. I therefore move to reconsider the vote by which the House concurred in the resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I move to amend the resolution by striking out "1892" and substituting "1893."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate resolution as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF FISH AND FISHERIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following Senate concurrent resolutions:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries covering the operations of the Commission for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, be printed, and that there be printed 8,000 extra copies, of which 2,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 4,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,000 for the use of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries; the illustrations to be obtained by the Public Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, that resolution is identical with one reported by the House Committee on Printing for the same purpose, and I move that the Senate resolution be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF THE BUREAU OF ETHNOLOGY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a Senate concurrent resolution, providing for the printing of 8,000 copies of the thirteenth annual report of the Bureau of Ethnology, which was read.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman a question in regard to that resolution. My recollection is that the printing of the Geological Survey, under which the Bureau of Ethnology operates at least in part, is provided for in the sundry civil bill. Now, I want to ask the gentleman whether this resolution proposes to make an additional appropriation for that printing?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No, sir. The appropriation of which the gentleman speaks as being carried in the sundry civil bill is for the current printing of the Bureau of Ethnology. There is no provision there for printing the extra copies which are provided for in this resolution, and which are intended for Congress and for distribution by the Bureau. This resolution is to provide for printing the same number of extra copies that is provided for in the printing bill which passed this House in the extraordinary session and is now pending in the Senate; but, lest that bill should not pass the Senate in time, the Bureau and its officers have thought it wise to ask us to provide for these extra copies by a special concurrent resolution in order that they may go on with the work and not be delayed while waiting for the passage of the printing bill. That is the reason this resolution is proposed.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask the gentleman to let the resolution lie over until I can confer with him about it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have no objection to that, Mr. Speaker. Let it lie on the Speaker's table.

SENATE BILLS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House an act (S. 1378) to amend an act of Congress approved May 12, 1890, granting to the Aransas Pass Harbor Company the right to improve Aransas Pass.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has reported without amendment a House bill which is identical with this Senate bill. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill be substituted for the House bill and that the latter lie on the table.

Mr. SAYERS. Will my colleague permit a question?

Mr. CRAIN. Certainly.

Mr. SAYERS. I understand this bill simply extends the time for the completion of the work at Aransas Pass.

Mr. CRAIN. That is all.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] that the Senate bill be substituted for the House bill. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Aransas Pass Harbor Company, which is engaged in the improvement of Aransas Pass under the provisions contained in an act of Congress entitled "An act for the improvement of Aransas Pass," approved May 12, 1890, is hereby relieved from the conditions of said act which require the construction of said work to be commenced within one year from the date of its approval and to be diligently prosecuted by the expenditure of at least $300,000 per annum thereafter, and to secure a navigable depth over the outer bar of 15 feet of water within three years after the date of approval of said act, and of 20 feet within five years from said date; and the said company is hereby authorized to continue and complete its work of improvement as set forth in said act: Provided, That work shall be resumed by the said Aransas Pass Harbor Company within six months from the date of approval of this act, and shall be diligently prosecuted to completion, and said company shall secure a navigable depth over the outer bar of at least 20 feet of water within two years from the date of approval of this act. And in the event of said company failing to resume said work within the said six months, or failing to diligently prosecute the same, or to secure a navigable depth of 20 feet of water over the outer bar within the time required by this act, then Congress may revoke the privileges herein granted in relation to said improvement.

SEC. 2. That the right of Congress to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN]?

Mr. DINGLEY. Before consent is given, I wish the gentleman from Texas would explain exactly what this bill does.

Mr. CRAIN. On the 12th of May, 1890, a bill was passed by both Houses of Congress, and became a law, authorizing the Aransas Pass Harbor Company to improve the outer bar at Aransas Pass. That act prescribed certain limitations, and amongst other things it was provided that within two years there should have been attained a depth of 15 feet of water over the outer bar, and at the expiration of five years (which would be May 12, 1895) a depth of 20 feet; and that there should be expended by the company $300,000 a year upon the work.

The company began its operations. A number of the stockholders were stockholders and bondholders in the Aransas Pass Railroad Company, a State institution, its line being the largest local railroad in the State of Texas, being upwards of 800 miles in length. That railroad company went into the hands of a receiver, and as a consequence the Aransas Pass Harbor Company was compelled to suspend operations. The people who owned property adjacent to Aransas Pass, and for many miles in the interior of the State tributary to the Pass, concluded that they would themselves raise the necessary funds to induce outside capital to take possession of the works and complete them within the time prescribed by the amendatory act which I now ask to have passed. They have raised in donations of land and money upwards of $600,000. They have an inchoate contract with Mr. Brewster Cameron, of Arizona, and his associates, capitalists in Chicago, Baltimore, and Philadelphia, who propose to take the franchise of the Aransas Pass Harbor Company and operating under it to do the work which was contemplated, and which if their operations be successful will give 20 feet of water in a less time than was prescribed by the maximum limitation of the original act, which I may say in passing, provides that there shall be no levying of tribute on commerce, but that every vessel, coastwise and foreign, shall be permitted to go through the Pass without charge.

The State of Texas in furtherance of this improvement passed an act granting certain privileges to such company as would within two years from some day in March or April (I forget which) accomplish this work. So that Mr. Cameron and his associates operating under this act will get this donation of $600,000 in value, in land and money, and will also be the beneficiaries of the act of the Legislature of Texas of which I have spoken.

Mr. DINGLEY. This is an extension of the time in which they are to complete the work?

Mr. CRAIN. It is.

Mr. DINGLEY. Did not the original act authorize the imposition of a charge or duty on tonnage going through the Pass?

Mr. CRAIN. No, sir; the gentleman is thinking of the act for the improvement of the mouth of the Brazos. That was subject to the control of the Secretary of the Treasury. The act now under consideration provides—I will read it——

Mr. DINGLEY. A brief statement will be sufficient.

Mr. CRAIN (reading):

Nothing in the provisions of this act shall be construed to authorize the said company to charge or collect tolls or tonnage upon boats or vessels navigating said channel; and the navigation of the same shall be free.

Mr. DINGLEY. As I understand, neither the original act nor this amendatory measure imposes any charge upon the Treasury. The proposition is merely that Congress shall give its consent to certain works of improvement to be carried on by private individuals at the expense of such individuals or of the State.

Mr. CRAIN. Neither directly nor by implication does the measure impose any charge upon the Treasury.

Mr. DINGLEY. So I understand.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CRAIN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, House bill No. 5077, similar in its provisions to the Senate bill just passed, will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

LOVICA HALL.

Mr. HOOKER of New York. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill (H. R. 3195) granting increase of pension to Lovica Hall, a widow of a soldier of the war of 1812, was read, with the amendment proposed by the Committee on Pensions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. WELLS. I object at this time.

Mr. HOOKER of New York. I ask consent to have the report read.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I think as consent has been refused already we had better stop right here.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the Clerk will call the committees for reports.

STATE HOSPITAL, OGDENSBURG, N. Y.

Mr. MEYER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 3202) donating condemned cannon to the St. Lawrence State Hospital, at Ogdensburg, N. Y.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The call of committees was concluded, there being no further reports.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 299) to extend the time for the construction of the railway of the Choctaw Coal and Railway Company;

A bill (H. R. 340) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a dam or dams across the Kansas River, within Shawnee County, in the State of Kansas; and

A bill (H. R. 3627) granting certain lands to the Territory of Arizona.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The House will now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, under the special order, for the further consideration of a bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, before that motion is entertained I desire to call up the question of privilege now pending.

The SPEAKER. There is no motion pending; this is the order of the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is about executing the order of the House.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I submit that the question of privilege is a matter of higher preference than the present order of business in the House.

I desire to call the attention of the Chair to a ruling made by the Chair on the 3d day of January, which covers this subject. The Chair then held that no technical operation of the rules of the House could deprive the House of the right to consider a matter relating to its own privileges. The Chair held that the action of the Chair in referring a resolution of that character of high privilege to a committee, and the action of the committee in reporting it back to the House, under a certain order of business, could not possibly deprive the House of the right to act upon it when the matter was called up. Because the Chair held:

In the case of a resolution which is itself privileged without any regard to what committee it might be referred, a case where the privilege attached not to the committee, nor even to the committee and the resolution together, but to the resolution itself, the Chair does not think it loses its privilege because reported during the call; because if it did then a committee, by exercising its right to report a privileged resolution during the call of committees, could deprive the House of the right to consider it as a privileged matter.

I desire to submit to the Chair that the events which have transpired since the House assembled on Saturday have emphasized the situation I presented to the House last week in a very conspicuous and grave manner.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I suggested, if the Chair will remember, the hypothetical case that the President might send a message to Congress calling upon this body to exercise its privilege in the constitutional mode and manner.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Maine is not stating any question of privilege.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Why, Mr. Speaker, I can not conceive that the gentleman from Tennessee desires to allow this Hawaiian infamy to rest upon the Democratic party and the whole Government of the United States——

Mr. MCMILLIN. We are trying to relieve the people from a burden of infamy in the shape of tariff taxation, and I demand the regular order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I say to the gentleman that if he and his associates persist in refusing to permit Congress to repudiate this infamous business he is making the whole Government of the United States rest under this odium and obloquy.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman is not stating a question of privilege.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I demand recognition of the right of this House—of the Democratic majority of the House, unless it has lost its manhood—to exercise its privileges, and unload from the majority of this body and from the Government of the United States the burden of outrage and disgrace that has been unlawfully incurred in its name. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. There is no question before the House. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] will take the chair——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, it can not be possible that the Chair desires to keep this burden of obloquy resting upon the honor of this country and that the nation shall be made to bear the odium——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine will be in order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I enter my protest against this denial of privilege as an outrage upon the honor of the United States and the dignity and privileges of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine will resume his seat. There is some limit even to the right of a gentleman to violate the order of the House.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Ah, Mr. Speaker, you are violating the Constitution of this country.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will take his seat. There must be somewhere the power in the majority of the House to enforce its own rules, and when gentlemen persistently violate the rules day after day, there must be some remedy in the possession of the majority to protect itself from such violations of its own rules.

THE TARIFF.

And then, under the order heretofore adopted, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, with Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order adopted, the time for general debate has expired, and the bill will now be read.

The Clerk read the bill at length.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, before the committee proceeds to the consideration of the bill under the order which provides for its consideration under the five-minute rule, I would suggest to the gentlemen upon the other side of the House, if they do not object to it, that we take up the schedules in the order in which they occur in the bill itself, and consider them in the usual manner, say for three days, by the end of which time we can form a judgment as to whether in the time limited for the consideration of the bill—twelve days—we can get through with all of the amendments in the usual way.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, the suggestion just made by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] has been made to me in private, and consequently I am in a position to state to the committee the difficulties which surround the proposition mentioned by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON]. I am very glad to see him recognize thus, at the outset, the utter impropriety of the method which he has seen fit to adopt for the consideration of this measure. It will be found to be fraught with great misfortune the further we go; but the gentleman does not propose to remedy it in the only way which is a suitable remedy, namely, to allow the question to be considered after the fashion which the wisdom and experience of the House have sanctioned for a great many years, namely, to remove the time limitation and allow the House freely and in untrammeled fashion to consider each proposition as it comes up.

This bill contains a great many propositions, many of which are vital to different sections of the country. Instead of having the free right which every member—as is evident from the proposition made by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON]—should have to offer amendments without let or hindrance on the part of the Chair, the whole bill is thrown upon the House, and we are dependent upon the action of a single man in the Chair. It depends upon his recognition; and one of the great reasons which exists for having rules at all has been absolutely ignored in the proposition.

The fact that it was done so at another time, as has already been stated to the House, does not in the least alter the case, for that experiment itself is only an evidence that this thing ought not to be done. But the proposition now made is not to return to the old and well-understood way of doing business, but to try it for three days; and if the gentlemen on the other side do not like it, then we are to have no more of it. Of course we can not accept a proposition like that. It is not reasonable. It is as unreasonable as the other is.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Maine is going to take up all the time with a speech, I shall object to this. We had better proceed with the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. This is proceeding by common consent.

Mr. REED. I am much obliged to the gentleman from Indiana for not giving his side a chance. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] is recognized.

Mr. WISE. Will the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] allow me to make one remark? Mr. Chairman, I unite with the request made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED]. There are Representatives upon this floor whose people are deeply interested in some of the provisions of this bill. They have not had an opportunity to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] objected, and unless he withdraws the objection, the consideration of this proposition can not proceed.

Mr. WISE. Well, I have the permission of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means——

The CHAIRMAN. But the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means has not the floor for that purpose. He only took the floor to ask unanimous consent for a modification of the order.

Mr. REED. I am glad to see the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE], even in this stifled manner, give utterance to his sense of outrage which this system produces.

Mr. WISE. I have not risen to debate this. I have risen with the permission of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means to say that I think——

The CHAIRMAN. But the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means has not the floor for any such purpose.

Mr. WISE. I ask unanimous consent that I may make my statement.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman can proceed.

Mr. WISE. I have had no opportunity to be heard since this question was before the House of Representatives.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state how much time he desires?

Mr. WISE. I did not want but a moment, and would have been through if the Chair had allowed me to finish. [Applause on the Republican side.] I want to say that there are members here whose people are deeply interested in this legislation; and I do think, as has been said by the honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], that this bill ought to be thoroughly discussed, that every opportunity should be afforded to members who represent people upon this floor to present the views of their constituents, and I do hope that his suggestion will be respected and will be observed. That is all I want to say.

Mr. CRAIN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRAIN. How are we going to proceed to consider this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will proceed to consider any amendment that may be offered.

Mr. CRAIN. In what order?

The CHAIRMAN. In the order that they are recognized by the Chair, by the rules that always prevail in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. REED. That is leaving the matter of recognition entirely to the Chair, and is a "one-man power" exalted to an unnecessary degree, and naturally repugnant in a Democratic House. If anything can be more autocratic than that I do not know of it.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state in connection with my parliamentary inquiry that I have some amendments to offer. I would like to know when to offer them.

The CHAIRMAN. When the gentleman gets the floor he can offer them.

Mr. REED. And unless the Chair gives it to you, you can not offer them.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will resume their seats and come to order. The gentleman from West Virginia offers the first amendment, which will be reported as soon as order is restored on the floor.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 23, amend section 183——

Mr. REED. The Chair says the gentleman "offers the first amendment."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair states that the first amendment is offered by the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. REED. That is better.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 23, amend section 183, lines 20 and 21, by striking out the words "commercially known as."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DINGLEY. We desire to know the object of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "commercially known," in section 183. On all leaf tobacco, on such part thereof as is commercially known as wrapper tobacco, and suitable for cigar wrappers if unstemmed, $1 per pound; if stemmed, $1.25 per pound.

Mr. REED. I think we ought to know why this proposition is offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear any gentleman who desires to address the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to hear the amendment reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. REED. I would like to ask the gentleman if he proposes to have this amendment passed for the reason given by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] in his speech?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I did not catch the question of the gentleman?

Mr. REED. I asked the gentleman from West Virginia if he proposes to have the section changed for the reason given by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] in his speech.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I do not know the reasons given by the gentleman from New York. Unfortunately I did not hear his speech.

Mr. REED. Then I hope the gentleman from West Virginia will give us some reason of his own.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. That amendment is offered, Mr. Chairman, because of the fact that it might lead to some trouble in the custom-house. It is merely a verbal amendment. There may be some difficulty in interpreting these words by the officers of the custom-house; and in order to avoid that objection the amendment is offered. It does not affect the substance of the section at all.

Mr. PAYNE. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. The bill as reported by the committee adopted the language used in the law of 1883. The amendment is conforming the language to the paragraph in the act of 1890. Is not that correct?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. That may be correct. I have not read the law, but probably that is substantially correct.

Mr. PAYNE. There is no doubt of the correctness of it. I supposed that the chairman of the committee would know that.

Mr. MALLORY. I would like to ask the gentleman from West Virginia whether or not this language, "commercially known as," proposed to be stricken out, is recommended by the Department?

Mr. PAYNE. I wish to ask the gentleman from West Virginia a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia has recognized the gentleman from Florida to ask him a question.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. The gentleman from Florida asks whether or not the proposition to strike these words out is recommended by the Department. It was not recommended by any Department. It may have been in the recommendations of one of the general appraisers, but I do not recall that fact. It is probable, however, that the language might lead to some trouble in interpretation and administration by the custom-house; and the committee, on further consideration, thought it better to strike it out.

Mr. MALLORY. I would like to state that, so far as I have been able to ascertain, instead of leading to any confusion and misapprehension, the language or the words undertaken to be stricken out will really lead to certainty, for the reason that there is in the tobacco business a species of tobacco which is known commercially as "wrapper tobacco," as distinguished from tobacco which may possibly be used as wrapper tobacco, but which may also, and which very often is, used as filler tobacco.

The information which I receive from the Havana tobacco cigar manufacturers, the largest manufacturers in my State, is that, as the matter stands now, the construction put by the appraisers upon the language "wrapper tobacco" is that anything which may possibly be used as a wrapper is to be classed as wrapper tobacco and is to pay the highest rate of import duty; whereas, in fact and in truth, a large part of that which is classed under this strict interpretation as "wrapper tobacco" is not wrapper tobacco and is not used as such, but can be used by the manufacturer only as filler tobacco. As an illustration, they cite the fact that they may make a wrapper of a piece of paper steeped in tobacco juice. It is possible to do that, and it has been done, but that is no reason why that material should be classed as wrapper tobacco.

From my investigation of this matter I am inclined to think that it will lead to much more certainty as to what is being imported, and enable the burden of taxation to be more evenly imposed to retain this language, and let it apply to what is commercially known as "wrapper tobacco" than it will to strike it out. The inspectors all know now what is commercially known as "wrapper tobacco," but if you strike this language out and leave it to them to say whether any given material is capable of being used as a wrapper, they will necessarily conclude that all that can possibly be used as a wrapper will be so used, and that in many instances will lead to great injustice. Of course, it is not the purpose of Congress to impose an unjust burden upon these people, and I am inclined to think that the certainty which is sought will be best attained and the desire to get rid of ambiguity will be best served by letting those words stand.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Line 22, strike out "one" before "dollar" and insert "two."
Line 23, strike out "$1.25" and insert "$2.75."
Insert the following proviso:
"Provided, That if any portion of any tobacco imported in any bale, box, or package, or in bulk, shall be suitable for cigar wrappers, the entire quantity of tobacco contained in such bale, box, or package, or bulk, shall be dutiable; if not stemmed, at $2 per pound; if stemmed, at $2.75 perpound."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad indeed that the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means have got some fresh light on this subject and are willing to make an amendment that is in the interest of the better protection and collection of the duties which they impose. I tried to get that amendment adopted in the committee, but gentlemen did not seem to understand it then. I hope they will continue their studies, not only of this paragraph but of every paragraph in the bill, and if they will do that carefully and prayerfully I think they will end by adopting not only the language of the tariff act of 1890 in this particular, but the whole act itself. [Laughter.]

The amendment that I have offered is still further in the direction of protecting the collection of the revenues which are to be imposed under this paragraph, and for the same reason I have offered the proviso. I have gone a little farther than that; I have offered an amendment which increases the duty, in order to protect not only the tobacco-growers of my own State, but also those of Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and many other States. I do that in order that the farmers may be able to sell their leaf tobacco, suitable for wrappers, at a price that will pay them to raise it, that it may be put upon domestic cigars, so that when an American citizen who feels a pride in the land of his citizenship, who feels a pride in the American flag and in the Constitution—which gentlemen on the other side seem to think they have full charge of—in order, I say, that when such an American citizen wants to smoke, he will be able to go into a store and buy an American cigar—a cigar that is American all through, wrapper, binder, filler—from stem to gudgeon an American cigar. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. I have but five minutes. I am glad, Mr. Chairman, to inform the House and the country that under the tariff act of 1890 the price of American cigars, the price of the cigars that we common people use, has not increased in the market. In fact, they are selling cheaper to-day than they sold before the tariff of 1890 was enacted. Now, I know that this duty puts up the price of imported cigars, but I have always felt that any man who was able to smoke a Havana cigar was able to pay a portion of the revenues of this Government, and I have not felt any particular sympathy for that class of our people.

I think they ought to bear a share of our burdens. I think it is proper to put that obligation upon them; and to you, gentlemen, who are hunting for revenue in every nook and corner, trying to find how you can put an internal-revenue tax upon the people without their knowing it, or appreciating it, or charging it to the Democratic party, I commend the plan of putting more import duty upon imported tobacco and imported cigars, thus helping the farmers of the country and at the same time helping to make up the enormous deficit which you are providing for in this bill.

Mr. DE FOREST. Mr. Chairman, I desire most heartily to second the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, and I want to say that it would be perfectly consistent with Democratic principles that this amendment should be adopted.

We in Connecticut are perhaps more deeply interested in this question of tobacco culture, or at any rate in the culture of that brand of tobacco which comes in competition with imported tobacco, than any other section of the Union; and we have felt that the farmers of Connecticut were benefited by this one particular feature of the present tariff almost alone; that it is the one particular section perhaps of the existing tariff which is beneficial to the farming interests of my State.

I have supposed it to be one of the cardinal doctrines of the Democratic faith that if there was anything which could be contrived in the way of tariff legislation which would relieve the farmer from the burden resting upon him and place him upon something like an equality with the other interests of the country, such a measure ought to be adopted. Beyond all that, I understand it to be a principle of the Democratic faith and of Democratic platforms that taxation should rest upon luxuries rather than upon the necessaries of life; and whatever might be said about the low-priced or cheaper grades of tobacco, it is perfectly obvious that this kind of tobacco which is imported with a duty of $2 a pound upon it and is used to a considerable extent is that kind which only the wealthier classes can use. Beyond that, there is a question of revenue here.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DE FOREST] yield?

Mr. DE FOREST. I will in a moment.

Mr. Chairman, if I understand the statistics, the retention of the present duty on this kind of tobacco is in the interest of increased revenue. If I understand the statistics, we have during the past year realized something like $9,000,000 of revenue from the duties on this kind of tobacco; and I do not believe that under the reductions proposed in the pending bill that amount of revenue will be realized. Therefore, in the interest of the farming classes and because this is a tax upon a luxury and because it is calculated to swell our revenues when we greatly need revenue, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

I will now yield for the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH].

Mr. MARSH. The question I desired to ask my friend is this, whether his constituents in the tobacco-producing region of Connecticut did not vote against all protection, and why should they not be allowed to take the medicine which they voted for? [Laughter and applause.] And why is the gentleman, who claims to be a Democrat and in favor of carrying out the principles of the Chicago platform, advocating here a high protective tariff upon tobacco productions for the benefit of Connecticut? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DE FOREST. I gave way for an inquiry and I have not heard it yet. I have already endeavored to explain the reasons upon which I think it is perfectly consistent with Democratic principles and with the Democratic platform and with Democratic promises and pledges that this duty should be retained as in the present law.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in the first place that I am a protectionist—in favor of protecting every industry in this country that by means of protection can be builded up and made prosperous. The only thing in which I am disappointed in regard to the bill now pending before the House is that the Democratic party have not the courage of their convictions and the honesty and manhood to incorporate into this bill the declarations and principles upon which they claim to have carried the elections in this country in 1892. My friend from the little "Nutmeg State" of Connecticut—and I do not mean to speak disrespectfully of Connecticut—wants protection to the extent of $2 a pound upon leaf tobacco for the benefit of the farmers in his district; yet he would vote to take off the duties upon barley and wheat and live stock that are produced by the farmers of the West. What sort of honesty and consistency is there in a position of that sort? [Applause on the Republican side.] If you want to protect the farmers of Connecticut, come out West and help me protect the farmers of Illinois and the great West. [Applause.]

You Democrats have declared in your platform in favor of a tariff for revenue, and revenue only; all over this country you have denounced protection as unconstitutional and as a fraud upon the people. Now, why in the name of Heaven have you not the honesty and courage to stand up to you profession? [Applause.] Why do you insist upon presenting to the American people the spectacle of compelling the farmer to compete in the markets of the world with the underpaid labor of other countries while you ask him to pay a duty of 40 per cent upon the woolen manufactures of Connecticut and other portions of the country?

Mr. Chairman, this is all that I have to say.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] was a member of the Ways and Means Committee and helped to frame this bill, I am glad that we get one confession from him at the threshold of this discussion, which will serve to guide us all the way through. One of the reasons, he says, why this tax ought to be increased is that the man who smokes a foreign cigar can afford to pay something to the revenues when he uses that cigar. Then a tariff is a tax; and the man who consumes the article pays that tax! [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York further says that one of the objects of the imposition he proposes is to increase the cost of the home product, to give protection to the maker of tobacco in Virginia, in Connecticut, in Pennsylvania, in New York, and in other States in the Union. Now, it turns out that the tobacco which is to take the place of that embraced in this paragraph does not bear in the market, even under the present rate of duty, near the amount of the rate of import duty; and hence protection has failed to raise the price, and an increase of the amount of duty would not give the farmer here the price that it is claimed he should have.

Now, as for the distinguished gentleman from Illinois who has just taken his seat, who complains of the putting of American products of the farm on the reduced list, I wish to say that the McKinley bill did place an increase of duty on wheat. But it turned out that under the old duty, the year before the bill was enacted, there was imported into the United States less than 4,000 bushels of wheat, and I suspect that the members of the Ways and Means Committee of that Congress, when they increased that duty and pretended that it was for the purpose of protecting American wheat, must have snickered in each other's faces when they looked at one another and thought how "gullible" they were assuming the American people to be. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MARSH. Now, Mr. Chairman, since the gentleman has seen fit to refer to me, I want to make a suggestion.

Mr. McMILLIN. Certainly.

Mr. MARSH. I want to know why the gentleman takes up a single article or a single feature of the bill and brings it to our attention? Why, if he wants us to understand the question at all, or the effect of the legislation he refers to, does he not take other features of the bill and let us know their effects? Why talk about wheat alone? Why not take up the other provisions of the McKinley bill and show their effects? It is unfair to take up a single item in that way. Let the gentleman take up other features of the bill and show their effects.

Mr. McMILLIN. With much pleasure, if the gentleman will just allow me. I will explain, for instance, the effect of that bill upon the importation of horses into this country. Now, a horse that is worth $1,000, imported by a wealthy man for driving purposes or for a saddle horse, will pay $30, whereas the cheap horse——

Mr. MARSH. No, sir; not $30. It pays 30 per cent, or $300. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] You are mistaken, sir——

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman is right; it would pay 30 per cent. If I said $30 I meant 30 per cent.

Mr. MARSH. And you made a mistake?

Mr. McMILLIN. Yes; I made a mistake by lapsus linguæ. I said $30 instead of 30 per cent.

Mr. MARSH. And a good many of them. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. McMILLIN. Now, if the gentleman's fervor has worked off, I will state what I intended to state and what his interruption prevented me from making clear. I was going on to say that a horse worth a thousand dollars pays a duty of 30 per cent.

Mr. MARSH. That is it exactly. But you did not say so before.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the gentleman will let me proceed. The horse that is worth less than $150 pays $30, a specific rate. Hence horses worth $145 would pay only $30 a head, while one that is worth only $20 would have to pay $30. That is the point to which I wished to call the gentleman's attention; that is to say, the cheaper the horse the higher the rate of duty, just as in other features of the bill, the cheaper the goods the higher the rate of duty. It is so with most of the schedules.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, at the time the McKinley bill was pending in this House one of the hardest struggles the protectionists here had was to fix this duty on tobacco as it is now in the law of the land; and it was done very largely upon the faith of the members of this body that it would be a benefit to Connecticut and to the farmers of that district of country.

I, Mr. Chairman, for one, am in favor of any provision that is protective in its features; but I am at a loss to know whether the farmers of Connecticut favor this tax, for I would not like to press upon them a measure to which they are opposed.

It is a State which has a large share of the intelligence of this country, and I am satisfied that the farmers of Connecticut must have known how bitterly the Democratic side of this House opposed the levying of this high duty, and they must have known also how strenuously the Republican side battled for their interest. But yet, sir, when the test came, in the election of 1892, not only did Connecticut largely increase her Democratic majority on the issue directly assailing this tax, directly putting in issue the propriety of this identical provision of this law, directly putting in issue the constitutionality of the tax, denouncing it, as it was denounced, as a robbery, and proclaiming that it was an unconstitutional tax—I say not only did they understand that, in my judgment, absolutely, but understanding it they voted by a larger majority than they had ever done before in favor of the platform and the party which had undertaken to make that issue; and not only so, but in looking at the returns from Connecticut I am led to believe that the largest Democratic vote cast in the whole State was in those sections where the farmers raised the greatest quantity of tobacco; and at the same time, in doing all of that, they turned out of this body the men who had voted for their interests; and I can hardly believe that the Democratic farmers and the Republican farmers of Connecticut are in favor of this protective duty on tobacco in view of their own action.

I would be very glad to give it to them if I could; but if it be true that the tariff is a tax, and that the tax is a burden and robbery, why, the Connecticut farmers must cut down the price of their tobacco; and, as my friend from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] said with much force and effect, let them take their share of the medicine which is to be administered to the men of America from one end of it to the other. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Chairman, considerable has been said in this debate about the petitions which have been presented here against the passage of this bill. I think the records of the Committee on Ways and Means will disclose the fact that more persons have signed petitions for the reduction of the rates of duty upon wrapper leaf tobacco—not to the rates fixed in the bill, but to a lower rate—than have signed petitions in favor of any other proposition in this bill. Every cigar-manufacturer in the country and every operative in cigar-manufacturing establishments, embracing 45,000 persons throughout the United States, have signed petitions in favor of this reduction. Under the act of 1883 the duty on Sumatra leaf tobacco was 75 cents and $1 a pound. By the McKinley bill the duty was increased to $2 and $2.75 a pound.

Sumatra tobacco does not come in competition with American tobacco. Why, the gentlemen who are here demanding that this rate be maintained are not selling tobacco of their own raising for anything like a dollar a pound. The highest price paid for American wrapper leaf tobacco does not exceed, I believe, 50 or 75 cents a pound, even at the very highest.

Mr. McMILLIN. Has not the price gone as low as 25 cents?

Mr. BYNUM. Twenty-five cents was the price before this duty was imposed, and since that it has run up probably to 60 or 70 cents a pound, but there is no competition between Sumatra leaf and American wrapper leaf tobacco, which is raised in Connecticut and in a small part of Pennsylvania, and probably to some extent in Florida and Georgia now. And besides this, the great bulk of the tobacco produced in the United States is not wrapper leaf tobacco at all, and sells for only about 10 cents a pound.

Now, the whole purpose of raising this duty to $2.75 a pound has been to discourage the importation of Sumatra leaf, to exclude Sumatra leaf from the market, and thereby compel the consumption of the American leaf. If that is Democratic, then, gentlemen, I am not a Democrat, and I want that understood. When it comes to the levying of a duty for the purpose of absolutely prohibiting the use of an article it is not Democratic, nor does it come anywhere near the Democratic platform.

Now, the whole question is simply this, are you going to burden 45,000 workingmen in this country with an exorbitant tax, and break down a great industry, for the sake of giving three or four counties in Connecticut which are engaged in the raising of tobacco a monopoly of the market?

Mr. SPERRY. Do I understand the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] to say that the tax now imposed under the McKinley bill was imposed in order to prevent the importation of Sumatra tobacco?

Mr. BYNUM. It has not prevented the importation altogether, but it has broken up a number of manufacturers in this country who have tried to carry on the business and are unable to do it. One of my own constituents told me that he had sunk $16,000 in that way, trying to carry on business under this higher rate of duty.

Mr. TUCKER. I have a similar case in my district.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. And I have one in mine.

Mr. BYNUM. There are numerous instances all over the Western country. Now, in the present bill we have not reduced the duty even to what it was under the act of 1883; and if I was making an objection to this bill it would be that the rate has not been reduced half low enough. It ought to be reduced to from 35 to 50 cents a pound, which would be ample protection for the American tobacco-growers; because as I have said there is no real competition. Manufacturers of tobacco are compelled to use Sumatra leaf. They can not make as merchantable cigars, that will sell as well, from American wrappers. I trust the House will sustain the committee in this reduction, because I believe it is not only in the interest of a great industry in the United States, that it is not only in the interest of 45,000 workingmen in the United States, but it is in the interest of revenue also; because the duty of $2.75 a pound is entirely above the revenue point.

Mr. MARSH. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARSH. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There is already one amendment pending and an amendment to the amendment, and a third amendment would not be in order.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut——

Mr. MARSH. Can I offer a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SPERRY] is recognized.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address myself to this amendment from a revenue standpoint, pure and simple. Being on the Democratic side, I could not be expected of course to vote for anything that was at all protective in its nature. I therefore consider it from its standpoint as a question of revenue. Before speaking of the revenue that is derived from what is known as Sumatra tobacco, I will state what it is, where it is used, and to what extent it is used. Sumatra tobacco is a wrapper tobacco. It is not fit for filling or any other purpose except to wrap a cigar; but it is desirable to use as a wrapper; because of the color, the gloss, and the uniformity of the color the cigar-rollers like to use it.

At the present price of $4 or $5 a pound, which the cigar manufacturers pay for it, it is used upon cigars that sell for $30 a thousand and over, or at least that priced cigar permits it to be used. It will sell at the price of $4 or $5 a pound to be used upon cigars that sell for over $30 a thousand. So that the proposition comes down to this: In the first place it is a tax on a luxury. It is a tax upon a man, if we admit that the tariff is a tax upon the consumer; it is a tax upon the man who can afford to smoke an expensive cigar.

Now, then, in relation to its effect upon imports. I do not doubt that this clause in the McKinley bill was put in strictly as a protective measure, as a very highly protective measure. If I were to speak my convictions upon that point I should say that in my judgment when this clause was put into the McKinley bill it was expected to be prohibitive; but, upon the other hand, the imports increased under the duty; and it was testified to before the Committee on Ways and Means, in the presence of my friend from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], that it might be taxed still higher than now and bring in still more revenues than now.

If that is the case, in the condition of the revenues at this time, for myself I should favor a higher tax; and in reply to the suggestion that it would not bring in as much revenue, I would say that I have in my hand a statement of the Treasury Department showing the imports of Sumatra tobacco since it was first known in this country, which was in 1881, and the amount of the imports, and figuring it at $2 a pound for the last fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, indicates an income under this schedule of upward of $10,000,000. Ten million dollars! Now, that is evidence, I submit to the Committee on Ways and Means, that the tax might go still higher and provide still more revenue.

Mr. Chairman, I have other evidence, which I have not at hand with me now, and from that I understand—from the information I got from the Treasury Department in the statement of the amounts of Sumatra tobacco now in bond ready to be entered—according to that calculation there is in New York today, ready to be entered, in round numbers, 5,000,000 pounds of Sumatra tobacco, which will pay, under the present law, $5,000,000 more than we provide for by the bill as it has been submitted to this House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if it be the sense of this committee that this tax should be reduced, the effect, and the only effect, would be that $5,000,000 will be put into the pockets of five or six importers in New York instead of being put into the United States Treasury.

So that, Mr. Chairman, without regard to protection, without regard to what may be the effect of it from a protective or prohibitory standpoint, speaking in behalf of the Treasury, that is about to issue bonds if they can get the permission of this House to do so—speaking from the point of revenue, to pay our ordinary disbursements, I shall vote for the amendment that my friend from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has proposed; and in so voting I do not vote any tax upon any necessity of life; I vote nothing upon any poor man, but I vote for it so as to put $5,000,000 into the Treasury this year and $5,000,000 each year hereafter. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I submit the following, to be printed in the RECORD:

Imports of leaf tobacco from the Netherlands into the United States during each fiscal year from 1881 to 1893.

Years.	Pounds.	Value.	Average rate of duty per pound. A.	Average rate of duty per pound. B.	Duty.	Ad valorem per cent.
1881	200,602	$140,665	$0.35	$0.35	$70,210.70	49.9
1882	782,763	487,127	.35	.35	273,967.05	56.2
1883	3,818,931	2,542,148	.40	.52	1,985,844.12	67.5
1884	603,536	480,702	.45	.52	313,838.72	65.2
1885	2,217,919	1,881,494	.50	.52	1,153,317.88	61.3
1886	4,000,519	3,394,156	.55	.52	2,080,269.88	61.2
1887	4,213,336	3,651,349	.55	.52	2,190,934.72	60.
1888	5,861,472	5,634,756	.55	.52	3,047,965.44	54.
1889	5,024,555	4,333,463	.55	.52	2,612,716.60	60.2
1890	9,734,999	9,037,388	.55	.52	4,062,199.48	44.9
1891	4,908,545	4,682,493	2.00	2.00	9,817,090.00	209.6
1892	2,661,932	1,899,721	2.00	2.00	5,323,864.00	280.2
1893	5,374,765	5,078,315	2.00	2.00	10,749,530.00	211.6

In the above table the duty from 1881 to 1890, inclusive, is estimated at what is supposed to be the actual duty paid; from 1891 to 1893 the duty is fixed at $2 per pound.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
Washington, D. C., January 12, 1894.

DEAR SIR: I give you herewith figures showing the quantity and value of leaf tobacco "suitable for cigar wrappers" in warehouse on the 30th of November. Fully 98 per cent of this tobacco is Sumatra tobacco.

The returns for December will not be received in this Bureau until the 20th of this month, so I send you these, which may answer your immediate purpose.

Leaf tobacco, suitable for cigar wrappers, 5,958,649 pounds = $5,665,427.

Yours, respectfully,

WORTHINGTON C. FORD,
Chief of Bureau.

Hon. LEWIS SPERRY, M. C., House of Representatives.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia and the amendment thereto of the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 183. On all leaf tobacco and such parts thereof as suitable for colored wrappers, if unstemmed, 35 cents per pound, and if stemmed, 50 cents per pound.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to say anything in this discussion except to indorse what has been said by the gentleman from Indiana, that the present law reduces the wages of the laboring men who are engaged in the manufacture of cigars. They were reduced in consequence of the McKinley bill in my section. The increase in the duty has resulted in a reduction of the wages paid to the laboring people in that industry. The adoption of this amendment will result in the increase of wages of laboring men engaged in that business.

Mr. REED. I am rather rejoiced to hear the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky. My purpose in rising was to reinforce, not the argument of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SPERRY], but his statement of facts. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] declares that this tax is not defensible on the ground of protection, for he is opposed to that, or upon the ground of revenue, which also he seems to be mainly opposed to. [Laughter.] Now I suppose the testimony of a witness on the other side, when it is clear and explicit, is worth something in considering this matter. Mr. Merfeld, an importer, was before the Ways and Means Committee for the purpose of getting this duty reduced, and he was asked, after he had finished his statement, this point-blank question, which will be found on page 554 of the hearings of the Ways and Means Committee:

Mr. REED. It produces about five or six times the revenue for the Government at $2 as it would at 35 cents, and a government in search of a revenue would naturally continue it.

Mr. MERFELD. I could not dispute that fact.

The gentleman from Indiana could. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the only doubt that the framers of this bill had upon this point was whether they had not fixed this tax higher than it ought to be as a revenue tax. They felt that tobacco, and especially tobacco of this kind, was a most proper subject of revenue, and they were anxious to place a duty upon tobacco wrappers at such a rate as would be most advantageous to the Treasury. But, in addition to taxing a proper subject of revenue taxation, in addition to getting revenue from what has been denominated a luxury, they felt that they ought also to consult the interests of the thousands upon thousands of workingmen in this country who are engaged and who make their living in the manufacture of cigars.

Now, the duties we have proposed in this bill, higher than those of the act of 1883, but lower than those of the act of 1890, will, in our judgment, produce more money to the Treasury, to help to bear the expenses of the Government, than the existing rates, while, on the other hand, they are not so unmercifully oppressive to the workingmen and will not blot out, as the McKinley act did blot out, many small cigar manufacturers in the country villages. It has been said that the present rate of duty produces a larger revenue than the proposed rate will produce. If gentlemen will turn to the table of imports which we have prepared for the use of members in this debate, they will find that in the importations of 1891, between June 30, 1889, and the 6th day of October, 1890, when the McKinley act went into operation, there were imported into this country 7,233,000 pounds of wrapper tobacco, and that for the year 1893 less than 2,500,000 pounds were imported.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is not the gentleman aware that the large importation just previous to the act of 1890 going into effect was anticipatory of the increase of duty under that act, and not with reference to consumption?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Undoubtedly that large importation of 7,000,000 pounds was partly made in anticipation of the McKinley act. But the importations for the previous year were 3,756,033.95 pounds, a larger importation than there has been any year since the McKinley law went into operation.

Now, the only question in my mind is, whether the House ought to fix the rates proposed in this bill or adopt the rates proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER]. The rates proposed in this bill, while affording all the protection that could be reasonably asked by any interest in this country will, I believe, bring the largest return in the way of revenue, and therefore I hope the House will stand by this bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word in reply to the gentleman from West Virginia. He has cited statistics to show that more Sumatra tobacco was imported the year before the McKinley law was enacted than was imported the year after.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Not the year after, but the present year.

Mr. REED. Well, the present year. What was the gentleman's object in citing those figures? It was to show that the rate of duty in the act of 1890 had diminished the use of Sumatra tobacco in this country, but he was obliged, on the suggestion of my colleague [Mr. DINGLEY], to admit that the figures were of no value for that purpose. Now, let me give him some figures that are of value, but which he paid no attention to, as he did to nearly the whole of the contents of this book. [Laughter.]

In the hearings by the Ways and Means Committee is a statement upon this subject by Mr. Merfeld, not a gentleman who, trying to rob the country as Connecticut persons, whether Democratic or Republican, seem inclined to do [laughter], but a gentleman seeking to protect himself after the manner of the gentleman from West Virginia. What does he say on this subject? I read from page — of the hearings:

Mr. REED. Has the consumption of Sumatra tobacco been lessened in this country by this act?
Mr. MERFELD. No sir.

There is a gentleman who knows what he is talking about, who is thoroughly posted on the subject, and who does not have to make any deduction for his figures or any equivocation in his answer. He says plainly "No, sir."

This is testimony given by this gentleman before the committee, given against his interest, when he is trying to sustain the other side. That, it seems to me, is sufficient answer to the gentleman from West Virginia, figures or no figures.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. My only answer to the gentleman from Maine is that when in the hearings before the committee I find any statement inconsistent with the official report of the custom-house, I take the statement of the custom-house as correct, in preference to the statement of a witness. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REED. I do not object to the gentleman taking the statement of the custom-house, but that is not what is contradicted. The statements of the custom-house are true, but the inference that the gentleman is trying to get this committee to draw is shown to be untrue by the statement of a witness who, while he may be very much inferior to the gentleman from West Virginia in position and in intellect, is very much superior in his opportunity to know something about the subject. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MARSH. I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 28, in line 22, strike out the words "one dollar" and insert "35 cents;" and in line 28 strike out "$1.25" and insert "25 cents."

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, if the majority of this House mean what they said to the people in 1892, upon which representations they were enabled to get themselves into power—if they were honest at that time in their declaration that they intended to take off from the shoulders of the people the burdens which had been imposed upon them by the McKinley bill, here is an opportunity to do something in that direction.

The substitute which I propose is (if I recollect correctly) the law as it was in 1883 and up to the time of the enactment of the McKinley law. Your bill provides for a duty of $1 per pound upon this leaf tobacco. It is designed for protection, not for revenue. My only object in offering this substitute is to test the sincerity of gentlemen on the other side and to let them make their record before the people—to let the people know whether their representatives are willing to carry out the declarations that they made upon the stump.

It is one thing, my Democratic friends, to go before the people and by misrepresentation to capture their votes; and it is another thing to make your record in this Hall. Your votes here will be known to the people. Not less than 40,000 hard-working, industrious people in this country engaged in cigar-making have petitioned this Congress that this duty of $2 a pound shall be taken off of wrapper tobacco and the old duty of 35 cents a pound substituted. Why was that duty of 35 cents a pound changed by the McKinley bill to $2? It was done by a Republican Congress in order to protect tobacco-raisers; it was not for revenue, but in large part for protection. Then why are not you on the other side willing to assist me now in wiping out that protection and replacing this tobacco upon a revenue basis, or upon figures that will enable the Government to obtain greater revenue while at the same time extending a reasonable protection?

The proposition embraced in this bill is the sort of unconstitutional and fraudulent protection that you Democrats all over the country undertook to bamboozle the people with in 1892. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] And under those false pretenses, under those fraudulent representations, you have brought yourselves into the seats which you occupy here to-day. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, if I can awaken the Democratic side of this House to a recollection of their declarations in 1892 I will have accomplished my purpose.

One gentleman asks me whether I would vote for a strictly revenue tariff bill. No, sir; I would no more vote for a strictly revenue tariff bill, and in doing so strike down protection, than I would take a torch and set fire to the great cities of this Union. I would do the one as readily as the other. If last January you had touched the torch to the city of New York and burned down every building upon Manhattan Island, you would not have injured the 65,000,000 people in this country as you have injured them by threatening economical legislation of the character now presented. [Applause.]

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the principle embodied in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, by which filler and leaf tobacco are both put at the same rate of duty. I am brought to this conclusion by a pretty thorough examination of the subject among users and importers of tobacco. Every bale of filler tobacco contains more or less leaf tobacco; and we have a further proof of the difficulty of a proper collection of the revenue in the fact that so many cases involving these questions have of late been decided against the Government, which is now paying a number of millions of dollars on account of such decisions.

It would very much simplify the collection of the revenue and I believe would very much increase the amount collected, if some such provision as that of the gentleman from Kentucky were adopted. I am not, however, in favor of the figures which he proposes; I think that they are too low; but I am in favor of the principle of the amendment, as I am glad to observe the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] is.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, let us have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] and the amendment to the amendment as offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] will be read.

The amendments were read.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have proposed is exactly the present law; and I wish to say that this provision was adopted in 1890 not as a prohibitory measure, but as a measure of protection. Gentlemen do not seem to understand the facts in regard to Sumatra tobacco. It is a thin leaf, light, tough, and flexible, exactly suited in every particular for wrappers, but it is so bitter that any man who might attempt to smoke a cigar made entirely from this leaf would quit the business forever before trying another. And 1 pound of this tobacco will go as far as 4 pounds of the domestic leaf.

Prior to 1890 we had the law largely as now proposed in the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, in his substitute, and under it our people could not sell their tobacco for wrappers. It all went in as binders and fillers. Out of every 1,300 pounds of tobacco raised in this country about 300 pounds are suitable for wrappers and the rest for binders and fillers. Of course this brings up the price somewhat for wrappers, and enables the farmers to obtain better results for their labor than would otherwise be the case. But we put this duty there so that the people could use American leaf tobacco on their cigars.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, as everybody knows, cigars are a matter largely of taste, though sometimes of the eye; and this Sumatra leaf tobacco has a wrapper that is better to the eye, but not good to the taste, while the American leaf tobacco, though not so desirable in appearance to the eye, is better for the taste. Under this law our people have been enabled to sell their leaf tobacco for wrappers, and have better prices for their crops than before the passage of that law; while at the same time people who consume tobacco have been able to purchase American cigars—and every man knows that American cigars have been as cheap or cheaper since the passage of the McKinley bill than they ever were before.

Now, I want to continue this law so that this use of tobacco for that purpose may be continued and extended, and for that reason I propose to continue the duty. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DE FOREST] says he wants to continue it as a matter of revenue. Well, that may be well enough from his standpoint, but the gentleman will not be inconsistent if he advocates it for protection.

I am informed by the New York Sun, a great Democratic paper, or by its correspondent, that, notwithstanding the provision in the national platform, the people in State convention in Connecticut passed a resolution unanimously in favor of maintaining the present duty on tobacco. Now, the gentleman from Connecticut can stand on his State platform on this particular paragraph, even if he shifts his position to the national platform on the next paragraph. It is only another illustration of what I said the other day. The Democratic party at Chicago when they presented their platform to the people of the Northern States did not rest on that, but went to the people and made up a false issue. They went to the people and said they would protect their industries if they got into power, that they must raise $175,000,000 of revenue from tariff and would so adjust it as to protect all American labor.

Another suggestion, Mr. Chairman, in reference to the statement of the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee a half hour ago. He intimated that I had a hand in the preparation or production of this bill. Why, that was the worst charge that was ever made against me. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] I did not have a hand in it. If he means the bill of 1890, why, he is correct about that. I am proud of my connection with that bill, and I have never denied it; but I had nothing to do with this measure.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. I make the point of order that debate is exhausted on this paragraph.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. But I have moved to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. It is not my intention now to enter upon a discussion of these matters of free raw material, that so materially affect the interests of the State I have the honor in part to represent. But in order to add something, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] said, "to the gayety" of the occasion, I desire to have a memorial read here, if in order, from the chamber of commerce——

Mr. MCMILLIN. I make the point of order—not for the purpose of taking the gentleman off the floor but simply to preserve the order of proceeding in the committee—that his amendment is not strictly in order.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Washington that as many amendments are pending now as can be offered.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. This is not an amendment, but a petition or memorial I wish to have read——

Mr. MCMILLIN. I did not wish to take the gentleman off the floor.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I wish to ask if I will have the right to read this memorial in my own time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to proceed for five minutes. He has used one minute of his time now.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Then I will read this memorial in my own time. I take this opportunity to state that the only other chance to get these memorials before the House that come to me from my State is through the petition box. If they are presented in that way nobody ever sees them, and nobody knows what the views of the people of my State are. I desire to read this memorial now, in order to have it placed in the RECORD, and I will have plenty more of them as we go along in this discussion. The memorial which I wish to read is as follows:

Resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Fairhaven, Wash.

Whereas many of the natural resources of the eastern and interior portions of the United States have been to a great extent developed and the business interests connected therewith brought to their present success and magnitude, and the manufacturing industries of such localities built up, with their immense capital and great diversity, largely by means of protective duties; and

Whereas the State of Washington, in her four years of Statehood which have been, in a large degree, years of depression in business on the Pacific coast and financial depression and disaster in many parts of the world, finds her vast natural resources yet largely undeveloped, with her manufacturing industries in their infancy and with but little diversity, and greatly in need of the protective duties which have in years gone by done so much in the development of other localities in the nation; and

Whereas her immense forests, her large coal area, her iron mines, galena ores, agricultural fields, and sheep husbandry yield products, nearly all of which are brought into aggressive competition with the same products of British Columbia, and to remove the protective duties on these products on the plea of free raw material for the benefit of the manufacturing plants of the East and interior portions of the country, built up under protection and yet to be fostered thereby, is virtually a decree that the people of Washington shall be hewers of wood and drawers of water for the localities that have their manufactories established and resources developed: Therefore,

Resolved, by the Chamber of Commerce of Fairhaven, State of Washington, That, in the interest of the business and development of the State of Washington, we respectfully urge that the tariff affecting the products of this State may not be removed or modified, and that the people of the new States may continue to have the same benefits for their products that those of the older States have already received; and we hereby protest against the application of the principle of protection on the unjust and sectional basis whereby the capital, skill, and labor employed in one kind of production shall have a benefit not conceded and accorded to the capital, skill, and labor employed in other productions which stand in the same general relations with reference to the products of foreign countries.

Approved by the board of trustees of the Chamber of Commerce of Fairhaven, Wash., December 28, 1893.

FRANK J. HAMILTON, President.
O. H. CULVER, Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. PAYNE), there were—ayes 70, noes 110.

Mr. PAYNE. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. WILSON of West Virginia and Mr. PAYNE.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 76, noes 110.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute is now pending.

Mr. REED. A substitute for the whole section?

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute for the whole section, offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER].

Mr. PAYNTER. I will ask that it be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER].

The substitute was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered to this substitute by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH].

The amendment of Mr. MARSH was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered to the substitute.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MARSH) there were—ayes 37, noes 114.

Mr. MARSH. I demand tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. On the demand for tellers, 33 gentlemen have arisen—not a sufficient number.

Mr. MARSH. The other side.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no other side on the demand for tellers. It takes one-fifth of a quorum. The amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] is rejected, and the question now is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER].

The question being taken on the substitute, it was rejected.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] is recognized.

Mr. BURROWS. I offer the following amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from West Virginia, representing the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BURROWS. How does he represent the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear one gentleman at a time.

Mr. BURROWS. I want to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] was offered in his individual capacity. It is not an amendment proposed by the Committee on Ways and Means.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understood the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. BURROWS. It is not an amendment offered by the Committee on Ways and Means.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman as offering a committee amendment.

Mr. BURROWS. No amendments have been offered by the Committee on Ways and Means or agreed to by that committee, and I claim the right to be recognized to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question of recognition is entirely in the discretion of the Chair.

Mr. BURROWS. I understand that is so——

The CHAIRMAN. And the Chair recognized the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. BURROWS. I suppose the Chair will recognize both sides?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to do so.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, in debate it has been customary to recognize the opposite sides alternately, and whatever may be fair we are willing to do; but as a matter of right it has never been the duty of the Chair, and it has never been recognized by any occupant of the chair as a duty, to alternate from side to side in recognizing members to offer amendments, and no parliamentarian will risk his reputation by saying so.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. McMILLIN. And further, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that while it is true that it has never been conceived to be the duty of the Chair, and has never been recognized as the right of the opposite side of the House to have alternations in the matter of recognition for the purpose of offering amendments, it is also the universal custom of whoever is in the chair, and has been under all administrations, to recognize the gentleman in charge of the bill while he was proposing amendments to it. I state a proposition as broad as the experience of any member of this House. The custom is to recognize the member having a bill in charge first, that he may present amendments looking to the perfecting of the text of the bill.

Mr. BURROWS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say, in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, that there is no rule, and there is no practice, upon which he can found his statement. I know, when a committee has proposed certain amendments, and the amendments are the result of committee action, sometimes the gentleman in charge of the bill has been permitted to perfect the text of the bill that he has introduced; but that is not this case. The gentleman from West Virginia offers this amendment in his individual capacity as a member of this House, and the fact that he is the chairman of the committee gives him no more right to recognition than any other member of this House in offering amendments. There is one place where the minority has the right to be heard.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BURROWS. I decline to yield at this moment.

Mr. McMILLIN. Very well.

Mr. BURROWS. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman knows that I am always courteous, and would not interrupt him without his consent.

Mr. BURROWS. When the committee framed this bill they had it in their power to meet by themselves and to exclude the members of the minority of the committee from all participation in the proceedings. That was done until the measure was perfected by the committee. But the Committee of the Whole House meets in this Hall, in open daylight, when every member is the peer of every other member and has a constituency back of him, which he happens to represent; and that being the fact, I claim that it is the right of every member of this House to offer amendments such as he may have in mind.

Now, if the Chair is to recognize the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means because he is the chairman, to offer all the amendments he desires to offer, the result will be that gentlemen on that side of the House could pass their amendments to the chairman of the committee and could occupy the two weeks, if necessary, in offering amendments, and absolutely preclude the offering of all amendments on this side of the Chamber.

Now, I insist that every member has the right to be recognized in this committee, and this passing up of proposed amendments to the chairman and having the chairman determine who shall be recognized is based on no authority, no rule, and no practice of the House.

As I said, we are each the equal of every other member in this House in our representative capacity, and we of the minority insist that we have at this time a right to offer any amendments; and I propose this as an amendment to the bill.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I think, Mr. Chairman, that all of the old members of this House will remember that in all the rulings that have been made by any presiding officer, the uniform ruling of the House heretofore has been that the committee reporting a bill have the right to perfect it by amendments offered, not by the chairman of the committee because he is the chairman, but offered by the chairman having control of the bill on the majority side of the House because he is the exponent of the majority of the committee, and the committee presenting the bill has the right, through him, to offer any amendments to perfect the bill, which not only excludes anybody on the minority side, until he gets through, but also members on the majority side.

Such has been, I think, the uniform ruling in regard to offering amendments to a bill which comes from a committee. They have the right to perfect the bill by the amendments which the committee has authorized to be offered, and when that is done amendments may be offered from other quarters, by the minority, or any person may offer an amendment. That, I think, has been the uniform ruling in this House to give the majority of the committee the right to offer amendments. No one else would have the right to come in advance of the committee having charge of the bill; and I think that to recognize the chairman to submit the amendments which he desires to do as from the committee is in conformity with the rulings and precedents, and that he has precedence. I think that is the true ruling.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi show very plainly that this case has been misunderstood by him. I hope it will turn out that it has been misunderstood by the Chairman. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means has not presented to this House any amendment recommended by that committee. If he did, he would perhaps have the right of offering those first, under the rules and customs of this House; but there has been no amendment submitted even to the Committee on Ways and Means since this bill was presented to the House.

I want the committee to thoroughly understand that. Whatever is presented here is the individual action of the gentleman from West Virginia. Had he seen fit to call the committee together to present his amendments and to receive their approval, then, according to the customs of the House, the committee amendments would come first; but that is not this case. The case here is simply that an individual member offers amendments, with no rights beyond those which every other member has. He is not to be permitted to monopolize the time, although the committee might. He can not monopolize the time, because he is not the organ of the House; the committee would have been the organ of the House.

The ground on which committees are allowed to present their amendments first is because they have presumably acted under the order of the House. It is a testimonial of the superiority of the House over the individual. But no such superiority exists in this case. Each individual stands upon his own rights, and the injustice of such a proposition as is presented here must be obvious to every member. There can be no custom in such a matter as this, because this is a new question and should be decided upon the basis of general parliamentary law; nor does the fact that the gentleman from West Virginia is in charge of the bill give him the right to make all the amendments which he chooses to propose. Unquestionably he might have a right to offer the first amendment, for he would naturally be first recognized, being in control of the bill; but beyond that his right or power does not go.

If he desires that power as the organ of the House, let him act so that he will be the organ of the House, being the organ of the committee which has been commissioned by the House. It seems to me that all this is so plain that it serves only as a reënforcement of the argument of the gentlemen from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER], because his argument is based upon this very idea of the superiority of the committee, not the superiority of the individual. I do not say that it has been the universal custom, without deviation, in receiving amendments to pass from one side to the other alternately, but I do say that it has been the custom, almost unbroken, to pass from one side to the other in amendments, in speeches, and in everything under the five-minute rule. Let me say, further, that according to my recollection, the principles of general parliamentary law which must govern us about this matter, are that it is the duty of the Chairman to so alternate his recognitions that both sides may be fairly represented, and that can only be done by alternations to a reasonable and suitable extent, keeping in mind the fact that the gentlemen on the majority side are 50 or 60 superior in number to those on this side of the House. But, with that difference, which arises from the nature of the case, regular alternations would seem to be the fairest and most just practice.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, there is no disposition existing, nor will there be any manifested, to do injustice to the gentlemen who are in the minority on this question. But when we come to settle what is the custom and what is right in the conduct of these parliamentary proceedings, it strikes me that on this side we have demanded and practiced nothing unreasonable. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] concedes too much in the beginning of his argument for the good of his cause. He concedes that the chairman of the committee was properly recognized first for amendments. Now, there is no rule that prescribes that; custom does, but not the rule.

Why is the chairman first recognized? Because he has charge of the bill and because it has been the universal practice of this House to accord to a gentleman in charge of a bill the right to have the floor for the purpose of perfecting its text before it is subjected to amendment by those who are in antagonism to the whole measure. The friends of the measure have that prior right and it has been exercised always, and whilst the question has never risen before in so sharp a form as it has now, it has been conceded always that those in charge of a measure had a right to perfect it by proposing whatever amendments they saw fit until it is perfected. Why, the very rules prescribe that the amendment which is offered by the party having control of a measure shall be acted upon and the bill perfected before a substitute can be voted on.

The substitute is held in abeyance. Now, let us see how the opposite course would operate. Suppose there should come here a bill into which fifty errors had crept at the Printing Office or in transcribing, and that every time one of those typographical or clerical errors was to be corrected a substantial amendment was permitted to be offered by the other side. Can you not see how the committee having charge of the bill might take up its whole time in perfecting the text of the bill, and might never reach a point where it could offer substantial amendments?

There is another point to which I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Maine and the gentleman from Michigan. When the McKinley bill was being considered there was a rule adopted limiting the time for the consideration of that measure to a shorter period than that provided in the order now operating. It is within the memory of every member of this House who was here during the consideration of the McKinley bill that four-fifths of this time was taken up by the chairman in charge of the bill, offering his amendments to it. That will not be denied.

Mr. REED. That he did as a member of the committee.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman from Ohio was in charge of the bill. But we never conceived that we had any right to the floor until he had been allowed the opportunity to perfect the text of the measure. And let me say there never was a single one of those amendments submitted to the full committee. We were then in the same condition that we are now. The committee had framed their bill; they had brought it in here, and after it was brought in, from hour to hour and from day to day, they conceived that it ought to be amended; and they took all the time necessary to do it; and properly so. We did not complain of it.

Now, I want to say, as I said in the beginning, that there is no purpose to cut off the right of any gentleman on this side of the House or the other to amend this bill; but we do insist that we have the right, which has always been exercised and always conceded, to perfect the text of the bill before the right of general amendment begins.

Mr. REED. Now, I want to make another suggestion to the Chair (for I have thought it best to argue the entire question), that in this particular case, while the question of recognition, owing to the custom in the House, and perhaps also in Committee of the Whole, rests with the Chair, it does not rest with the Chair arbitrarily. The gentleman from Michigan was alone standing in his place and asking for recognition at the time when recognition was given, and the gentleman from West Virginia had not risen from his seat.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I rise to a point of order. I would like to know what is before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. A question of order is pending.

Mr. SNODGRASS. What is the question of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, who is entitled to recognition by the Chair to offer an amendment.

Mr. SNODGRASS. It seems to me the Chair might settle that without all this discussion. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. The gentleman who has just spoken is perhaps more in favor of a settlement than he is of a just settlement.

Let me read the language of the rule:

When two or more members rise at once, the Speaker shall name the member who is first to speak.

It is only upon the condition of several members rising at the same time that the Chair acquires any right to discriminate.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I am quite certain that gentlemen on the other side will be willing to accord to the minority what in right and equity belongs to that minority. It has been said that the Chairman has the right to recognize anyone on this floor——

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SNODGRASS. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is pending; and there can be but one point of order pending at the same time.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Then I rise to a parliamentary inquiry: How many times has the same gentleman the right to address the Chair on the same point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. On a point of order as often as the Chair is willing to hear him. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has the floor.

Mr. BURROWS. I presume a gentleman has the right to address the Chair as often as the gentleman from Tennessee has the right to interrupt.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is said that the Chair, in Committee of the Whole, has the right to recognize whomsoever he may please. I concede that the Chair has the power; I deny that he has the right. I deny that the Chairman of this Committee of the Whole has the right to recognize the gentleman from West Virginia for all amendments that may be proposed this week or next in the consideration of this bill. Yet the position contended for would place the whole power of offering amendments with the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

In contending for the right of the minority, I am seeking to establish not only the right of members on this side of the Chamber, but of members on the other. If it is conceded that all amendments must pass through the hands of the gentleman from West Virginia, then you gentlemen on that side of the House who may have amendments to offer to this bill must first present them to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. If he desires to offer them he will do so; if not, he will decline; and if he shall have other amendments to offer which may take up the entire time of the Committee of the Whole, then every other member of this House outside of the chairman is absolutely denied any opportunity to offer any amendment, or to be heard upon any proposition in this bill except such propositions as the chairman of the committee may see fit to present.

Now, the gentleman from Tennessee says that it has been customary to allow the chairman of the committee to perfect his bill in the first instance. I concede that in the consideration of the tariff bill two years ago many amendments were offered by the chairman of the committee, Maj. McKinley, to the bill. But my friend will remember that that bill was considered by paragraphs. We commenced at the first paragraph of the bill and continued the consideration as long as we could. When a paragraph was read the chairman would rise in his place, if he had an amendment of the committee, or if he desired to offer an amendment himself, and he would be recognized by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to offer his amendment to perfect the text of the paragraph under consideration, but after that was done the paragraph was open to amendments by every member of the committee. No one thought——

Mr. MCMILLIN. If the gentleman will permit an interruption just there?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I know the gentleman would not willingly mislead the House.

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly not.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That bill was read through, and I have the rule before me, if the gentleman desires to hear it read. It provided that this bill was to be read through first, beginning with the one hundred and tenth paragraph, which had been reached. If I recollect aright, this was on page 16 of the bill, whereas there were 140 pages in the entire bill. But it provided—and I speak by the book—that when it should have been read through entirely, then it should be open to amendments in any part of the bill; and, as a matter of fact, amendments were offered in all of its parts.

Mr. BURROWS. That was not my recollection.

Mr. McMILLIN. Does the gentleman desire me to read it? I have it at hand.

Mr. BURROWS. Oh, no; I take the gentleman's statement.

Mr. McMILLIN. It is correct.

Mr. BURROWS. But it does not alter the fact that I am referring to here. That bill in the first place had been considered by paragraphs, several pages of it, and for a long time.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Only to a certain point. After that the bill was open to amendment anywhere to anyone who could happen to get recognition.

Mr. BURROWS. But at the same time it had been considered by paragraphs. The time being short, the entire bill was then open to amendment.

But I stand simply on this proposition, Mr. Chairman, that we of the minority and the members of the committee on the other side should have an opportunity to offer amendments. The gentleman from West Virginia has offered an amendment, and we had the right to offer amendments to that.

Now, if the whole matter of recognition is to be given to the gentleman from West Virginia, we are not only powerless to offer independent amendments—for none are in order as amendments to his amendment except they be germane to the subject-matter of it—we are not only powerless, then, to offer independent amendments, but the result is that those who desire to offer amendments on this side, or the other side for that matter, if this practice is to prevail, may as well leave the committee at once, for they have nothing to do with the formation of the bill.

All I ask for, then, is the right of the minority, and the right as well of every member of this House, to participate in the amendments, to enable him to reflect the judgment of his constituents. I therefore insist on the right of recognition at this time.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I assure the gentleman from Michigan that there is no disposition on this side of the House, nor on the part of the majority of the members of this committee, to prevent him or any other member who has an amendment to propose to the bill from offering it and having it considered in the time allowed for the consideration of such amendments under this rule.

I did not suppose when we entered on the consideration of the bill this afternoon that the few amendments I had lying on my desk before me would consume more than an hour's time of the committee; and I supposed, in following the ordinary rule of recognition, that the member in charge of the bill, who was supposed to speak for those who supported it, should be first recognized to make any changes in the bill he desired before the bill passed to the consideration of the members of the House generally. I say that the reason of that rule, if not its strict language, would apply in a case like this as much as if I were speaking by a direct vote of the Committee on Ways and Means.

The gentleman must take into consideration another fact. I offered an amendment to the bill which was merely a formal one, simply to perfect the phraseology of the bill, a matter of no special moment, that did not go to the merits of a single schedule or rate in the bill, and there was recognized on the other side of the House the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], who tacked on to my formal amendment a very substantial one that did go to the merits of the bill and to the rates it proposed.

That amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], in a parliamentary sense perhaps, was in order, but was not really akin to the amendment that I offered in any other sense, and it has been followed up by a substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER], and an amendment to the substitute by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH]. While, therefore, there has been but one recognition to those who are supporting the bill, the Chair has given three recognitions to those who are opposing that part of the bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to add that we are simply doing what was done, and what perhaps was necessarily done, in the consideration of the last tariff bill. I have here on the desk before me the official minutes of the Committee on Ways and Means for the Fifty-first Congress, and I find that between the 14th day of April, when the McKinley bill was ordered reported to the House of Representatives and the passage of that bill, there was no meeting of the committee at which amendments proposed to the bill were submitted to the members of the committee. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

All the amendments, then, that were offered to the McKinley bill from the middle of Schedule B, when you took it out of the Committee of the Whole and passed to its consideration under the special rule then adopted before you had gotten more than half-way through the second schedule of the bill—every amendment after that was offered by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, without any authority whatever from the committee itself and before others were recognized to offer amendments.

So much, Mr. Chairman, for the merits of the question. I say again that I had not supposed that the few amendments which I have here upon the desk before me would have occupied the time of the committee half of the evening. We desire to clear them out of the way, so that members upon both sides of the House who desire to amend the bill in the final shape that those who prepared it will give to it may be recognized honestly and evenly by the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule in the matter.

Mr. REED. I would like to ask the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] if he was on his feet at the time the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] addressed the Chair?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I had asked for recognition from the Chair.

Mr. REED. Privately or publicly?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Privately, in the way that members get recognition—in the ordinary manner.

Mr. REED. Now, I ask the gentleman was he on his feet at the time the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] addressed the Chair?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I am not able to answer that question as to whether I was on my feet or leaning on my desk.

Mr. REED. I saw the proceeding, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] was the only man on his feet asking recognition at the time.

Mr. ENLOE. I have seen it occur here in the Fifty-first Congress a hundred times that gentlemen were recognized who were sitting in their seats, when there were a dozen men asking for recognition from the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule in this matter.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentlemam from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] desire to be heard?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has gone into an examination of the record. I do not know whether he desires to address the Chair further on that point or not. It was with a view of fortifying himself in the position he has taken that he desires to examine the record. Now, with the indulgence of the Chair, I will occupy a minute until the gentleman from Michigan returns.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is in the Hall, standing within a few feet of the Chair.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. He is examining the record.

Mr. BURROWS. I do not know that I care to be heard further on the point at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question of recognition is one which the Chair understands to be largely, if not altogether, in the discretion of the Chair; and so long as the present occupant of the chair has the honor to fill that position he will endeavor to be fair in his recognition of gentlemen for and against the pending amendments or the proposed amendments to the pending bill.

Now, the Chair has understood that it has always been the custom, under the rules of the House and in committee, to permit the gentleman in charge of a bill to first offer amendments, that the text may be perfected. Of course if he offers them in behalf of the committee they are so much more strongly commended to the House.

But at any rate, the gentleman in charge of the measure has the floor to offer his amendments. The gentleman from West Virginia had informed the Chair that he had certain amendments which would occupy but a short time this afternoon; and as an evidence of the fact that the Chair intended to be fair to the minority, he had stated to a gentleman on that side, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], that it would be well for him to be ready with an amendment which he desired to offer, as he had informed the Chair, and that the Chair would recognize him during the afternoon as soon as the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means had offered certain amendments.

With a view of ascertaining the previous rulings and the precedents which should govern the Chair in this unusual position in which he finds himself, the Chair had examined, before this meeting of the House or committee, the practice pursued and adopted by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union when it had under consideration the bill known as the McKinley bill. The Chair found by actual count, unless he is mistaken in that count, that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McKinley] in charge of that bill, after the House had passed the special rule, similar to the rule under which we are now proceeding, which took that bill out of the usual course of its consideration in committee—that is, by items and paragraphs—and had determined to throw open the remainder of the bill for amendment at any point—the Chair finds by actual count that the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. McKinley) was recognized by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to offer eighty-eight amendments.

Mr. SPRINGER. Before anyone else was recognized?

The CHAIRMAN. I think before anyone else was recognized. Gentlemen will find if they will read that debate that the gentleman from Ohio was interrogated by the minority while offering amendments as to how many amendments he had in his desk. He declined at first to state, and said that he would continue to offer amendments until he got through; and if the Chair is not mistaken he offered eighty-eight amendments.

The Chair wishes to say further that gentlemen representing the majority on that side of the House offered fourteen additional amendments to that bill and were recognized for that purpose. Gentlemen representing the minority on that bill were permitted to offer nine amendments, and that is all. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] That is all the amendments that were offered to the McKinley bill by the minority after the adoption of the special rule. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The Chair wishes to be fair, and will endeavor to recognize gentlemen on both sides of this question during the two weeks that this bill is open for amendments. The only question now presented is the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia, and the Chair applies this ruling to only one amendment. The Chair does not intimate what his ruling will be on the next, but for the present there is but one amendment offered—the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia—and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] desires to offer one. The Chair decides, and he thinks that he has discretion to do so, that the gentleman from West Virginia is in order in offering his amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 45, paragraph 266, in line 3, after the words "or in part of," insert "New Zealand hemp;" and in line 4 strike out the words "and cables and cordage made of hemp."

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Is any explanation required in regard to that?

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to hear the gentleman explain the necessity for this amendment.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. The reason for inserting the words "New Zealand" and striking out the words "cordage and cables" is to prevent any trouble at the custom-house in deciding as to what is cordage and cables and what is twine. Cordage and cables are made of New Zealand hemp, and in order to make it perfectly clear, and so that there may be no dispute as to twine, we insert the words "New Zealand" and strike the words "cordage and cables made of hemp" from the paragraph.

Mr. DALZELL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Was not this amendment offered in the committee and voted down?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. No, sir; not that I remember.

Mr. DALZELL. Was not this identical amendment offered in the committee and voted down by the majority?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I do not remember.

Mr. DALZELL. I say it was.

Mr. DOCKERY. I submit that it is not in order to refer to proceedings in committee.

Mr. REED. This evidently is not a committee amendment. I understood the chairman of the committee said he does not remember whether this amendment was offered in committee or not.

Mr. DALZELL. So far as I remember I offered the amendment and it was voted down by the majority of the committee.

Mr. REED. It is rather a queer practice that the chairman of the committee can not only do what the committee authorizes him to do, but he can also do what the committee has not authorized him to do.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means what new information he has in his possession that makes him think it necessary to offer this amendment——

Mr. BOUTELLE. He has changed his mind.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois (continuing). Since we voted upon it in committee?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I do not concede, Mr. Chairman, that it was voted down in committee. I do not remember all of the amendments offered by gentlemen on the other side in the committee. I do not for one moment concede that this was offered and voted down by the committee.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Has any information come to the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means upon this subject that was not furnished to the full committee at the time the bill was under consideration?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. If this is an amendment that you gentleman voted for in the committee why do you raise any objections to it now? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I am not raising any objection to it. I am simply asking for the information which has changed your minds.

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose it was voted down in the committee because it was offered by a member of the minority and was therefore supposed to be bad. It is offered by them now because they have forgotten its origin. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. MORSE was read, as follows:

Page 45, schedule 1, paragraph 266, line 2, erase the words "except binding-twine." Also "binding-twine" on the free list on page 67. Erase paragraph 397.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I have in my district a very large cordage industry, one of the largest in this country. They manufacture, among other things, binding-twine to a large extent. This bill proposes to put binding-twine on the free list. At present, under the McKinley act, there is a very low duty of seven-tenths of 1 cent per pound upon binding-twine. In Hongkong, in China, there are cordage manufactories where binding-twine is made very extensively, and they have the most approved American machinery. The operators in those factories are paid 15 cents a day, and subsist on a little rice; and I am told when 500 men get up and go to work, another 500 other men get into the beds that they have left and the manufactories are run night and day.

Now, I stand here to say that the proposition of putting binding-twine on the free list is a great wrong to my constituents. There are in New England 12,000 men engaged in the cordage industry, or were so engaged before the present awful Democratic nightmare overtook the country. Governor McKinley told me with his own mouth that the only blot upon his bill was the very low duty which it placed upon binding-twine—seven-tenths of 1 cent a pound; and it is now proposed to wipe out this small protection and turn the workmen into the street to crowd other occupations or join the army of idle. [Derisive laughter on the Democratic side]. I say, Mr. Chairman, that there are 12,000 men engaged in the cordage industry in New England, several hundred in my own district, and it is idle for any man to say that those industries can be run successfully with free binding-twine. The effect of this change will be to transfer that business which now gives employment to American workingmen to foreign workingmen, and largely to John Chinaman at that.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MORSE. If it is very brief.

Mr. SIMPSON. The gentleman states that the men who are engaged in this business in China are paid 15 cents a day.

Mr. MORSE. That is correct.

Mr. SIMPSON. Did not the gentleman vote to admit that kind of men free into this country and make a speech in favor of it?

Mr. MORSE. No, sir. I spoke in favor of restricting Chinese immigration. But I did speak in favor of kind, humane, Christian treatment of those already here. [Applause on the Republican side.] I believe in the restriction of Chinese immigration, but I would by no means stop there, because worse emigrants are coming here from other lands, endangering our institutions.

Mr. Chairman, it is needless to describe the effect of this bill upon the cordage industry, the effect of putting binding-twine on the free list, and I denounce the proposition, and I offer in good faith the amendment which has been read at the desk.

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Chairman, in opposition to the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE], I wish to say to the House that the United States are to-day exporting binding-twine by tens of thousands of tons against the competition of China, England, and other countries. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, to put the tariff back on binding-twine would be an outrage on the masses of the people. Gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber have been pretending to have unbounded sympathy for the farmers of the United States. Now they have an opportunity to prove their faith by their works. Every time a measure affecting the farmers is up here, crocodile tears as big as walnuts roll down the cheeks of these tender-hearted philanthropists, who feel so deeply for the poor downtrodden farmer. Now, if they are honest, if they mean what they say, they will vote down the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] to put a tariff on binding-twine, because they have a chance in that way to help the farmers; but they will not do it, because they are merely feigning a love which they do not feel. I know that this matter of binding-twine costs the farmers of this country only $3,000,000 a year, but three millions added to the other burdens put upon them helps to bring them to the condition where they raise their wheat at less than cost. But every little helps. We will cut off this small extortion now and the larger ones when we reach them. [Applause.] The gentleman says that 12,000 men in Massachusetts are making binding-twine and should be protected. This proves the selfishness of the whole iniquitous system. Thirty-five millions of people in this country are directly interested in agriculture and seventy millions eat wheat bread—when they can get it. [Laughter.] Under the blessings of the McKinley bill a great many of them are short on bread just now. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Those 70,000,000 are of more account than the 12,000. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I stand for the 35,000,000 bread-makers and the 70,000,000 bread-eaters. I am opposed to fleecing them for the 12,000 binding-twine makers and the cordage trust. [Applause.] He says, by way of persuasion, that binding-twine is made in Hongkong. I do not care a straw whether it is made in China or Japan or elsewhere, let it come free. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The farmers will get the benefit, no difference where it comes from. And I want to make this suggestion to the gentleman from Massachusetts, and all the rest of the gentlemen on that side, that wherever there is an item on the free list in this bill they are going to have a most difficult job putting it on the protected list. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It will be up-hill work for them, sure as they live. [Applause.]

Mr. BOWERS. Why can you not let the woolen manufactures come in free as you let wool come in free to compete with that produced by our farmers?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am in favor of letting woolens come in free. [Applause.] And what is a good deal more, I am in favor of letting everything else come in free. [Applause.] That is my creed. [Applause.]

Mr. BOWERS. But you will vote to put a duty on manufactured goods, while you let binding-twine in free?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You need not worry yourself about me. [Laughter.] I propose to support every amendment to this bill that puts anything on the free list or cuts the tariff lower. [Applause.] The more of them that are adopted the better the bill will be. [Applause.] You can not have too much of a good thing. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am a free trader from the sole of my foot to the crown of my head. [Renewed applause.] That is the doctrine of nature and of common sense. [Applause.]

Mr. BOWERS of California. And I will vote to put everything under protection—every article of American production, and that is what the people of this country want. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, let me say that the good sense and the ability to comprehend economic questions and economic conditions exhibited by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] who has just spoken are about as great as the intelligence of a farmer who should kill his hens because they had stopped laying, and before they had a chance to begin laying again. [Laughter.] The farmers to-day are raising every dollar's worth of their farm products for one-half what it cost in hours' labor to raise a like quantity in 1860 by reason of the inventions that have been made by mechanics working in this country in the mechanical industries protected by the tariff.

Never since this country was settled was the farmer, as compared with every other class in the community relatively or absolutely, so well off as to-day. And if any of these inventions have been made in Europe, they have been brought to this country to be developed. The gentleman can not mention a solitary machine made in Europe, or used to-day in Europe that was not invented in this country or developed in this country. But for the mechanics who, under our protective laws, invented machines to use this binding-twine, you would to-day be binding your grain by hand, or binding by material taken from the sheaf. Never was there such utter nonsense, such short-sightedness——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri rose.

Mr. WALKER. You have had your time. Now let me have my five minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do you not know that the reaper was invented under the Walker tariff?

Mr. WALKER. Well, is not that rich! "Under the Walker tariff!" What do you know about it? [Loud laughter and applause.] I know when and where it was invented; and it was not invented in this country; it was invented——

Mr. TUCKER and Mr. WASHINGTON rose and endeavored in the confusion to make themselves heard.

Mr. WALKER. I ask the gentlemen to sit down.

Mr. TUCKER. It was invented in my district.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman [derisive cries on the Democratic side]; well, here is Democratic politeness; here is Democratic decency. You emptied your seats all the time we were talking on our side; and we stayed and heard you like gentlemen when you were talking on your side. Now let me say that this machine was invented in France; but it was never worth a dollar until it was brought to this country and perfected. That is the fact of the matter. I am talking by the book.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi obtained the floor.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the gentleman from Massachusetts was deprived of a large part of his time by disorder on the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will bear in mind that the Committee of the Whole is the representative of the House of Representatives, if not the House itself; and it is hoped that gentlemen may assist the Chair in preserving order.

Mr. WALKER. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi has been recognized.

Mr. WALKER. I want to raise a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALKER. It is within the knowledge of the Chair that disorder on the floor prevented me from occupying half of my time, so that I had, in fact, but two minutes and a half.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair endeavored to protect the gentleman from Massachusetts from interruptions, but will, if there be no objection, recognize the gentleman again. In the absence of objection, the gentleman will be allowed to proceed for five minutes more.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hopes that order may be restored, so that the gentleman from Massachusetts may be permitted to proceed in order. Any member desiring to interrupt him or any other gentleman should rise and address the Chair and get permission. The Chair hopes that the gentleman from Massachusetts will be allowed to proceed in order.

Mr. WALKER. Let me say that we have the evidence of half a dozen farmers whom I consulted on this floor in the Fifty-first Congress—free-trade farmers—that taking all the machinery the farmer uses together he can produce farm products to-day with just half the labor cost that they could be produced in 1860. I use that date as a basis, because while much of it was invented before then, by the war this machinery was all brought into operation; and we are obliged to go back to that date as a starting point for all our economic facts. The farmer to-day can sell his wheat at one-half what it sold for in 1860, and while doing so can pay off a mortgage or any other debt whatever; and this is because of the protection we have had on the agricultural machinery in this country. Yet, when these great machines were first invented they sold for $300 and $400 apiece—and plows sold for $25 apiece—when all our agricultural machinery was sold at four, five, or six times what it is sold for to-day——

Mr. WASHINGTON and Mr. HALL of Missouri rose.

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HALL].

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, for whom I have a very kind regard, whether he can state to members of this committee what it costs the average farmer of the United States to raise a bushel of wheat? Get down to business principles. Can you give that statement?

Mr. WALKER. I have not the statements now in my possession, but I have looked them up very carefully, and I know the facts that I have submitted to be true.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I hope the gentleman will give us his information; but if he has not got the information I will give it to him.

Mr. WALKER. I want to say that the price of wheat came up and was considered thoroughly during the Fifty-first Congress, when the question was raised, as the gentleman will probably remember if he was here, about burning grain. You remember that we burned grain because it was cheaper than fuel.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. They burned it in Kansas, I believe, was the statement.

Mr. WALKER. Yes; and it was proven that they could raise grain at that time and burn it cheaper at the price then prevailing than they could buy coal for that purpose.

Mr. SIMPSON. Protected coal, you mean. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALKER. And if there had been any plan by which they could have raised coal on the stalks just as they raise corn, and could have got it at a cheaper price or as cheap, then they would not have been compelled to consume their corn in that way.

Mr. CRAIN. They ought to have their coal on the free list; it would help them.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. With the gentleman's consent, I will state that the price of raising No. 2 wheat is 51 cents and a fraction a bushel—I mean, of course, the average price throughout the country.

Mr. WALKER. Then, without machinery it would cost 102 cents; and that is what the gentleman from Iowa wants to destroy.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. And, further, a bushel of No. 2 wheat can not be sold now except at a loss to the man who raises it.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Now, will the gentleman from Missouri give the authority for that statement?

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I will say this, that it is a statement of a good many of the agricultural papers in the United States as well as the statement of many wheat-raisers.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I would ask the gentleman if that statement is made from any authoritative source, or by anybody on whom any reliance can be placed as to its accuracy?

Mr. HALL of Missouri. Well, I thought so, or I would not have stated it to the House.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. But you are not giving your authority.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I could simply add my own experience to the experience of other gentlemen who have made this statement.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. But what agricultural paper, recognized as authority, indorses the statement of the gentleman from Missouri which he has just made?

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I do not know that I can state exactly the name of the paper, but I have in my mind Coleman's Rural World, a leading agricultural paper, the Journal of Agriculture—I have seen it in several papers, twelve or fifteen perhaps; but I do not know whether I state exactly the ones I have seen it in. I am not sure, for instance, whether the American Farmer contains the statement, and I would not like to undertake to specify the particular cases; but there were a number of them. I have given attention to these matters for a number of years, and have taken up each agricultural product and endeavored to ascertain the facts about it in the same way, so as to show the cost of each one of these products.

Mr. REED. The cost where? On the farm?

Mr. HALL of Missouri. The cost of raising it.

Mr. REED. On the farm?

Mr. HALL of Missouri. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, am I recognized or not? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri has the floor just at present.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. In further answer to the gentleman from Illinois, I desire to state in response to his question that there are a great many people in the United States who are vastly mistaken as to the average number of bushels of wheat raised on an acre in this country. The average in the United States, according to my experience, is about 11 bushels or less, and when you put that at 50 cents a bushel there is not much profit in raising it, although improved machinery assists in doing so to a very marked degree.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. My only object was to get the source of the gentleman's information. He simply gives conclusions which are disputed by a great many people. I myself do not believe that the conclusion of the gentleman is correct, and I desired, therefore, the sources of his information for the purpose of investigating it.

Mr. COX. Where did you get your information from?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Well, when I take the floor on this question I will give the gentleman that information.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the argument made by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] reminds me a good deal of an utterance of a half-witted fellow down in my county, who, being personally acquainted with three men who were one-eyed and who were 6 feet high, attributed the fact that they were 6 feet high to the fact that they had but one eye apiece. [Laughter.] Nobody in this whole wide world disputes the fact that not alone in our land, but in England, in France, in Germany, in Australia, and in Canada, man can produce wheat to-day at half what they could produce it for forty years ago.

Nobody disputes that as civilization goes on, and the inventions of men come into play, that all things can be produced cheaper for the children of men. The point is not that. The point is whether the men who are following the natural occupations of life—not the hothouse industries into which they have been called by legislation—have procured, not a greater facility for production, but whether they have as great a facility as they ought to have procured, and whether they have been deprived of their share of the increased facility by being hampered and burdened, in the advance of civilization, by taxes that have been laid upon them for the benefit of other people and to their own detriment.

We produce wheat to-day cheaper than ever before. We get more out of it than we did before. We can buy more woolen cloth for it than we could before, and God knows they can buy still more in England, where the farmer, after he has raised his wheat and sold it, is not to be taxed when he goes to buy the cloth. They can get more there where the farmer is not taxed when he goes to harvest his wheat for the very binding-twine which he puts upon it. The question after all is a question of unearned increment. Here, as in land, there is an increment that comes with civilization from invention and improved machinery and new processes of production, and the question is not whether men are better off, but whether they are as much better off as they ought to be if the division was fairly made between them in the several industries.

Say whatever you please, this whole discussion is in this proposition: It is a question between the interests of the manufacturers of the United States and the interests of the farmers in the United States. You have carried things on in your way until you have over half the wealth of the United States concentrated within the nine manufacturing States of the Union. And now a gentleman of national reputation, of international reputation, stands here, and for the benefit of twelve thousand men, as his colleague from Massachusetts says, wants to tax every farmer in the United States upon binding-twine. And when he taxes him, whom else does he tax? Every man who buys the wheat from him which is harvested, every man who buys the flour which is made out of the wheat. And for what purpose? To diversify industries and to enable twelve thousand men in Massachusetts to make money out of you and me that God and nature did not give them the right to make, but which you choose to give them by legislation the opportunity to make.

The voice of the Cordage Trust is heard in the land. That is about what is the matter with a great deal of this sort of thing. What difference does it make to the farmer that Mr. Whitney invents a cotton gin, if they come to Washington and make me pay a hundred dollars more for the cotton gin than I could get it for if I had the markets of the world in which to buy? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. Chairman, that meets the approval of the Democratic party, and therefore seems to be worth noticing. I would like to ask a question of those gentlemen who applauded. They need not all answer at once. If this tax which is put on the farmer is immediately turned over to the bread-eater, what has the farmer to complain about?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will answer the question. I did not say that every bit of it went over to the consumer. I said that in taxing the farmer you taxed the consumer, too. Whenever you tax these things the burden is shifted to some extent, in a market where one man bargains with another, and part of it remains upon the farmer and part of it goes to the consumer. In a year when the conditions of farming as to prices are hard the farmer pays it all and the consumer has the benefit. It is like invention itself. A part of the invention goes to labor, a part of it is profit, and a part of it goes to the consumer, and all things are divided that way, whether it be an invention that is a benefit or a tax which is a burden.

Mr. REED. I wish simply to remark that when the gentleman has spread himself all over creation, he will find that the taxation that he spreads over is very thin on the individual.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia and then the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE].

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the amendment to the amendment was read at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment was read.

Mr. MORSE. But the amendment to the amendment was not read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was under the impression that the amendment to the amendment was read, but is informed by the Clerk it was not; therefore the Chair will direct the Clerk to read the amendment to the amendment as offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment to the amendment was read.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment; and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment offered by Mr. WILSON of West Virginia was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 41, paragraph 252, line 12, after the words "warp and filling," insert "including all cotton duck;" and in line 15, after the word "bleached," insert "including all cotton duck."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. Where does that amendment come in?

Mr. DALZELL. Let us have that reported again.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the amendment, it is to include and increase the duty on cotton duck 5 per cent?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkans - This amendment makes certain where cotton duck would be classed.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman says it would make "certain;" but that is not an answer to my question.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. I have answered the gentleman. If we do not make certain what the amount is, no one can say what the present rate would be. It is a decrease by 10 per cent of the present ad valorem rate on part of the cotton duck, and it makes 25 per cent of what was 40 per cent in the Mills bill. In your own bill which was passed by the Fifty-first Congress this duty, I think, was reduced.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does it not increase the duty 5 per cent above what it was when the bill was reported?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. That can not be positively affirmed, for the gentleman himself does not know what the duty was. This makes certain what the duty is.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does it not change it from a class of goods in reference to that particular kind of goods different from what it would pay duty on?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. That is exactly the question of fact in dispute.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is there any question but that it does do that?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. That is the question that is in dispute. Perhaps the gentleman is right and perhaps the gentleman is wrong; I am not prepared to say.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is in the right direction, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. It is a material reduction, bringing the duty to nearly two-thirds, upon a part, of the existing rates that you have in the McKinley bill.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to ask the gentleman if the manufacturers of Baltimore did not state that this would increase the duty 5 per cent, as reported originally by the committee?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Any fear that they entertained that it would be classed lower is removed by this action.

Mr. PAYNE. They understood that it would be an increase, as reported by the committee.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Perhaps they did. They had good ground for that conclusion.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman concludes that as coarse cotton goods, as cotton ducks, have this increase, why not propose to offer an increase for the fine goods, which actually need it, and which we can not make without it?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. I will answer the gentleman that fine goods are provided for at a higher rate.

Mr. DINGLEY. But should they not pay a higher duty, as they involve a larger amount of labor?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Of course the ad valorem follows the value, and, as I said before, the ad valorem provided for is higher than this upon the fine goods.

Again, as to this being an article of coarse thread, that is true only in a limited sense. The gentleman from Maine knows that while this may not count more than fifteen threads to the square inch under a certain strict construction, yet each of these threads has a great many smaller threads within it.

Mr. DINGLEY. I know all about that.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. I know the gentleman does. He is only asking questions in order to be entertaining, which I appreciate very much. [Laughter.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, my inquiry was simply for this purpose, aside from any joking. I agree entirely with the increase which it is proposed to make in cotton goods, but I wish to say to the gentleman that the necessity for an increase on fine cotton goods in which there is larger proportionate amount of labor is still greater.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. They have a rate now; and I shall be glad to hear the gentleman upon that subject when we reach those articles in this bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is more protection proportionately where there is a comparatively small amount of labor than on the finer goods where there is a larger proportion of labor.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. The gentleman understands cotton duck, and he also knows that when you count the fine yarn in the square inch there is not an article in the cotton schedule that has as many fine threads as these large threads contain that compose cotton duck.

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not object to this increase, Mr. Chairman. It is in the right direction; only there should be more of it where it is more needed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. But the gentleman's argument does not appear to be very sound.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I had a sort of idea that there would be an amendment offered to increase the duty on cotton duck ever since I read the protest from the city of Baltimore against the reduction proposed in this bill. I have not much doubt that the manufacturers of Baltimore think they can proceed to make cotton duck under what is granted them by the committee without a very large reduction in the wages of their employés. In other words, this seems to be another concession to "our people" in the interest of protection.

But the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] very well asks our friends on the other side: Why do you not go all along the whole line, and when you are dealing out protection in this industry give it not only in cotton duck, but in all the manufactured articles; give it not simply on coarse goods, but give an increased ad valorem duty on the finer goods, and thus enable the people who are engaged in this industry to get fair living wages for their work? Why discriminate against one American laborer while conceding protection to another? It seems to me only an additional step in the direction in which this committee have gone toward making a bill that is protective once in a while, sometimes by accident, though in this case it seems to be by design, while in other directions it is not protective; and that is never by accident, but always by design.

The amendment of Mr. WILSON of West Virginia was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Page 69, paragraph 415, line 21, at the end of line add, "and sweat-leathers, bindings, bands, and tips, when cut to length for trimming felt or wool hats;" so that the paragraph will read:

"Braids, plaits, laces, and similar manufactures composed of straw, chip, grass, palm leaf, willow, osier, or rattan, suitable for making or ornamenting hats, bonnets, and hoods, and sweat-leathers, bindings, bands, and tips, when cut to length for trimming felt or wool hats."

Mr. EVERETT. That is inconsistent.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Then that makes it in harmony with the rest of this bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, let the amendment be again reported.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. I wish the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means would state what was the duty on these articles in the bill as originally reported.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I have no data by which I could give the gentleman that information; these articles are nowhere specially named in the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Then they were included among articles of this class not otherwise provided for at a duty of 30 per cent?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. They are included in several schedules.

Mr. PAYNE. This is a manufactured article, of course.

Mr. COOMBS. It is not made in this country.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, yes.

Mr. COOMBS. Not to any extent; it never has been.

Mr. PAYNE. We had this matter before the Committee on Ways and Means in 1890. This class of manufactured articles has been on the dutiable list, I believe, ever since the Walker tariff. It is a finished manufactured product.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I suppose that the explanation of this proposition is that it is a concession, a "sop," offered to the hat-makers of this country, who are very much agitated over the duties in this bill. I suppose this is a little sugar-coated pill offered to the laborers in that branch of industry. The committee promise to wipe out two or three other industries for the purpose of trying to get the hat-makers to submit to their bill. Of course they can not do it in any such way as this. Of course the amendment will be adopted. Of course any amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means will be adopted; but in behalf of the men who manufacture these articles I simply wish to offer my protest and have the House understand it now.

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is designed to assist an industry which has never been assisted under Republican management. Wherever the tariff legislation of that party has benefited the hat industries 5 per cent by a tariff for protection, it has injured them 25 per cent by tariffs on their raw material. The object on this side of the House is to give the hat industries of this country a chance that they never have had before.

Mr. PAYNE. I wish to ask my colleague [Mr. COOMBS] whether this amendment has been offered at his suggestion.

Mr. COOMBS. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I would like to know where this industry is that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COOMBS] says the amendment is intended to benefit.

Mr. COOMBS. All through New Jersey; and Brooklyn has a part of it.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. What industry is it?

Mr. COOMBS. The hat industry—the manufacture of felt and wool hats.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Are these establishments found in your district?

Mr. COOMBS. Some of them are—not in my present district, but in my former district. I know the industry thoroughly; and I know that it is an industry that should be encouraged.

Mr. PAYNE. Then this amendment is for the purpose of encouraging the hat-makers?

Mr. COOMBS. It is for the purpose of encouraging the manufacture of hats by taking off the burdens under which that industry has labored heretofore.

Mr. DE FOREST. Mr. Chairman, a gentleman on the other side of the House has asked the gentleman from New York [Mr. COOMBS] whether this amendment has been offered at his suggestion or whether he is interested as a representative in this kind of industry. I want to say that I am most emphatically interested. The town of Danbury, in which I suppose more of the fur-hatting business is carried on than in any other place in the United States, is in my district. Now, it has been stated by eminent authority that four thousand or more men who are now out of employment in Danbury, locked out of the shops there, owe their unfortunate condition to the proposed change in the tariff. Nothing could be farther from the truth; nothing could be more false than that assertion.

The fact is that the suspension of operations in the hatting factories of Danbury is due to a persistent effort on the part of manufacturers there to crush out the "trades unions." The fact is that this effort has been carried on almost from the time the McKinley bill went into operation. The manufacturers told their employés that if they would come down here to Washington and go before the Ways and Means Committee when the McKinley bill was under consideration, and advocate the duties proposed in that bill, it would inure to their benefit. Those employés came here, and the duties were secured.

But almost before those men had returned, the manufacturers began to talk about the necessity of reducing their force and of cutting down their expenses and of turning away certain of their employés. They began to talk about changing the arrangement which had been maintained there between the trades unions and the manufacturers' association for seven years, to the great benefit of all concerned. And because the men would not yield to the proposition which was made by these manufacturers, they shut the shops. The closing of those shops had no connection with this proposed change in the tariff law.

But I have been there myself and talked with these 4,000 men who have been locked out, or some of them, the men whose names have been used by gentlemen of high authority in the course of this controversy, in support of the proposition that the present depression in business is caused by the proposed change in the tariff. I say I have talked with the men representing these 4,000 operatives out of employment, and not one that I met or talked with desired to have the present duty retained on the manufactured hats, but they were unanimous in their desire to have the materials put on the free list and that as soon as possible.

Mr. PAYNE. Was this change made at your suggestion?

Mr. DE FOREST. It was, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. How long have these men been locked out?

Mr. DE FOREST. Since sometime in November.

Mr. PAYNE. Last November?

Mr. DE FOREST. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. About the time that men were becoming idle all over the country?

Mr. DE FOREST. I understand the suggestion of the gentleman, but if he will take the pains to look into the manifesto issued by the manufacturers of Danbury, Conn., he will see it contains the assertion that the suspension of operations in the hat industry is due to the pending tariff bill is utterly false and without any foundation in fact.

Mr. PAYNE. Did not the manufacturers claim that in view of the condition there and throughout the country they must reduce wages?

Mr. DE FOREST. No, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. Was it not because of the state of trade and the condition of finances generally?

Mr. DE FOREST. No, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. Why was it?

Mr. DE FOREST. It was on the grounds of their inability to come to any arrangement with the trades unions.

Mr. PAYNE. Exactly; the trades union wanted higher wages and the manufacturers lower wages. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Oh, gentlemen, you need not laugh; I will give you the facts before I am through.

Mr. DE FOREST. The trades union simply desired to continue the arrangement under which the business was then being carried on throughout the country, I will say in answer to the question.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, now, please answer the question I have asked you. Was it not because the manufacturers claimed that they must pay lower wages because of the uncertainty of tariff legislation by this Congress?

Mr. DE FOREST. No, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. Was it not a fact that because of the uncertainties of the tariff the manufacturers could not carry on their business without a reduction of wages?

Mr. DE FOREST. They claim——

Mr. PAYNE (continuing). Did not they try to reduce wages on that ground?

Mr. DE FOREST. I will tell the gentleman. They said it was necessary to make different arrangements with the trades unions in favor of lower prices because of domestic competition.

Mr. PAYNE. Now there has been a good deal of amusement here, especially on the other side, in the last minute or two, because I asked the gentleman the question if the manufacturers did not want to reduce the wages. Why should they not want to reduce them? They are mere human beings like ourselves. I have never claimed otherwise. [Derisive laughter on the Democratic side.] They do not go out into the streets like our friend from Ohio [Mr. JOHNSON] and hunt up men to pay higher wages to. What I want to do is to put the manufacturers of this country in condition such that they can pay higher wages; and one thing is certain, that the workingmen of this country, organized as they are, when the manufacturers shall have been enabled to pay higher wages, will compel them to do so. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. PAYNE. But, on the other hand, if you deprive the manufacturers of the power of paying high wages, if you take from them the sale of their commodities at a fair living rate, then you deprive them of the power of paying higher wages, and they can not do it whether the men they employ are organized or not. That is the difference, and I hope some of you will understand it now.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. SIMPSON. The gentleman, as I understand it——

Mr. COCKRAN. I simply wanted to ask my colleague one question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to his colleague?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, certainly.

Mr. COCKRAN. I wanted to ask the gentleman whether he considers that the rate of wages depends on the demands of the trades unions or on the law of supply and demand?

Mr. SIMPSON. That is the question I wanted to ask the gentleman myself.

Mr. PAYNE. I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. COCKRAN. Well, please let us have an answer to the question. I don't want miscellaneous information. I asked the gentleman a direct question on that subject, and hope he will give a direct answer.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, what I said was simply this, that you must give a man the ability first to pay the wages. If he can get enough for his commodities to enable him to pay the high wages, he will be able to do it.

Mr. COCKRAN. But will he do it?

Mr. WALKER. Yes; every time.

Mr. PAYNE. He will not do it of his own free will, unless he is compelled to do it by trades unions. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The trades unions will compel him and can compel him to do it if he has the ability to do it.

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman answer one more question? Did Mr. Carnegie and the proprietors of the Homestead works have abundant means to meet their laborers' demands when the strike occurred there?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know. I am not familiar with Mr. Carnegie's business. If he can make steel rails as cheaply as my friend from Ohio [Mr. JOHNSON] says he can under his two hundred and two patents, then he did have the ability. If he can not make them as cheaply, then he may not have had the ability. I have never seen any investigation of that strike that threw any light on the subject as to whether Mr. Carnegie had the ability or not.

Mr. COCKRAN. The last statement explains the gentleman's position. He has evidently spoken without information on the whole subject. [Laughter on the Democratic side and cries of derision on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Now, my friend is up to his old tricks. I want to say one thing——

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. I want to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will suspend until order is restored on the floor. The committee must proceed in order.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say one thing more to my colleague.

Mr. COCKRAN. If my colleague from New York desires to ask me any further questions, I am willing to answer them.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to make one further observation in answer to the gentleman's last jocose remark, which seems to have been taken for an argument on the gentleman's side of the House.

Mr. COCKRAN. There is no demand for anything else.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say in reference to Mr. Carnegie, that if reports are true, a Democratic member of the committee which investigated that strike said, when he had found out what the wages paid to Mr. Carnegie's men were, that they were the highest wages that he ever heard of in this country or any other. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COCKRAN. And yet, Mr. Chairman, when the trades unions sought to maintain those wages, they were met by bullets. [Cries of "Oh!" on the Republican side.] They were met by bullets in the hands of the hired assassins of a protected industry. [Applause on the Democratic side and manifestations of derision on the Republican side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. I thought the Democratic governor sent the militia down there.

Mr. COCKRAN. Yes, the Democratic governor sent the officers of the law to supplant the volunteers of anarchy and of assassination. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Did they not carry some bullets down there with them?

Mr. COCKRAN. They did, but they did not have occasion to use them, for those men, and I may say all the people of this country, have always shown their readiness to submit to law, just as they are ready to resist oppression, invasion, and armed aggression in the hands of any unauthorized power. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And the whole question, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am glad I am going to have my friend's assistance in asserting the rights and dignities of this House, which have been trampled upon——

Mr. COCKRAN. The gentleman may always rely upon my assistance to maintain the dignity and the rights of this House when he first shows that he understands them himself. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will show you to-morrow morning after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. COCKRAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, my friend from New York, my colleague [Mr. PAYNE], has placed this question before the committee in a shape in which it can be disposed of in the briefest possible space. He tells us that the theory upon which this protective system is maintained is to stimulate the profits in the hands of the manufacturers, and then trust to the trades unions to get those profits out of the manufacturers. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] We believe in putting the profits in the first instance into the hands of the laborers. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WALKER. How?

Mr. COCKRAN. By increasing the demand for their labor and increasing production in this country. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BLACK] says the object of this bill is to reduce wages and make this country less attractive to immigration. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COCKRAN. I am not responsible for the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BLACK] or the statement of any other gentleman, as I imagine that the members of the Republican minority do not want to be responsible for all that is said by the gentleman from Maine. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. But you are standing on the same platform——

Mr. COCKRAN. I did not quite understand the gentleman's remark.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But you and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BLACK] pretend to be standing upon the same platform.

Mr. COCKRAN. We make no pretenses. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. You declare yourselves——

Mr. COCKRAN. We make statements in the English language, which this House is competent to understand. So far as I am concerned I know, and so far as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BLACK] is concerned I believe, that we both want to state the truth about every matter on which we address the House.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Then you want to get within about 4 miles of each other if you are going to try to stand upon the same platform. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, the platform of the Democratic party is not only 4 miles wide, but 3,000 miles wide. It is wide enough to cover all the people who dwell in this universe. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Is it wide enough to take in Hawaii? [Great laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COCKRAN. Yes, that platform can take in the largest as well as the smallest, the United States as well as Hawaii, the gentleman from Maine as well as the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. God save the Queen! [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Great confusion in the Hall.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has the floor. The committee will be in order. Gentlemen standing in front of the Chair will please resume their seats, and the committee will suspend business until order is restored. The Chair can not maintain order unless the committee will assist him.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I desire rather to state my own position than to have my friendly colleague from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] state it for me, because I have noticed that he is in the habit of stating part of the truth, half truths, and of forgetting to state the whole truth. What I said was this: That we proposed to furnish to the manufacturer a market for his commodities. I repeated it three or four times—a market for his commodities, so that he might be enabled to convert them into cash, that he might have the wherewithal to pay his laborers; and when you give him that, when you give him that market, you put him in a position——

A MEMBER on the Democratic side. "Louder."

Mr. PAYNE (continuing). Where, if his laborers come to him demanding pay for their work they might get it. What cuckoo was that cried "louder?" [Laughter on the Republican side.]

They might get pay for their work. My friend has seen fit to go to the Homestead strike, that unfortunate matter, unfortunate to the men engaged in it, unfortunate to the employers, unfortunate to the people connected with them. What does that illustrate? Simply that the passions of men became unbridled; and they quarreled over the subject of wages, it is true. It was unfortunate for the men, unfortunate for the proprietors; but it was something that might have occurred anywhere else in the world, and while these men were fighting for their rights more than 100,000 men in free-trade England, which you praise so much for her commercial system, were wandering up and down that isle seeking for work on a question of a reduction of their wages.

Such questions will arise wherever there are men with human nature; and it does not argue in favor of one system or another. What we contend is, that with this grand market, with consumers who are also producers; who are consumers because they are producers; who get the power to consume from the high wages they get from their employers—by this system employers can sell their products and sell them at a fairer price and pay a fair amount to every man who is willing to give his brain and muscle in producing in this country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COCKRAN. The gentleman has done us the favor of stating that he would place his own position before us in such a way that we would not only have half the truth, but a larger proportion of it. But as he does not say that he gave us the whole of it, I leave it to him to say whether that is all the truth or whether he has an installment in reserve.

M. PAYNE. I would say to my friend——

Mr. COCKRAN. I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PAYNE. I can talk longer than five minutes on this subject.

Mr. COCKRAN. But the point of the gentleman's argument that struck me with the greatest force was that admission of the breaking down of the machinery of distribution of profits on which he has based his reliance in the case. The trades union is the only method of distribution which he can name, and I challenge him to name another which will force the manufacturer to divide his profits with his laborers. I ask him how it worked in Homestead? Is there any union man employed there? Who is going to regulate the distribution of these profits now, in view of the fact that the very labor unions were wrecked in the contest for what they believed to be their share? I want the gentleman to answer that.

Mr. PAYNE. I have already stated the enormous price paid for wages at Homestead——

Mr. COCKRAN. That is too wide a distribution.

Mr. PAYNE. Whether that was all of the profits that that plant could pay or not I do not know, and my colleague does not know, but the results of that strike were these: Because the owners of those mills were willing to take a loss of hundreds of thousands rather than pay the higher wages, the inference is that these employers had given their employés the extreme limit of wages they could afford to pay.

Mr. COCKRAN. Why could they afford hundreds of thousands of dollars to fight them? Why would it not have been better to have made that a distribution and preserved the peace?

Mr. PAYNE. Because they thought it was better to lose perhaps two or three hundred thousand dollars for a few months than to increase wages for a lengthened period of time in a measure that would perhaps—I do not know—but that would perhaps ultimately destroy their business. [Derisive cheers on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COCKRAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have the statement in full at last. Now we can go to the country.

Mr. BOUTELLE rose.

Mr. COCKRAN. What does the gentleman from Maine desire?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman's effort to exhaust all the information on every subject two days in succession.

Mr. COCKRAN. Oh, I should never have attempted to talk to the gentleman from Maine if I wanted to exhaust information. [Laughter.] I do not wish that remark to be misunderstood, however. I do not mean to say that the gentleman from Maine is barren of information, but I mean to say that his information, such as it is, is exhaustless.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman has applied that same remark to nearly everybody; now, why not go on and apply it to everybody except himself, and then he will have it all his own way?

Mr. COCKRAN. Oh, no; I have applied it to you alone.

Mr. BOUTELLE. You have applied it to at least three gentlemen already.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, if I stated that any gentleman was exhaustless except the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], I did violence to the facts of history. [Laughter.] I move to strike out the last word now, so that I may get down to that basis of reason which has been established by my colleague [Mr. PAYNE].

We have, then, this proposition, that it was better for these protected employers to have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars to settle this question of wages, by reducing them, than to distribute that amount among their employés. But what was the method by which they accomplished the reduction? Why, by striking down the trades unions themselves, which my colleague [Mr. PAYNE] declares are the sole means of regulating wages by the distribution of profits. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, if this method of distribution, which is the only one my colleague can suggest, may be broken down as a salutary exercise of the power of capital, what is left for the protection of the laboring man to enable him to get his share of this robbery which you have made universal under the pretense that he was to be the chief beneficiary of it? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to stating to the gentleman from New York precisely what my view of this economic question is, and of the reason why these hard times to which he has referred are upon us. It is because your method of distribution was unequal, was unjust, was in the nature of pillage rather than of division. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why are the laborers hungry and the manufacturers comfortable? What basis of division is that which enables these employers to look forward to this winter with composure, which forces the men over whose fate you gentlemen shed your tears, to wander in the streets hopeless, homeless, without food or shelter, while all around them the favored objects of your legislation are dwelling in comfort as a result of that legislation? [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, Jack Cade exhausted that style of argument more than five hundred years ago.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is faulty in his history. Jack Cade lived several hundred years ago.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I am exceedingly sorry that, with all the répertoire of eloquence which the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] has at his command, he should resort so frequently to that portion of it which is merely physical. [Laughter.] I want to present this matter simply and in a few words. The gentleman from New York wants to know why it is that men are traveling about the streets without work, and he says that it is because of the McKinley law——

Mr. COCKRAN. The gentleman is mistaken. He certainly does not wish to misquote me.

Mr. REED. Not at all.

Mr. COCKRAN. I said——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine yield?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRAN. I wish simply to make a statement of what I did say. I did not say that the suspension of industry now was due solely to the McKinley law. It is the result of long years of a false economic system. What I did say was that it was extraordinary that when the suspension came the workingmen should be plunged immediately into want, while the employers do not seem to have met with serious disaster.

Mr. REED. That is precisely what I am calling the attention of the committee to. The gentleman from New York, instead of giving reasons, which I think he knows, has seen fit to substitute attacks.

How easy it is to respond to that in a similar strain, and to say that the reason why the laborer is walking the streets to-day is the unfaithfulness of the Democratic party to their duty; because to-day all industry is arrested by reason of the mere threat of adopting another system.

The gentleman has indulged himself both to-day and on Saturday last in expressions of contempt for our industrial system, because under threat of changes business is paralyzed, and because the accumulated wealth of this country is too little to tide it over the difficulty. But unfortunately, throughout all the language which he has used on this subject, there went this continuous error; he made no distinction between wealth which is consumable and wealth which is intended to produce consumable wealth.

There is an immense amount of unconsumable wealth which is used in the production of other wealth existing in this country and in other countries; but from the very nature of the case, the amount of consumable wealth that there is in any country at any time is exceedingly limited. And I say to the gentleman that the strike of the British coal miners in free-trade England had the effect of putting a large portion of the population in that country in the condition of desolation in which ours is to-day. And in free-trade England and everywhere else in this world, when there is a suspension of business to the extent that there is now in this country, there will be a similar result.

Now, let me come for a moment to this question of wages. The gentleman says that it depends upon supply and demand. I say that is an utterly exploded doctrine. Wages depend upon the amount of the market, and also upon the nature of the workingman himself. I anticipate what the gentleman is going to say in response to the suggestions of other gentlemen on his side, that what they need is a more extensive market; that what they need is to go forth to the rest of the universe and obtain a market; and the method they propose is to obtain a market somewhere else by giving up the market that we have here. [Applause on the Republican side.] But we on our side believe in enlarging the market in a different fashion. We do not mean to go to the ends of the earth and struggle with the cheaper labor of the whole world. What we mean to do is to elevate the market of this country by giving higher wages to the laborers, and thereby constituting a market as broad as our production. [Applause.]

Now, let me say another thing. This is a selfish world; there is not a shadow of doubt about it. We are each of us seeking our own good, or our fancied good. We are each of us endeavoring to obtain the best we can out of life; free trade or protection makes no difference in human nature in that respect. Men in this country and men abroad are endeavoring to obtain what they can for wages and what they can for profit, and in this struggle there are certain underlying fundamental principles, among which is this: that when men reach a certain stage of civilization—supply or demand, or what not—they are going to have their wants supplied or they are going to make difficulty and trouble. And if you endeavor to crush down their wages so that their wants can not be supplied, you are going to create a condition of affairs which will reverse any action that this House may take which produces such a disaster. Wages can not be raised by mere volition. Sir Thomas Brassey said years ago that when his father in India raised voluntarily the wages of his Indian laborers, the result was that they simply stopped working when they had all their simplest wants supplied. When that point was reached no more work was done, even for higher wages.

Mr. COCKRAN. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Maine will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. REED. So that it is not the arbitrary fixation of wages, but it is the growth in intelligence, the growth in desires and wants of the laborer that forces a rise of wages. What is the direct means by which the laboring men reach this result? By labor unions, by combining, by making manufacturers understand that they must give higher wages. How are the manufacturers enabled to give higher wages? By increasing their product, which increase can only take place by the larger market which comes of these larger wages.

That is the secret of this matter. But there are limitations in this case just as there are to all human tendencies. The laboring man is struggling to supply his wants. He makes his demand on the manufacturer. The manufacturer is set to work to devise new inventions, and by the assistance of these he is able to supply these wants. But there is a limitation to inventions; there is a limitation to the capacity of the employer to enlarge his market. And those two things struggle together. In this country, with the laborer seeking to obtain higher wages and fewer hours of work and the demand of the public for lower prices, there is going on a tremendous struggle; and that is all the struggle that the inventive power of this country can sustain.

Now you propose, by bringing us in contact with a lower civilization without protection, to make the success of that struggle an absolute impossibility. You are crushing down the laboring man by your efforts: and you are thereby intensifying this struggle between the employer and his employés, which is liable to be fought out as long as selfishness reigns in this world. But, thank Heaven, the success, the good fortune, and the prosperity of the laboring man does not depend on these men who rend the heavens with their shouts of praise, but upon the laws of the Lord God Omnipotent. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side]. And among the laws of Omnipotence is the use of human brains by aid of law to provide the laborer with opportunities for work. [Renewed applause on the Republican side and in the galleries.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must remind visitors in the galleries that they are not permitted to make manifestations of approval or disapproval, and if there is a repetition the Chair will be compelled to cause the galleries to be cleared.

Mr. COCKRAN. The conclusion of my distinguished friend from Maine [Mr. REED], and an opportunity to listen to him is always a liberal education; the conclusion, I say, of his remarks explains the beginning of them, and adds a significant light to the examination which we can bestow upon them. He began by stating that much of the discussion on this side was physical; let me compliment him by saying that the conclusion of the protection argument is purely spiritual. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

In this way you will observe that the distinguished warrior who had entered the ring when his partisans were sore beset proves that his final reliance is on the Lord of Hosts rather than upon the reasoning power of the American people. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

But I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that there ought to be any contest between the two. My judgment is that every conclusion which the American people have reached in their history upon any great question has sooner or later come into direct conjunction and harmony with the laws of God; and the American people are moving in that direction now by this bill which is before the House. [Great cheering on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the committee will indulge me for a moment, I would like to take up the Republican position as it has been explained by the giant of the Republican party. [Laughter.] We have hitherto had the lesser lights attempting to explain it, but now we have at last got the explanation of the creed of protection from its highest authority. It is this, if I understand it, that we enrich the manufacturer by giving him protection against a lower level of civilization; and then the manufacturer in turn will proceed to enrich the laborer under the pressure of the demands of the trades unions. I hope that I am stating this question fairly. It will profit us little to make a statement which is not an accurate statement of the position of the other side and then proceed to combat it. If the gentleman from Maine is not satisfied with my statement I hope he will correct me.

Mr. REED. I think that anybody who listened to me would be surprised if I assented to your statement of what I said.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, that is not an unusual condition for those who listen to the gentleman from Maine. [Laughter.] The way in which he wound up his address this afternoon, while violating what we believe to be economic truths based upon the wisdom of God, by appealing to that same God leaves little room for surprise at anything he may say. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] But I will endeavor to state the proposition as the committee must have understood it, that the idea of protection is to so increase the profits of the manufacturer that he can afford to pay high wages to his men——

Mr. DINGLEY. No such proposition was ever made by any protectionist.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I trust that if any gentleman on the other side conceives that my statement is inaccurate or unfair he will correct me now

Mr. WALKER. We know it is, every one of us. [Laughter.]

Mr. COCKRAN. I intended to exclude the gentleman from Massachusetts from the operation of my remark, Mr. Chairman. [Laughter.] But let us see what the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has said. I am perfectly willing that he shall state it over again if he desires to.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Why should he?

Mr. COCKRAN. Well, I think he had better not, myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. I think it is entirely unnecessary.

Mr. COCKRAN. I think that in the hereafter he will be better pleased for his own sake if he does not; but at the same time I think it would be better for the purposes of this discussion that he should.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Everybody understood it except the gentleman from New York, and I think he understood it also.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I am speaking now to the gentleman from Maine, to whom his party turns for enlightenment and leadership. And since there is more than one gentleman from Maine, I desire to state that I was appealing to the late Speaker of the House [Mr. REED].

Now, if I understood this statement, and I trust I will be corrected if I be wrong, the gentleman says that there is a large amount of consumable wealth in this country, and he attempts to make a distinction between wealth which is consumable and wealth which is not. Now, if I could make that distinction, I could understand his argument, but according to the interpretation of all the economic laws that I have ever seen, all wealth is consumable. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There is no wealth that is not consumable.

Mr. WALKER. Land, houses, and such things.

Mr. COCKRAN. Why, land in itself is not capital. The right to use it may be capital. Land and labor in conjunction make capital. That which land produces is consumable, and that which is not consumable is not useful. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], who stated last Saturday that a river was not an advantage in manufacturing, is of course, capable of any statement, and I trust that this committee will relieve me from the necessity of treating his remarks seriously.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COCKRAN. I trust that I may be allowed to continue.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. COCKRAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, at the bottom of this whole protective system lies that fallacy which has been stated by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED]. All wealth is consumable. The capacity of a country to consume is not a factor in the creation of wealth, unless it is met by a greater capacity to produce. The capital of a country increases year by year by the amount of the annual production that can be saved from its revenue; but at the very basis of wealth lies the capacity to produce, for you can not save that which you do not have.

You can not divide what you have not got. You must have wealth produced before you have that wealth to divide. Now, the theory of the Democratic party on this economic question is that where by legislation you make production expensive you limit its amount, and I do not think any gentleman on this floor has disputed that if you limit the amount of production you limit the opportunity of labor to find employment.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has said with perfect truth that there is no such thing as charity in commerce. I agree with him. The contest of commerce is the contest for cheapness. In commerce the survival of the fittest is the domination of the cheapest, and that being so, we believe that because we can produce the chief staples and necessaries of life in this country cheaper than anywhere else, as the great republic of antiquity accomplished the military conquest of the world, the providence of God has ordered that this country shall complete the economical and industrial conquest of the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But in making that conquest, the widest facilities must be given to production; and believing as we do, and as you concede, that to cheapen production is to enlarge it, we think an abundant production furnishes a better field for the trades unions to claim for labor a larger reward than a narrow production. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We believe that if we can increase the productive capacity of this country $500,000,000 a year, there is no law of God or man that will prevent the laborer getting his share of that increase. We believe, on the other hand, that if you restrict production, you may keep the profits of the manufacturer as large as they are now, but you must necessarily reduce the profits of labor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

As my friend from Maine [Mr. REED] says, there is no charity in commerce. I may add to his statement that there is no room for charity in commerce.

That the wages of labor depend upon the law of supply and demand is a proposition so evident that I never expected to have heard it denied on this floor by a gentleman to whom a great part of the intelligent thought of this country looks up for guidance. I had never supposed that the value of any material or element of wealth depended upon any other law than that of supply and demand. But I regard the statement of the gentleman from Maine on this subject as the crowning admission of the correctness of the position occupied by the majority. I am willing to leave this dispute on the issue which he has framed. If the laws of supply and demand do not control the price of labor, then you gentlemen of the minority are right. If the laws of supply and demand do control the price of labor, then according to your own statement we are right, and on that issue we challenge the verdict of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I call for a vote on the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. WILSON of West Virginia was agreed to.

Mr. BURROWS. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will rise to receive a message from the Senate.

The committee rose informally to receive a message from the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 757) to provide for the erection of a first-class fog signal at or near the present position of the Cape Arago light station; and

A bill (S. 1126) granting to the Des Moines Rapids Power Company the right to erect, construct, operate, and maintain a wing dam, canal, and power station in the Mississippi River, in Hancock County, Ill.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its session.

The committee accordingly resumed its session.

Mr. BURROWS. I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour has arrived for the committee to rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted:

To Mr. SHERMAN, indefinitely, on account of a death in his family.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, there are many members I know who have a large number of papers, and they desire to know whether we can safely leave them on the desks, or whether the Hall would be open for a mass meeting I desire a ruling of the Chair in regard to the rule which provides that the presiding officer shall not even entertain any motion or request to use the Hall for any other purpose than legislative business. That is the provision of Rule XXIV, and I desire to get a ruling of the Chair upon that rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that not only is it not in order to adopt a resolution permitting the occupancy of the floor by other than members; but the Speaker is denied the right even to submit a motion for unanimous consent that such an order be made.

Mr. BURROWS. And the rules of the House are and have been specific on that point. I understand a mass meeting was held here the other night. I wanted a ruling on the question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I want to say, in justice to the action the other night, both sides of the House were represented; unanimous consent was asked, and no objection was made.

Mr. BURROWS. But the rule provides that the Chair shall not entertain a request for unanimous consent; and we think that the Hall ought to be saved for the use of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. At the inauguration consent was given, and also during the consideration of the Mills bill persons who were not members were frequently on the floor.

Mr. BURROWS. I asked for a ruling, and the Speaker has very properly decided that it was not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he is not aware of any instance when the House was in discharge of a legislative duty that the doors have been opened. The Chair has only known of one or two exceptions, that of the counting of a vote, or a funeral service, or something like that; but the Chair has never known it happen on a legislative day, and it will not do so again by the assent of the Chair.

The gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BROOKSHIRE) will discharge the duties of the Chair this evening. The House will now take a recess until 8 o'clock, the evening session to be devoted to debate only on the pending bill.

And accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House was declared in recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 8 o'clock p. m. by Mr. BROOKSHIRE, as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is in session for the purpose of general debate only upon the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the special order.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for debate on the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The title was again read.

Mr. POWERS Mr. Chairman, It is greatly to be regretted, sir, that a system of taxation which concerns the people of the greatest and grandest nation on the footstool, is to be formulated at the behests of a party caucus. It would rather seem to be the part of wisdom—to be the part of patriotism, and more in the line of statesmanship, to employ in its structure all the features that experience has demonstrated to be wise and efficient, wheresoever they were cast, and by whomsoever they were fashioned.

It avails little to say that Washington and Hamilton were protectionists or free traders unless, under their administration of a tariff law, they discovered in its workings a superior advantage to the people in one or the other policy. It adds nothing to the sum of our wisdom to say that we are one in the family of nations and that it is a natural right that a free citizen has to buy where he can buy cheapest and sell where he can sell dearest.

We are considering a policy, a scheme, a plain business problem, how to provide revenues to meet the enormous and rapidly growing needs of a government of seventy millions of people, with interests as diversified and numberless as the leaves of the forest, a system of taxation that shall realize the needed revenue by imposing the lightest practicable pressure upon the people. In such a work, where is the possible chance for a patriotic man to display the virus of partisanship, or to contemplate possible political advantage? If we proposed a system of direct taxation upon the property of our citizens—property indifferently owned by all partisans—nobody would quote political platforms as the watchword of action. If we proposed to collect all needed revenues by a tax upon corporate and individual income, would there naturally be an alignment of parties, one for and another opposed to the details of the plan.

Now, to-day, we are all agreed on the plan. All parties, from the foundation of the Government to date, have, in accord with the policy of all civilized nations, finally, fully, and unreservedly declared that there is no method for raising funds to carry on the Government that works with so little friction and accomplishes the appointed end so imperceptibly as that of a tariff upon imports. But the moment we attempt to prescribe details the statesman is lost in the politician, and the question is not where the money will come from, but where the most votes will come from.

The existing law now on the statute book was framed along the lines of protection to American industries. The proposed law will radically change or completely overthrow this policy, and the burden of proof is upon the proponents of the new law to show that evils exist under the present policy which will be cured by the new.

First, and in importance the most decisive objection urged against the protective policy is the startling declaration in the Chicago platform, which has been so often quoted on this floor as to show that it has been adopted as the Blarney stone of the Democratic party, that protection to domestic industries is unconstitutional; and echoing this charge, my colleague on the Judiciary Committee [Mr. LANE], a thoroughgoing lawyer, seeks to demonstrate it by citing numerous dicta from the text-books and from our courts declaring that taxation can be imposed for public purposes only, and if imposed for private ends it is invalid and ultra vires.

My learned friend put himself to great, unnecessary labor when he collated authorities to prove that proposition. No man outside a lunatic asylum ever disputed his proposition, and no lawyer inside a lunatic asylum was ever so unbalanced as to affirm the contrary. The difficulty with the gentleman's logic is in his definition of a public purpose. The very books he quoted and the countless decisions in our courts, both State and Federal, have uniformly held that if the primary object of a proposed tax is to subserve public ends, the appropriation of money from the public treasury to accomplish such ends is strictly within constitutional limitations, even though private interests are incidentally subserved. The Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly held that municipal aid to private railroad corporations, which implies the power of taxation, was a valid exercise of the taxing power, because the interests of the general public were promoted, although the same act advanced a private interest.

Courts all over the Union have held that towns and cities might expend public money in supplying themselves with water for fire and domestic uses, and this being the primary purpose a private end might be accomplished by renting the surplus water to private persons. The exact statement of the rule is this: If the proposed appropriation is designed to meet a public demand and subserve a public good, it is held to be valid, although in carrying it into effect it be made incidentally or intentionally to foster a private good. And conversely, if it is primarily designed to serve a private purpose, but incidentally promotes the public good, it is invalid.

It is needless to multiply cases holding this rule. Every lawyer knows they are so uniform that the doctrine has now become elementary. Now, the protective policy of a tariff law rests on this precise ground. Duties or taxes are laid upon imports for the primary purpose of raising public revenue. In laying such duties the classes of imports to be selected for duty, the classes to be admitted free, the amounts to be fixed on one and another, and all details of method are necessarily and properly and legitimately left to be determined by the legislative branch of the Government exercising the function of taxation. This is the rule under any form of taxation you may adopt. If you lay an income tax will you not say what incomes shall pay and what go free, and do you not thus protect the incomes you exempt?

Has not Congress always and State Legislatures always when exercising the power of taxation selected in their discretion the objects upon which the burden should rest, and excused such objects from the burden as they pleased? Why, then, in laying duties upon foreign goods, which is nothing more nor less than laying a tax, may not Congress admit to the free list such as it deems best? Why may it not lay the duty on one class of goods at one rate, and upon another at a different rate; and, in the name of law, in the name of patriotism, in the name of reason, in the name of justice, in the name of national pride, in the name of every consideration that makes for the honor, happiness, and prosperity of our people, may it not lay a duty on those imports which compete in American markets with American products?

We have had a tariff with protective features most of the time since the foundation of the Government. Is it not remarkable that with all its inherent wickedness nobody has had the courage to make a case for the courts and get it judicially declared to be robbery?

Again, it is a familiar rule in the construction of law, whether it be organic or statutory, that the construction given it at the time of its enactment by parties called to administer it shall have great weight. If our Constitution forbids the laying of duties in a way to foster domestic industries, we should expect to hear Washington and Madison and Jefferson and their contemporaries say so. It is a well-known fact that Madison and Jefferson were strict constructionists of the Constitution, and yet Mr. Madison in a message to Congress in December, 1815, recommended a tariff act that would both raise revenue and promote manufactures.

To Mr. Madison more than any other man is due the credit of formulating the letter of the Federal Constitution, and to him we can safely turn to learn its true spirit. Not only were Washington, Jefferson, and Hamilton in accord with him on this question, but the doctrine itself became sound orthodoxy in the Democratic creed of that day and for many years after. Mr. Monroe, in his message to Congress in December, 1823, recommended a revision of the tariff for the purpose of affording additional protection to manufactures.

Gen. Jackson, the next old-fashioned Democrat in line, and I may add the best Democrat to be found either in the old-fashioned or new-fashioned ranks, in a letter to Dr. Coleman, of North Carolina, dated April 26, 1824, and published in the Raleigh (N. C.) Star, written when he was for the first time a candidate for the Presidency, in speaking of our natural advantages, says:

> Heaven smiled upon and gave us liberty and independence. That same Providence has blessed us with the means of national independence and national defense. If we omit or refuse to use the gifts which He has extended to us, we deserve not the continuation of His blessings. He has filled our mountains and our plains with minerals, with lead, iron, and copper, and given us climate and soil for the growing of hemp and wool. These being the grand materials of our national defense, they ought to have extended to them adequate and fair protection, that our own manufactories and laborers may be placed on a fair competition with those of Europe, and that we may have within our country a supply of those leading and important articles so essential in war.

Further on in the same letter he says:

> In short, sir, we have been too long subject to the policy of the British merchants. It is time that we should become a little more Americanized, and instead of feeding the paupers and laborers of England feed our own, or else in a short time, by continuing our present policy, we shall be rendered paupers ourselves.

How nicely, Mr. Chairman, old-fashioned and new-fashioned Democracy dovetails together. These words of Jackson sound like the words of McKinley, and it would not surprise me to learn that they were fresh in the ears of Ohio Democrats on the first Tuesday of last November.

It is safe, I apprehend, to assume that a tariff laid for revenue in a way to encourage or preserve domestic industries will stand the test of constitutional inquisition.

But if the protective policy is invalid on constitutional grounds, the Wilson bill if enacted will be an unconstitutional law. It is confessedly protective in some of its schedules and the only genuine Simon-pure Democrats of the new-fashioned school, having the courage of their convictions, to wit: Chales A. Dana, Henry Watterson, and TOM L. JOHNSON have the frankness to say that it is protective through and through, from end to beginning, and "when you see a thing in the Sun it is so." [Laughter.]

The excuse given for making the bill moderately protective is that it would disturb settled business and reduce values if all protection were withheld. But you say that protection is robbery, and the manufacturing classes are robbing labor of its just share of reward. If a robber has invaded your house and is engaged in lugging off your goods, do you refuse to arrest him on the plea that it will disturb his business and unsettle his values? The Simon-pures are exactly right according to the Chicago platform, and if you propose to be guided by that "bill of rights" you can do no otherwise than tax tea, coffee, sugar, and everything else that would yield revenue.

When you take counsel of your fears and decline to wholly lift the burdens of a robber tariff, you give away your case. That you really intend an ultimate policy of free trade is demonstrated in your purpose to create a deficit and then supply it by an income tax, thus changing the plan of taxation for the support of Government from that we have used for a hundred years, and that which every civilized nation under the sun has used and now uses except England, namely, a tax upon imports. You are following in the footsteps of England—a nation that embraced the protective policy for three centuries and never gave it up until she had made the island a workshop from one end to the other, and which to-day is the warmest friend that the Wilson bill has on the face of the earth.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are told that the people gave the Democratic party last year a commission to do the work contemplated by the Wilson bill, and however unpatriotic, un-American, and unwise it may be, the commands of this warrant must be obeyed. The party practically concedes that it feels much as the sheriff does who holds a writ of possession to oust a poor family from its homestead. What need, however, has the Democratic party for credentials when it enters upon the work of raising sheol with American industries and American homes? Is not the propensity a birthright? Was it not born in them?

In the light of recent events in Iowa, Ohio, New York, New Jersey, and Massachusetts, it turns out, however, that you have not correctly construed your warrant. You have gone beyond the command of the writ and are wrongdoers ab initio.

The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in his speech a few days since, declared that the purpose of his bill was to alleviate the burdens that the consumers of the country were supporting under the workings of the present protective system, and, amid deafening Democratic cheers, declared that the producer was made for the consumer, not the consumer for the producer.

If it were possible to draw a line that would leave the producers on one side and consumers on the other, his argument would have great force. But he seems to forget that in fact no such division can be made, for the reason that everybody belongs to both classes. The farmer produces horses, beef, pork, corn, wheat, oats, hay, potatoes, cotton, rice, tobacco, etc., to be consumed by the doctor, lawyer, minister, mechanic, merchant, and every other class in the community, but at the same time, the farmer is the consumer of the mechanic's work, the doctor's pills, the minister's sermons, the lawyer's services, and the merchant's goods. Who, then, shall be called the consumer in this enumeration? The gentleman's logic is manifestly unsound, for every man in the nation produces something and consumes something, with the exception of the dude; and, indeed, he is no exception, for he produces a sensation. Laughter.]

The fact being patent that the interdependence of all classes of society upon each other makes any arbitrary division among them impossible, it follows logically that one is as much entitled to the fostering care of the Government as any other. As Burke said of liberty, if it is good for one, it is good for all.

Again, the gentleman with great satisfaction announces tha he has relieved the burdens of taxation, because he has placed certain articles, which he denominates raw materials, upon the free list. Coal, iron, lumber, and wool are to be admitted free of duty. This change of policy it is claimed will help the manufacturer, who employs labor; raise the wages of the workingman who is employed by the manufacturer, and reduce the price of the manufactured article to the consumer. This is a problem in the old rule of three, and is easily solved by the doctrinaires of the Ways and Means Committee.

If you take the tariff off raw materials you save the manufacturer so much in the cost of his manufactured product, but if you add the same amount to the wages of his workmen, I have not yet been able to see how the consumer is to get the product at any less price. But what about this figment of raw materials? Who asks that they should be admitted to the free list? Who is to be benefited by it? What practical good can come to the farmer, the mechanic, the professional man, or the workingman if you give them free bituminous coal and free iron ore? They can not gain it indirectly from the products of the manufacturer, because you keep the duty on the manufactured product. Nobody in the world could receive any benefit, except the manufacturer himself, and he is not asking it.

The fact is, that this cry for free raw materials originated in the fertile brain of a few amateur politicians in Massachusetts, who used it to hoodwink the people of that State with great success for a brief time, and it worked so well there, and not being patented, it was seized upon by the Democratic party as a slogan for the last campaign.

But what are raw materials? Take a concrete case. The Wilson bill admits all manufactured lumber free because it is a raw material. Now, the gentlemen composing the Committee on Ways and Means are all learned and scholarly men, and know a thing when they see it. If they would like accurately to define raw materials in the lumber trade, let them put on a sheep's gray suit of clothes made from American wool, a pair of boots made of American rubber, a cap made from the skin of the American bear, shoulder an ax made up in Maine, take a dinner pail made of American tin and filled with American pork, American beans, American doughnuts, and American cheese, and start out some morning with the thermometer at 10 below, up the slopes of the Green Mountains, carrying a banner inscribed, "Science communing with nature," and standing, ax in hand, before a spruce tree 100 feet high and 4 feet through at the butt, and they will find they are confronted with a condition.

When they strike the first blow at the tree they will for the first time in their lives strike an idea, and that will be that they have at last found out what raw materials are in the lumber trade. They will learn that cutting the tree into logs involves an expenditure of capital and labor, and is a step in a manufacturing process; that hauling the logs to the mill involves an expenditure of capital and labor, and is a step in a manufacturing process; that sawing the log into boards, planks, and dimension stuff involves an expenditure of capital and labor, and is a step in a manufacturing process; and when the product of the mill reaches our boundary line it comes, not a raw material, but a manufactured product. So that this bill, instead of supplying raw materials, steps in at the middle of the manufacturing process, and declares that we must give to Canada the benefit of all the capital and labor that has been employed down to this point of time. The labor employed in all these initial steps is the poorest paid and most deserving of consideration at the hands of the Government of any employed in the whole process, from the standing tree to the finished building.

Thus this sublime fallacy of free raw materials, when inspected, turns out to be not only a misnomer, but a very large-sized humbug. It is merely a device to give to Canada all the benefit of the labor that rightfully belongs to us, and to give all the profits to the manufacturers. Why this discrimination against American forests? Why did the God of Nature cover our mountain sides with the finest qualities of every name and kind of standing timber that ever waved in the breezes of heaven from Maine to California, from Oregon to Florida?

Why, Mr. Chairman, the value of the standing timber, hard and soft, in Vermont to-day, after a hundred years of harvest, probably exceeds the value of her open tillage land; exceeds the value of her marble quarries; exceeds the value of her granite quarries; is, in short, the most valuable natural asset she has. The same thing is true of Maine, of Michigan, of North Carolina, of Georgia, the Pacific Slope, and many other States. And not only this, these same mountains are pregnant with an untold wealth of lead, iron, granite, and marble, and we are told by this bill to let them alone—do not disturb their covering—you will make an ugly looking hole in the ground; with 2,000,000 starving laborers in the land to-day, buy your lumber in Canada and keep her laborers employed; buy your granite in Scotland and your marble in Italy, and keep their laborers employed; buy your iron in Norway and your coal in Nova Scotia, and keep their laborers from starving. All this in the name of tariff reform!

Let it rather be said, on the other hand, that the first duty of Congress is to make laws that will promote the happiness, well-being, and prosperity of America. All this natural wealth was deposited here for the use of Americans. If the Almighty had intended that we should use Italian marble He would have located Carrara in Vermont or Tennessee.

But they tell us that protection to American industries is selfishness. So is patriotism, and still we are taught from the cradle to the grave that one of the noblest traits of character is the love of one's own country. Love it better than any, than all others. Even die for it. Is this not selfishness? And what are we to love if it is not everything that makes our country lovable? Her manhood, her industries, her moral and material prosperity. Her boundless natural wealth of mine, mineral, and forest. All which is lovable because it can minister to our happiness if the Wilson bill does not compel us to seek happiness, like defaulting cashiers, in Canada. [Laughter.]

The reason assigned for the proposed onslaught upon American industries is that the people are excessively taxed by the McKinley act now in force, and the Committee of Ways and Means is the physician called to cure this ailment of the body politic. The first duty of an intelligent physician is to correctly diagnose the case he has in hand; the next to prescribe the proper remedy. Are the people excessively taxed by the McKinley bill? Are they suffering from Federal taxation? What Federal taxation affects them? The Chicago platform says that in one Western State the mortgage indebtedness is $165 per capita of its population. If that indebtedness was created by the McKinley act, it is worthy of consideration here. If not, the announcement is an attempted deception of the people.

The only Federal taxation that affects the people is that imposed by the tariff, and that imposed by the internal-revenue tax laid on whisky and manufactured tobacco. The tariff tax is laid on foreign goods only. American goods of course are free. If an American buys a foreign-made article which is on the dutiable list he may pay a tax. If he drinks whisky he is sure to. Under the McKinley bill all the necessaries of life, like tea, coffee, and sugar, are on the free list. The luxuries are taxed. Now, how many of the farmers of that Western State, while their mortgage indebtedness has been growing, have paid a copper for any article of foreign growth or manufacture, and thus been compelled to pay a tax? Not one in fifty. And so it is everywhere.

The people as a whole do not pay a copper toward the support of the General Government. The man of wealth and the man of fastidious taste will many times buy foreign dutiable goods, but the plain people of this country as a rule buy American goods on which there is no tax. It is not true that our own goods bear higher prices because of the tariff on the foreign article. Every intelligent man knows that the prices of home-made goods are lower to-day than they were in 1860, when the protective tariff came into being. The tendency year by year since that date has been downward. Abnormal conditions may have, in individual instances, marked an exception, but the exception only proves the rule. As a whole the necessaries of life are cheaper.

It follows, then, if the American people will board at home and clothe themselves at home and let rum and tobacco alone, they are practically exempt from Federal taxation. That the people are heavily taxed is true. But it is municipal taxes that they suffer from. Town, city, and county taxation is excessive all over the land, and these are the taxes the people vote upon themselves, and for which neither Congress nor the tariff is responsible.

When this Democratic doctor, then, proposes by his dose of free trade to cure our political ills, he proves himself a quack as a physician and a worse one as a metaphysician.

In my own State, the effects of the Wilson bill will be disastrous. Everything the farmer produces is reduced in value. Horses, cattle, hay, oats, potatoes, eggs, corn, wheat, rye, barley, wool, pork, lumber—in short our entire agricultural industry is subjected to a ruinous competition with like products in Canada, where the women and cheap farm hands do the labor; where wages are lower and the scale of living vastly inferior. Not only this, our marble, granite, slate, and lime industries are disastrously affected if not absolutely ruined. Canada is doubly fortunate. She has a parliament at Ottawa honestly and patriotically striving to legislate for the good of her people and another at Washington legislating in the same direction.

But the farmer is not alone affected. Our manufacturers of woolen and knit goods must throw a large number of persons out of employment. I have received many letters and remonstrances from both employers and employés, protesting against this monstrous infamy, and can confidently assure the House that the workingmen of Vermont do not belong to the class of men who can be coerced by their employers into signing these remonstrances. They are reading, thinking, intelligent men, who carry their sovereignty under their own hats, and you might as well undertake to coerce Niagara to run the other way as to coerce a Vermont workingman to act against the dictates of his judgment. The Irishman, the Scotchman, the Welshman, and the Swede, who work in our mills and quarries, know that legislation which closes those mills and dismantles the derricks in those quarries is a blow at their wages, and have an altogether more intelligent apprehension of the effects of your legislation than the framers of the Chicago platform.

Labor is the source of all wealth, and the highest aim of legislation ought to be the continuous employment of all our labor in a way to swell the grand aggregate of our wealth. If this policy be preserved, labor will be well paid, the workingman's condition improved; he may enjoy the comforts and luxuries of a home and lift his children to a higher level and a broader plane in the race of life. Under our system of government we can not afford to depress labor. It should be and it is as honorable to produce wealth from the bowels of the earth as to produce it on the surface of the earth. No policy is safe that reduces our workingmen to the low wages and consequent low status in life that has overtaken the peasantry of the Old World.

The policy of protection to American industries means good wages to employés. It should be our policy to build up and maintain a home market, for it is more steady and certain than the foreign market. Our population doubles in twenty-five years; that of Europe in a hundred years. If our production and consumption is in the same ratio of increase, as they doubtless are, our production would increase in a ratio four times as great as the demands of the foreign market would call for. While we want both, it is evident that the home market is by far the most important.

This being so, it belongs to Americans in preference to foreigners. Our producers help pay our taxes, fight our battles, and uphold our flag. The foreign producer fires at, but never in defense of our flag. Who has the better right to the American markets? Our producers have all the competition at home that they can withstand, but if the foreign producer will pay a license fee large enough to meet the difference in wages and advantages he enjoys over our producers, he is welcome to compete in our markets. He will at least pay a large share of our Federal taxes, and thus the home producer is pro tanto benefited.

Hitherto in the warfare between the protective system and the free-trade policy, the South has generally been arrayed against the North. This in former years was largely due to the different labor conditions in the two sections, the South having the advantage of cheap labor. But the day for sectional advantage has happily passed. No adherence to old traditions should longer divide us. No conservatism, as Douglas Jerrold would say, should preclude our looking upon the new moon because we were brought up to love the old one.

Moreover, you of the South have the advantage of climate, have a wealth of coal and iron that will, if developed, as it surely will be, make some of your States another Pennsylvania, and within ten years you will be knocking at the doors of Congress for protection to your coal, iron, and lumber industries. You will demand it for your cotton against the competing crop of Mexico, fostered by American capital, and that of Egypt, fostered by English capital. Of all sections of our country, you are the last that should destroy the protective policy.

But it is said that this system builds along our boundary lines a Chinese wall that shuts out the sunlight of prosperity. Be it so. You will, however, confess this: If we build this wall you may rest assured we shall give the job to American labor and employ in the structure American stone. Chinese wall! Why France and Germany and nearly every other commercial nation, including all the colonies of Great Britain, have had up this wall from time immemorial. Has our nation had any difficulty in getting through the gates? Let the annual report of the Treasury Department, showing the fabulous figures of our exports to those countries, demonstrate the worth of your fears. Chinese wall! Have other nations had any difficulty in entering our gates on account of this wall? Let the fabulous figures of our imports for the past thirty years be your consolation and your hope.

Why, sir, in my State, where the wind sometimes drifts the snow to the depth of 5, 10, or 20 feet, railroad companies build high storm fences at exposed points along the track. They do not do this to stop the wind's blowing at all, but they say to old Boreas, "Blow all you please, but you must not stop the progress of our car." So we build our industrial barricade against the withering blasts of England's starvation-made competition, and say to her, "Blow about it all you please, but you must not stop the car of our progress."

Chinese wall! Do you not understand, Mr. Chairman, that the function of a wall is not only to keep things out, but to keep things in? Why, sir, our wall will be useful in a thousand ways. We need it to keep out that ceaseless tide of European paupers and criminals that is constantly flowing, without ebb, to our shores. We want it to keep that Queen of Hawaii, with her unpronounceable name, out, and we need it to keep Grover Cleveland in. [Laughter and applause.] If these lovers must coo and woo, let them do it as Pyramus and Thisbe did, through a hole in the wall. [Renewed laughter.]

We need it to break the force of that cyclone of British rapacity which, overriding every principle of commercial equity and every principle of everlasting justice, has reduced Ireland, an integral part of her own empire, to a state of beggary; has made English colonies on every parallel of latitude mere tributaries to her home wealth, and which compelled our own fathers, more than a century ago, to bleed at every pore in the battle for a system of American manufactures and for a home market that should not be controlled by the home government. Why, sir, so prominent a friend of the colonies as Lord Chatham declared in the British Parliament that in his judgment the American colonies ought not to be allowed to manufacture so much as a hobnail.

The Revolutionary war was waged to secure industrial independence of England, and the same battle is on to-day. We are fighting for the highest and noblest conception of free trade, the privilege of trading among ourselves. You are fighting to compel us to trade with England, who, as soon as she has crushed out our industries by her mercantile wealth, will subject us to the same grinding monopoly that she has subjected every other people who have been brought under her commercial sway.

We do not ask for prohibitive but for preservative duties upon imports. We build our wall no higher than we build the wages, the condition, and the happiness of American labor. It is for the workingmen that we build at all. Capital needs no armor of defense. But labor can tolerate no unfair competition. It should have continuous employment and advancing wages. As it is honorable, it should be honored. As it is faithful, it should be rewarded. As it is defenseless, it should be protected. To-day it is paralyzed. It cries out with the Psalmist:

> Establish thou the work of our hands upon us; yea, the work of our hands establish thou it.

Grant its prayer and every furnace fire will at once be lighted and every mill wheel begin to turn. Pass the appropriation bills and go home, and all the people will rise up and call you blessed.

But we are told that all men have the natural right to buy where they may and sell where they may, and the silver-tongued orator from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] fairly electrified the House in his beautiful apostrophe to that axiomatic proposition. Indeed, it may be said, generally, that this free-trade philosophy is made up of universally accepted truisms, perverted by sophistry to meaningless or illogical conclusions.

I agree that every man has the right to buy and sell where he pleases, but this being the right of all, each must exercise his right in a manner that will permit his neighbor to exercise his. All men have the right to travel upon the public highway, yet no two can exercise this right at the same instant over the same segment of roadway. There must be control and regulation of this right over both in order that each may enjoy his right. Every man has the right to sell. Nevertheless, there must be regulation of this right so that the privilege of one to sell shall not be destructive of another's equal right to sell. The right to sell, like all other natural or legal rights, is absolute in form and substance, but relative in its application and exercise.

The right being common to all, it necessarily breeds competition, and in order that competition may not destroy the right to sell, it must be restrained; it must be compelled to be fair, otherwise it will destroy the other competitor's right. The foreigner may not set fire to and burn down his American competitor's store to destroy or defeat the American's right to sell. The foreigner has no right to steal his goods, and in that way defeat his right to sell. He has no right to steal the labor employed in making his goods, and in that way defeat our right to sell. He and we have a common right to sell in the American market, but as this is a common natural right, it must be exercised on common lines of natural justice.

It is exactly fair and just that the foreigner should enter our markets on the same equal footing with the American. Therefore, if the American pays a bonus for the privilege of selling, the foreigner must do the same. If it be necessary to employ a police force to guard the merchandise of all sellers in the market, the foreigner using the market ought in justice to bear his proportion of the expense. Now, your theory comes around to this: America has at great expense built up an American market. It has set up and is maintaining the vast machinery of a government to control and regulate it and keep it on foot for the public good of our people. It employs and pays a legislature to make suitable laws regulating the rights and duties of sellers and buyers; it employs and pays courts to settle and determine all violations of those laws; it builds and supports jails for criminals in the business, and poorhouses for the paupers of the business; it builds churches and school houses for the benefit of all engaged in the business; it goes to war to defend its rights; in short, government does everything and incurs every expense necessary to make the American market a success, and, indeed, to make it possible, and the American seller is heavily taxed to meet all this expense.

Now, when Mr. Bull knocks at our Chinese wall for admission, Jonathan says to him, "John, do you mind that notice over the gate? 'Equal rights for all. Special privileges for none?' That, John, came from Chicago, and just at this particular time the Democratic party is our purchasing agent, and we are going to exercise our God-given right to buy where we have a mind to. So, John, you can have no special privileges in this market, but we will give you equal rights with our peddlers, and inasmuch as they have to pay a good smart bonus for the chance to do business here, you will have to do the same thing. We are going to treat Americans just as well as we do strangers."

But the brilliant gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], who has the faculty beyond any other man on this floor to "make the worse appear the better reason," cries out in an apparent agony of despair, "Can not the superior civilization of America successfully contend against the effete and worn-out civilization of the Old World?"

Mr. Chairman, this is not a battle of civilizations. If the gentleman means by civilization commercial sagacity, the civilization of the Old World is not effete. On the contrary, it is vigorous, aggressive, and quite as advanced as our own. But it makes its advance by trampling down the rights of labor and denying to workingmen all opportunity to better their condition in the race of life. The system of labor in most European states is a slavery as bad as that we were once cursed with in America. It is inhuman, corrupt, and degrading, while in America our system gives workingmen a hope, an ambition, and an inspiration. The humblest son of toil may aspire to the Presidency and occasionally one reaches it. The field is clear for all. Our system not only recognizes the fact that every man has the right to buy and sell where he pleases; it goes further and declares that he has the right to grow, the right to prosper, the right to be educated, the right to have a home and all the comforts of home; has the right to participate in government, and the right to be a governor over his fellowmen.

Our system is the opposite of that of Europe. Ours is humane, honest, and elevating, and the battle is not between two equally developed civilizations, but between one recognizing the laws of humanity, and the other practicing the arts of inhumanity. If two merchants in Washington with equal capital and both paying the same rent are selling the same goods in this market, and one pays his clerks $5 a week and the other pays his $10 a week, the first will undersell the other and secure the trade. But the first set of clerks will starve, while those of the latter will prosper. The fate of these competing merchants is not the result of a war between civilizations, but is the result of the battle of humanity.

The gentleman from New York tells us that England levies duties on six articles, tea, coffee, sugar, cocoa, etc. All these, you will notice, affect the poor man's table, and frankly concedes that the Wilson bill is only a step toward free trade, which is to come in due time. If it comes it surely and logically means the condemnation of our working classes to the slavery of European labor.

The first step you are about to take, but the second will never follow. The American people are too intelligent, too honest, and too proud to turn the dial of progress back, and so soon as they can get hold of it, they will consign your free-trade scheme to the sleep that knows no waking.

> By foreign hands thy dying eyes were closed,
> By foreign hands thy decent limbs composed,
> By foreign hands thy humble grave adorned,
> By strangers honored, and by strangers mourned.

[Applause.]

Mr. BOEN Mr. Chairman, the greatest questions in the problem of government are those of money and taxation. The money question may be said to have been pretty thoroughly investigated and considered by the present Congress, but by no means settled, and the question of tariff, of taxation, is the next to demand our attention.

If duties on imports are at all justifiable, it is only on the grounds of revenue or protection. They should, therefore, be so arranged as to affect all classes alike, make all pay an equal share of the expenses of the Government, and give to all the same protection.

Society consists of two classes, producers and consumers. The producers can be divided into two main classes, namely, farmers and their employés, and manufacturers and their employés. The manufacturers demand a high protective tariff for the purpose of preventing competition by foreign manufacturers, and thus be enabled to dictate to the American farmer and laborer the price he shall pay for the machinery, implements, clothing, etc., that he must buy.

Now, I am not here to argue in favor of either free trade or protection, but I am here to ask that the farmer and manufacturer, as well as all other classes, be treated alike.

It is claimed that duties on imports under existing laws average about 50 per cent. Goods of American manufacture are, therefore, at a premium of about 50 per cent over goods of foreign make, and the American farmer and laborer has to pay that premium when he buys the goods. That premium is, therefore, a tribute paid by American soil and toil to the owners of the factories in this country who, in many cases, are foreign flunkies living in regal style in foreign lands, knowing nothing of and caring less about the privations of the people they plunder.

I believe in the perfect equality of man before the law as before God, and I believe that class legislation is the cause of our national ills. The most alarming symptom is that the real estate of the country is fast passing from the original owners into the hands of a few persons, many of them subjects and residents of foreign countries, and the descendants of the noble founders of the Republic are homeless tenants on their paternal estates. It is the result of class legislation.

The soil is the chief source of wealth, therefore one should think that its tillers were the most prosperous. But not so. The farmers are, and for centuries have been, society's beasts of burden. Laws inimical to the farmer have always disgraced the statute books.

The banker, the manufacturer, the common carrier, all regard the farmer as their legitimate prey, and he humbly submits. But whether he submits or not there is no redress. The whole machinery of legislation is against him; the courts are unfriendly, the Executive immovable. Whatever a man has to sell or dispose of is his money, his currency. The laborer sells his time, his energies, his skill; the farmer sells the products of his soil and toil; the manufacturer sells the products of his factory, and so on. My wheat is my currency. With that I buy money, and with the money I buy machinery, clothing, etc. But the price of my wheat is fixed in London. So also is the price of all wheat, no matter where it is grown. I get the London price, less the cost of transportation from my place to London. I am, therefore, competing with all other farmers in the world.

I sell my goods in a free-trade market and I buy in a protected market. The result is disastrous. Whatever premium or tariff I pay on the goods I buy as a farmer increases the cost of production of my crop. And, as in selling it, I must compete with men who buy their goods and machinery in a free-trade market, and who pay less than I do for labor, less for transportation, less for the use of money, it stands to reason that I can not pay expenses unless I am favored with an unusually large yield, or unless the work has been done by my own help. When the crop brings to the farmer less than it costs him to produce it, he soon finds himself in debt and at the mercy of the money-loaners. When once in their power he is soon out of house and home.

Agriculture is the noblest occupation, and should be the most independent. It is as old as the human race. From the earliest times till now millions, nay billions, of men, women, and children have been engaged in farming, and among those countless numbers you can not find one millionaire, not one, while among those engaged in banking, manufacturing, mining, transporting, or as merchants, millionaires are numbered by the thousands.

In farming every member of the family works—man, woman, and child. All direct their time, strength, and skill to the process of production. Ceaseless, unremitting toil from early morn till late at night, from childhood to the grave. And when near the end of a busy life the weary worker views his or her possessions it is generally found that the chief item in the assets is the knowledge of dreary years spent in the production of wealth that has been enjoyed by others. Sobriety, industry, honesty, a fertile soil and good climate availeth not. Life began in poverty, was spent in toil, in privations, and still ends in poverty, because the burdens of government and the fuss and feathers of the butterflies of society, the support of the drones of the hive, all come from the farm.

In banking, manufacturing, mining, transporting, only the head of the family is actively engaged in the business while other members of the family, unlike that of the farmer, enjoy life in various ways, spending freely the wealth that they never earned but which by fair means or foul has been secured from its producers, the farmers.

It may be objected that as times are hard all along the line every other business has suffered fully as much as farming. For the sake of argument let that be admitted.

Agriculture is the basis of our national prosperity and the foundation of our industrial and commercial structure. Vast as our agriculture is there is still a limit to its carrying capacity. Our manufacturing and inland commerce at least rest upon it; the expenses of government, State, and national, all come from the same source. The demands made on agriculture were more than it could bear and the crash came.

I tell you, gentlemen, there can be no general, enduring prosperity in this or any other agricultural country until farming is properly shielded against encroachments by the other industries. Agriculture is the goose that lays the golden egg. Destroy it and you destroy the nation. Agriculture, manufacturing, and commerce are a mighty trinity. The last depends on the first two.

Let production, farming, and manufacturing cease, and distribution ceases. There can be no distribution where there is nothing to distribute. Let manufacturing cease, and both farming and commerce are crippled. But, if farming is seriously injured through adverse legislation or other causes, manufacturing and commerce are suspended; financial institutions that have withstood the storms of generations crumble; bread riots and social disturbances are the order of the day, and the safety of our institutions tremble in the balance.

When Congress assembled in extra session on the 7th of August last year, the country was in the midst of a financial panic which the President informed us was caused by the silver-purchasing clause of the Sherman law. After one of the most severe legislative struggles on record that clause was repealed, the result being, as everyone knows, a further contraction of the currency, which means more poverty, more misery, more suffering every day. The Sherman law was used as a special bugaboo. As it did not frighten anyone but the goldbugs, recourse must be had to that favorite, convenient, old, reliable nightmare "the tariff." Therefore pretended fear of "tariff reform" is now agitating the huge frame of the G. P. O. elephant. No danger. The old Norse saying, "Ravens do not pick out each other's eyes," is applicable here. Old Jumbo was paralyzed in 1892, but by careful nursing he has been kept alive, and as a sacred relic, as a reminder of past greatness, he is once more exhibited to the gaze of the faithful.

The following is clipped from the St. Paul Dispatch for October 19, 1893, which I will send to the clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CAUSED BY TARIFF UNCERTAINTY—PARALYSIS OF THE IRON TRADE CONTINUES WITH REMARKABLE TENACITY.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, October 19.

The Iron Trade Review this week says: "It has been apparent for some time that favored producers in iron and steel, whose low-cost possibilities are a fruitful subject of market gossip have exhausted their advantage and are straining every point to keep in operation on a tonnage basis that will save them from loss. It is yet to be demonstrated whether there is beyond the volume of business that has been gained through these special inducements a further fresh supply of orders that will keep mills now active in operation into the new year, or whether the early fall activity has been largely as compensation for the inroad consumption made upon stocks in the long shut down of Western mills. Nothing has developed within the week to indicate that demand is sensibly growing.

The effect of the tariff uncertainty in iron and steel, visible in all departments of trade, in paralyzing demand, is illustrated in the failure of an important and hitherto prosperous Eastern Pennsylvania concern. How long the iron trade at large can stand the strain, depends on how long certain gentlemen at Washington persist in being as those who having eyes see not.

Mr. BOEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to that statement of The Iron Trade Review. It indicates that the production of iron has exceeded consumption; that the supply exceeds the demand, and then says:

Nothing has developed within the week to indicate that demand is sensibly growing.

The demand for an article, a commodity, or a certain line of goods is largely determined by the ability of the class of people using it to pay for it. When money circulates freely in a community, the inhabitants buy freely such articles as they require. When money is scarce, purchasers are correspondingly scarce. During a money famine a farming community, for instance, will buy very little machinery, fence wire, tools, etc. They must economize, and they do it. To illustrate: Machinery that last year was regarded as worn out was this year fixed up and pressed into service again. Had the financial outlook for the farmer been brighter, he would have bought millions of dollars' worth more of iron during the past season, and the article from which I quote would not have been written. Again:

The effect of tariff uncertainty in iron and steel, visible in all departments of trade in paralyzing demand, is illustrated in the failure of an important and hitherto prosperous Pennsylvania concern.

According to my way of thinking it is not fear of "tariff reform" that has clogged the wheels of industry; it is the low price of farm products, or, if you please, the high price of money, the farmer being thereby made unable to buy as much as he did before, as shown by the following table of figures credited to the New York Sun:

The following table shows, in five-year averages, the gold value per acre (in the local farm markets) of the product of the five staples named, for quinquennial periods, since 1866, and an estimate of the value, with average yields, of an acre under each such staple in 1893 at present prices:

Staples.	Value of an acre's product.
	1866–'70.	1871–'75.	1876–'80.	1881–'85.	1886–'90.	1893.
Corn	$12.84	$11.30	$9.62	$10.25	$8.81	$8.35
Wheat	13.16	11.90	12.00	10.20	9.07	6.00
Oats	10.92	9.81	8.58	9.17	7.50	5.75
Hay	13.28	14.38	11.57	11.15	10.19	10.00
Cotton	28.01	28.55	17.65	15.63	13.84	10.65
Totals	78.21	75.94	59.42	56.40	49.44	40.75
Average	15.64	15.19	11.88	11.28	9.89	8.15

If, as is altogether probable, the revenue derived from the cultivation of each acre of the staples named has not since 1885 been in excess of the cost of production, then it is readily seen that the workers among the 30,000,000 who inhabit the farms of the United States have for eight years received no more than laborer's wages, and could purchase but the barest necessaries. As prices now current are 21 per cent below the average of 1886 to 1890, it follows that the products of the farm are now sold below the cost of production, and that the farmer is wholly without purchasing power other than such as results from his wages as a common laborer.

The same article continues:

As 206,000,000 acres are now employed in growing staple crops, it follows that the power of the farmer to purchase is this year $1,563,000,000 less than it would be if he was receiving the prices of 1866–'70 for his great staples.

If that amount of money had been distributed among the farmers of the United States for their last crop in addition to what little they did receive, and exclusive of the vastly increased sum that they would have received for pork, beef, dairy products, wool, and so on, there would not now be in this country an uncultivated field, a closed factory, a silent workshop, an unemployed workingman, an idle freight car, a "busted" bank, a tramp, or a pauper. [Applause.]

Even the politician, he whose business it is to feed on his fellow-man; who gets his living, not by the sweat of his brow, but by the swagger of his jaw—he too would have an easier time of it, as his peculations would attract less attention. And right here I have mentioned a matter that is sure to touch the heart of this House.

What does it avail anyone to have a large stock of goods on hand when it can not be sold? Give the farmer a dollar a bushel for his wheat, the planter a shilling a pound for his cotton, for other farm products proportionately, and you will see an activity in the land such as never before was witnessed.

There are in this country to-day vast stocks of the products of the field, factory, and workshop, all that is necessary to make everybody comfortable and happy. Yet from every State and Territory in the Union goes up a cry of distress, a complaint of want and hunger and misery, plaintive enough to move mountains to tears. Our unlimited resources are undeveloped, and there is work for everybody. Still millions of willing hands are idle! Hunger and want in a land of plenty; idleness where there is too much to do!

The Government of these United States is now in the hands of the goldbugs. They are the enemies of our country and of our people. They have forced on us the European money system, monometalism, which means European economic conditions, such as low wages for both farmer and mechanic; low prices for the products of soil and toil. The codfish aristocracy of New England has been evolved into the national bank aristocracy, the modern pirates who are levying tribute on the commerce of the country on land and sea. They demonetized silver, well knowing that gold as money will never circulate among the people. Result: bank vaults full of money, madhouses and prisons crowded to their utmost capacity with unfortunates.

Believing in "freedom for Loki, as well as for Thor;" in equal rights to all; in free trade for everybody, or equal protection to all. I prepared and introduced the following bill, which the clerk will please read as part of my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Fifty-third Congress, first session.]

H. R. 2335.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

September 11, 1893.—Referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOEN introduced the following bill:

A bill to provide for admitting into the United States free of duty any goods or articles of foreign manufacture if bartered or exchanged for certain farm products, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any goods or merchandise manufactured in a foreign country shall be admitted into the territory of the United States free of duty if bartered or exchanged for wheat, cotton, corn, barley, oats, rye, rice, potatoes, butter, cheese, eggs, poultry, meat, pork, tobacco, or wool raised or produced in the United States: Provided, That an inspection fee of 1 per cent ad valorem on all goods admitted into the United States under this act shall be collected and covered into the Treasury of the United States, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe for that purpose.

SEC. 2. That none of the products of the United States hereinbefore enumerated shall be used as an article of such barter or exchange more than once and any person, firm, company, corporation, or organization offending against the provisions of this act with the intent of evading payment of duties or for the purpose of defrauding the Government shall, on conviction thereof, be punished for fraud against the Government, as provided by law.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and promulgate all rules and regulations necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, and to cause this act to be enforced.

Mr. BOEN. Mr. Chairman, although I wrote that bill myself I can not discuss its legal worth, as I am only a farmer and without knowledge of law. But I believe it expresses with sufficient clearness my idea, namely, that the American farmer should have the right to buy in a free market as well as he must sell in a free market.

It is said that there always are two parties to every bargain, but that does not apply to the farmer. Whether he sells or buys, the price is fixed by others.

I presume that even under existing conditions the domestic manufacturer would be willing to exchange products with the farmer; but, having the tariff at his back, the manufacturer would determine the price of his own and of the farmer's products, and he would assess the farmer a sum equal to the tariff on the goods given in exchange. Under my bill there would be no premium in favor of the manufacturer, and the farmer would have a voice in the transaction.

I said that the tariff, whatever its amount, is that much premium placed on the domestic article as compared with the corresponding article of foreign make. That premium, which under existing laws averages nearly 50 per cent, represents the advantages awarded by law to the factory owner over the farmer. That is manifestly a great wrong. My bill aims to right that wrong. If it became law, our farm products would be at a premium over money for the purchase of foreign manufactures, the amount of the premium being exactly equal to the premium or tariff on domestic manufactures.

Thus it will be seen that my bill is a measure of self-defense; that it is fair to all, and places the farmer and manufacturer on an equal footing. That is what we want.

Pass my bill and I do not care if you build around this country a Chinese wall of protection thicker and higher than that erected by the McKinley law, because my proposition provides for a breach in the fortification large enough to admit free all the goods we need, including raw materials for the manufacturer. We have plenty of farm products with which to buy them.

It will be objected that it is impracticable. That objection would not be raised were my bill in favor of the factory owners, banking or transportation corporations. Then it would be just the thing. But measures calculated to protect or further the interests of the common people are always denounced by the people's plunderers as impracticable. "Where there is a will there is a way." Where there is no will there is no way.

The manufacturer asks that we shall sell him our goods at London prices, the lowest in the world, and take in exchange his goods at his own prices, the highest in the world.

If by chance or otherwise we buy goods of foreign make we are mulcted or fined by order of the manufacturers an amount varying from 10 per cent to 300 or 400 per cent of the value of the goods bought. The fine goes to pay fat salaries to those who run the Government.

The farmers have thus far patiently borne the burden. As long as we could get a fair price and ready sales for our products we were contented and cheerfully paid all the bills. Now there is no money among us, no price for our products. Taxes are as high as ever, if not higher, and our other expenses are as high as ever, while our income is greatly reduced. Money has disappeared from among us. We must therefore come to a system of exchange without the intervention of money. How can that be done?

If my bill or some similar measure were law, we would in my neighborhood proceed about as follows: In the township where I live is a railway station called Wall Lake. There is a small grain warehouse built and owned by ourselves; also a store building. Wheat is our chief crop. It is that with which we pay our debts, purchase our implements and necessaries of life.

We could fill our elevator with wheat, each man getting credit for the amount put in; then arrange with some manufacturer, whether domestic or foreign, for such an amount of goods as our wheat would pay for; the goods, if of foreign make, being held in bond at the port of entry until our wheat could reach that port and release the goods in bond. On receipt of the goods thus purchased, they could be put into the store building, and from there turned over to the owners as and when required, each one having charged to his account the goods taken out by him until he had received goods to the amount which he had to his credit for wheat, less cost of handling, freight, and insurance. When necessary, more wheat could be shipped for merchandise, machinery, etc.

Thus we could easily, conveniently, and cheaply carry on our business without the use of money for other purposes than freight and insurance. And as our wheat would be at a premium over money for the purpose of buying steel rails, for instance, to the premium equaling the tariff on steel rails, it might happen that the railway company would be glad to receive wheat in payment for transporting our grain to the port of entry. In that case the whole transaction would be made practically without the use of money other than money of account.

This bill is therefore a rather far-reaching measure, and it does not require a very vivid imagination to foresee that it will meet with opposition. It relieves or releases the farmer from the burden of the tariff. In other words, he can buy in a free market as well as he must sell in a free market.

A new system of taxation—direct taxation—including a graduated income tax, must be adopted, as there will be very little income from duties on imports. The farmer and the manufacturer will be equally protected. But overshadowing all that in importance is the fact that the farmer can do business with so little money that he will have no occasion to borrow any from the banks.

The bulk of the crops and merchandise and machinery can then be moved and distributed all over the land, and the banks can neither accelerate nor retard the process. Now the banks levy tribute at will on the commerce of the country. The agricultural part of commerce would be practically exempt from the bankers' domination and interest on money would fall, owing to its decreased use.

"Your bill contemplates class legislation," says some one. The voice sounds familiar. It is the voice of the most persistent advocates of class legislation, the banker and the manufacturer.

If it is class legislation to protect the farmer against the robbery of the other classes, then my bill aims at class legislation. But the laws that give to the banker the control of the currency of the country; the manufacturer the right and opportunity to dictate to the farmer the price he must pay for his machinery, etc.; the common carrier the power to exact from the farmer freight rates based on "all that the traffic will bear"—that is not class legislation in their eyes. Oh, no. I propose to secure to the farmer the same right that is demanded by the manufacturer, and granted to him.

If the theory of protection is right, it is right that it should be extended to both producing classes alike. The farmer and his employés are entitled to the same protection as the manufacturer and his employés. No more, no less. The manufacturer demands protection against foreign competition; the farmer must therefore seek protection against the oppressive prices demanded by the manufacturer. My bill provides that protection for the farmer.

As a class we are tired of being robbed by all other classes and on all occasions. We ask no favors of anyone—only insist on our rights.

The following will fairly illustrate the farmer's importance, year after year, in our national economy:

In 1892 we, the farmers of the United States, fed the population of this country, estimated at over sixty-six millions. Besides that, we furnished for export agricultural products to the amount of $793,717,676. All other products exported were only $236,560,354, an export excess of farm products over all other industries to the amount of $557,157,322. We fed the people; we paid the expenses of the Government, State and National, and the interest on the public debt. We supported the banking and transportation systems of the country and made several millionaires at home and abroad, all in one year. Yet you talk about the farmer as if he were an object of charity.

Quit plundering the farmer and he is all right. [Applause.]

[Mr. HUDSON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BROOKSHIRE having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MALLORY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HAINES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 16, 1894.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Vice-President being absent, the President pro tempore took the chair.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HAWAIIAN AFFAIRS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts suggesting the absence of a quorum, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen,	Frye,	Lodge,	Quay,
Allison,	Gallinger,	McMillan,	Roach,
Berry,	Gorman,	Manderson,	Sherman,
Blackburn,	Hansbrough,	Mitchell, Oregon,	Stockbridge,
Call,	Harris,	Morrill,	Teller,
Carey,	Hawley,	Murphy,	Turpie,
Chandler,	Hoar,	Palmer,	Vest,
Chilton,	Hunton,	Perkins,	Vilas,
Cuniel,	Irby,	Platt,	Washburn,
Davis,	Jones, Ark.	Proctor,	Wilson.
Faulkner,	Kyle,	Pugh,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll call develops the fact that 43 Senators are present. There being a quorum present, the Secretary will read the message of the President of the United States.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Congress:

I transmit herewith copies of all dispatches from our minister at Hawaii relating in any way to political affairs in that country, except such as have been heretofore laid before the Congress.

I also transmit a copy of the last instructions sent to our minister, dated January 12, 1894, being the only instructions to him not already sent to the Congress.

In transmitting certain correspondence with my message dated December 18, 1893, I withheld a dispatch from our present minister, numbered 3 and dated November 16, 1893, and also a dispatch from our former minister, numbered 70 and dated October 8, 1892. Inasmuch as the contents of the dispatch of November 16, 1893, are referred to in the dispatches of a more recent date now sent to Congress, and inasmuch as there seems no longer to be sufficient reason for withholding said dispatch, a copy of the same is herewith submitted. The dispatch numbered 70 and dated October 8, 1892, above referred to, is still withheld for the reason that such a course still appears to be justifiable and proper.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
January 13, 1894.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the message and accompanying documents——

Mr. HOAR. I move that the message and accompanying documents be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to address the Senate upon that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is suspended, and the Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to speak upon the motion for five or ten minutes. Perhaps it would be more convenient to the Senate to have the routine morning business first transacted. I make that suggestion, and ask consent that this matter may stand until the transaction of the routine morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message and accompanying documents will lie on the table for the present, and the Senator from Massachusetts will be recognized after the routine morning business.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 108) authorizing Maj. Gen. Oliver Otis Howard, United States Army, to accept from the President of the French Republic a diploma conferring the decoration of Commander of the National Order of the Legion of Honor, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CULLOM presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Summer Hill, Ill., remonstrating against a reduction of duty on wool; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Winter Wheat Millers' League of Indianapolis, Ind., praying for the enactment of such legislation as will cause the removal of the discriminating duties now imposed by foreign countries against the importation of flour; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of fruit-growers and shippers of Michigan and dealers in Chicago, Ill., praying that an appropriation of $25,000 be made for the improvement of the Kalamazoo River in Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WASHBURN presented the memorial of E. C. Hall and other citizens of St. Louis County, Minn., remonstrating against the passage of the Wilson tariff bill; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN presented memorials of 50 citizens of Hocking County, of 140 citizens of Miami County, and of 100 employés of the Jeffrey Manufacturing Company, of Columbus, all in the State of Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the Wilson tariff bill; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of St. Clair, Ohio, soldiers in the late war, praying for an investigation of the Pension Bureau; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Cleveland, Fairfield, Lindsey, Wells, Mohican, and Turtle Creek, all in the State of Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the Wilson tariff bill; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GORMAN (for Mr. MCPHERSON) presented a memorial of employés of R. H. and B. C. Reeve, manufacturers of floor oilcloth, of Camden, N. J., remonstrating against any change in the present tariff law; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MANDERSON. I present a memorial of citizens of Dixson County, Nebr., remonstrating against the passage of the Wilson tariff bill. The memorial is quite numerously signed. I observe that the political proclivities of those who signed it are mentioned, and that a majority of the signers sign as Democrats and as members of the Populist party. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented memorials of H. B. Sturtevant and 278 other workingmen, employers of labor, and business men of Ironwood; of Watson Fitch and 422 workingmen, employers of labor, and other citizens of Champion; J. B. Knight and 248 workingmen, employers of labor, and other citizens of Vulcan and Norway, and of D. A. Stewart and 105 workingmen, employers of labor, and other citizens of Norway, all in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against placing iron ore on the free list; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of the Fair Haven (Mich.) Stave Company, and of the Standard Hoop Company of Michigan, remonstrating against the placing of hoops and staves on the free list; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LODGE. I present a petition of the Central Labor Union of Boston, Mass., praying for the reopening of the navy-yard at Charlestown for the construction and repair of shipping, etc. The petition sets forth that the yard has been put in a high state of efficiency by recent appropriations; also the discrimination which has been made against it in not being used; and the great distress among the workingmen of that city. The petitioners state that the reopening of the yard for the ordinary work of a navy yard would give employment to a number of persons. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of John A. Spielman and 33 other honorably discharged ex-soldiers of the Union army, praying for the passage of a service pension law; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAVIS presented memorials of G. W. Wallace and 700 other citizens of Tower and Soudan; of O. G. Korb and 93 other citizens of Ely; of E. H. Hall and 80 other citizens of St. Louis County, and of Peder Handburg and 88 other citizens of Ely, all in the State of Minnesota, remonstrating against any reduction of the duty on iron ore; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of Pressmen's Union No. 14, and of W. J. Ralus and other citizens of St. Paul, Minn., praying for the governmental control of the telegraph service; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the petition of F. W. Betz and other citizens of Fairmount, Minn., praying for the imposition of a uniform duty of 35 per cent on unstemmed leaf tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of the Good Templars of Maine, by request of its grand lodge, representing 18,000 members, praying for the appointment of a national commission of inquiry to investigate the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Portland, Me., praying for the early completion of the Sandy Bay breakwater and harbor of refuge at Cape Ann, Mass.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Duluth, Minn., remonstrating against the placing of iron ore on the free list; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TURPIE presented petitions of Herman Hoffman and Ed. Olson, of Greencastle; of C. Wirth and 10 others, of Terre Haute; of Jacob Rief and 3 others, of Lawrence; and of A. M. Miller and 6 others, of Lebanon, manufacturers and makers of cigars in the State of Indiana, praying for the imposition of a uniform duty of 35 per cent on all unstemmed leaf tobacco; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of M. W. McCoy, a cigar manufacturer of Evansville, Ind., praying for the repeal of the tariff law of 1890, regarding the duty on manufactured tobacco, and for the retention of the present duty; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PUGH presented the petition of J. W. Drewey and 5 other physicians of Barbour, Ala., praying for the establishment of a bureau of public health within the Treasury Department; which was referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

Mr. DANIEL presented memorials of sundry operators and miners of Wells Branch, West Va., remonstrating against a reduction of the duty on coal and coke; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Clinch Valley coal operators of Wise County, Va., remonstrating against a reduction of the duty on coal; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the owners and operators of blast and zinc furnaces in Southwest Virginia and the Shenandoah Valley, Virginia, remonstrating against a further reduction of the duty on coal, iron ore, and zinc; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of miners and other employés of the Big Creek mines, in Tazewell County, Va., remonstrating against a further reduction of the duty on soft coal, coke, and iron ore; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of the Board of Trade of Pocahontas, Va., and of coal producers of the Pocahontas coal fields of Virginia and West Virginia, remonstrating against a further reduction of the duty on soft coal; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Big Stone Gap, Va., remonstrating against the placing of coal, iron, and lumber on the free list; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the All Tobacco Cigarette Manufacturers' Association of the United States, praying for a separate classification and remonstrating against any reduction of the present duty on all-tobacco cigarettes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of James Harvey and 146 other citizens of Grayson and Carroll Counties, Va., and of W. D. Sale and 33 other employés of the Pennsylvania Zinc and Iron Company, of Ivanhoe, Va., remonstrating against any reduction of the present duty on pig iron; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the board of directors of the Louisville (Ky.) Silvering and Beveling Company, remonstrating against any reduction of the duty on German mirrors, and opposing a reduction of the duty on mirrors to 5 cents per square foot; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of J. W. Hawkins and other cigar-manufacturers of Charlottesville, Va., praying for the imposition of a uniform duty of 35 per cent on unstemmed leaf tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon presented a petition of sundry citizens of Salem, Oregon, praying for the enactment of legislation establishing a postal governmental telegraph service; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

ANNIVERSARY OF LAYING OF CAPITOL CORNER STONE.

Mr. GORMAN, from the Committee on Printing, reported a joint resolution (S. R. 51) to provide for the printing of the report of the joint committee of Congress and proceedings at the centennial celebration of the laying of the corner stone of the Capitol; and submitted a report thereon,

The joint resolution was read the first time by its title.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was read the second time at length, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the report of the joint committee of Congress, appointed under the joint resolution approved August 17, 1893, upon the ceremonials at the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the laying of the corner stone of the Capitol of the United States, together with the proceedings and public addresses on the commemoration of that event, be printed in a memorial volume, with such illustrations as may be approved by the Joint Committee on Printing, and that 5,500 copies be printed, 1,500 for the use of the Senate, 3,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for distribution by the citizens' committee on the celebration, and the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry this joint resolution into effect.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GORMAN, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1137) to provide for the printing of the report of the joint committee of Congress and proceedings at the centennial celebration of the laying of the corner stone of the Capitol, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BERRY introduced a bill (S. 1431) to amend section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to regulations made by miners; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. ALLEN introduced a bill (S. 1432) to open to settlement and provide for the disposal of the public lands of Fort McPherson military reservation, in the State of Nebraska, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WASHBURN introduced a bill (S. 1433) granting to the Hot Springs Water Company a site for a reservoir for cold water upon the permanent reservation at Hot Springs, Ark.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COKE introduced a bill (S. 1434) for the relief of the estate of Sylvanus Sandford, deceased, late of Cass County, Tex.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRYE. By request of the secretary of the Maritime Association of New York I introduce a bill, and ask that it be twice read and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (S. 1435) to amend section 2880 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, fixing time for vessels to unlade, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1436) for the relief of Rutherford Leach; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAVIS introduced a bill (S. 1437) granting a pension to Jacob Niebels; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GORMAN (for Mr. MCPHERSON) introduced a bill (S. 1438) for the relief of Louis A. Yorke; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also (for Mr. MCPHERSON) introduced a bill (S. 1439) to amend the Articles for the government of the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also (for Mr. MCPHERSON) introduced a bill (S. 1440) for the relief of John G. Rose; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also (for Mr. MCPHERSON) introduced a bill (S. 1441) granting a pension to Ella Hatfield, invalid daughter of Maj. David Hatfield, First Regiment New Jersey Infantry Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (for Mr. MCPHERSON) introduced a bill (S. 1442) to provide for the enlargement and improvement of the United States naval hospital, Brooklyn, N. Y.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 1443) for the relief of Henry Marcotte; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MARTIN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1444) to authorize the Oklahoma Central Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian and Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. HIGGINS introduced a bill (S. 1445) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of David Miller; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENT TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill. I should like to say a word, with the consent of the Senate, in regard to the amendment. It proposes an appropriation of $25,000 "to enable the Director of the Geological Survey to make a careful examination of the gold-bearing black sands of the coast and rivers of California, Oregon, and Washington, with a view of determining as to their geological origin and contents, including an investigation as to the possible methods by which the flour gold of such sands might be saved, and also an investigation into the platinum, iridosmine, and nickel ores of the State of Oregon, their origin, quality, and extent, and report thereon."

I have had some correspondence with the Director of the Geological Survey in regard to this matter, and I hold in my hand a communication of some importance bearing upon the question. I move that the communication be printed in connection with the proposed amendment and referred with it to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

PROCEEDINGS ON A NOMINATION.

Mr. CALL. I submit a Senate resolution, with an accompanying notice for a change of the rules of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

I give notice that I will move the Senate to suspend the following part of Rule XXXVIII, paragraph 2, viz: "All information communicated or remarks made by a Senator when acting upon nominations concerning the character and qualifications of the person nominated; also all votes upon any nomination shall be kept secret," so far as the same relates to the proceedings of the Senate in relation to the nomination of the internal-revenue collector for the State of Florida. The object of this motion is to have the nomination of the internal-revenue collector for Florida considered in open session.

Resolved, That so much of Rule XXXVIII, paragraph 2, as is contained in the following words: "All information communicated or remarks made by a Senator when acting upon nominations concerning the character or qualifications of the person nominated; also all votes upon any nomination shall be kept secret," shall be suspended in the consideration of the nomination of the collector of internal revenue of the State of Florida.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida propose to refer the resolution?

Mr. CALL. I do not, sir. I shall ask that it be considered by the Senate without a reference. I suppose under the rule the resolution will lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution lies over.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Florida whether it should not be brought up first in executive session?

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Then, if it seems to the Senate——

Mr. CALL. I do not suppose it should, Mr. President, unless it be done by a vote of the Senate. I can see no reason why a proposed change of the rules should not be discussed in open Senate.

Mr. HOAR. It would seem to me, as at present advised, that it is my duty to suggest that it shall be considered in executive session, which suggestion being made, if any other Senator agree with me, would require it to be first considered there. Then if, after explanation by the Senator from Florida, the Senate thought that it was a matter for open session, the Senate would so order, under the rule: but it seems to me that as the subject is by the rules submitted to the Senate in executive session the special reasons why it should be made an exception can not be otherwise stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts submit a motion?

Mr. HOAR. I make that suggestion, Mr. President.

Mr. MANDERSON. If this matter is to be taken up now, I certainly second the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not think that this is a proposed change of the rules. It is rather a request for unanimous consent that as to the particular nomination named the injunction of secrecy shall be removed. That surely is a matter for executive session. I second the request that the doors be closed, if the matter is to be considered now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would suggest to the Senators from Nebraska and Massachusetts that the Senator from Florida does not ask for the present consideration of his resolution, but he asks that it lie over under the rules.

Mr HOAR. I wish, if I may be allowed to make——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Massachusetts asks that the doors be closed at this time, and the Senator from Nebraska seconds it, it is the duty of the Chair to order the doors to be closed.

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave to make one suggestion. I do not wish to interpose in any matter against what the Senator from Florida desires, as he knows very well, but, on the contrary, desire to support any wish that he may have. My suggestion is not at all made in reference to this particular case, of which I know absolutely nothing, but because I think it is a very important matter of general practice. If this matter be considered in executive session the Senator can, of course, make his reasons known to the Senate and the doors can be at once opened if the Senate think so; but I am obliged to notify the Senator that I shall be compelled to make this suggestion whenever the matter is considered.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The suggestion being made at this time, and seconded by the Senator from Nebraska, it is the duty of the Chair to order the galleries cleared and the doors closed.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps the Senator will withdraw his resolution.

Mr. CALL. I do not ask for the present consideration of the resolution. I do not wish to oppose the wishes of any Senator in regard to its consideration, but it appears to me the question whether a rule should be suspended is not a matter for secret session. It does not involve any discussion——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida withdraw the resolution? The question is not now debatable.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Florida does not withdraw the resolution, but he asks that the resolution——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors of the Senate.

The doors were thereupon closed, and at the expiration of twenty minutes were reopened.

FLORIDA RAILROAD GRANTS.

Mr. CALL. I desire to give notice that on Monday next, after the conclusion of the morning business, I shall move to take up the resolution introduced by me to refer to the Judiciary Committee the action of the Interior Department with reference to certain Florida railroad lands claimed as grants, and submit some observations to the Senate upon it.

CONDITION OF THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was read and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment be required to examine into the condition of the civil service of the United States and the expediency of its retention or increase, and to report to the Senate by bill or otherwise.

UNITED STATES CONVICTS IN UTAH.

Mr. COCKRELL. I submit a resolution which I ask may be read, and, when it is read, I ask that a letter from the Attorney-General may be read to explain why the resolution should be passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate the amounts due the United States from the Territory of Utah on account of costs and expenses of prosecutions for offenses against any law of the Territorial Legislature of Utah required to be paid out of the Treasury of said Territory under the act of June 23, 1874, entitled "An act in relation to courts and judicial officers in the Territory of Utah."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks that the letter of the Attorney-General be read. It will be read, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, D. C., January 8, 1894.

SIR: It is suggested to the Department that the attention of Congress should be called to the large amounts due the United States from the Territory of Utah, expended by the Government in the support of Territorial convicts under the act of June 23, 1874, commonly known as the Poland bill, section 2, paragraph 4, of the act being: "And the costs and expenses of all prosecutions for offenses against any law of the Territorial Legislature shall be paid out of the treasury of the Territory;" the offenses prosecuted under the act by the United States attorney being "as well under the laws of said Territory as of the United States."

For many years there has been an annual appropriation mainly for the support of the penitentiary, usually denominated "Expenses Territorial courts of Utah."

The amount of expenses thus incurred can be ascertained from the office of the First Comptroller of the Treasury.

This matter is brought to your notice because this Department has disbursed these appropriations. It would be held responsible if this information was not communicated to you and it should be overlooked.

Very respectfully,

RICHARD OLNEY,
Attorney-General.

The PRESIDENT of the United States Senate.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

LIGHT AND FOG SIGNAL AT BUTLER FLATS, MASSACHUSETTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further resolutions, concurrent or otherwise? If there be none, the morning business is concluded.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 156, Order of Business 176.

Mr. HOAR. I ask my colleague if the bill will take any time?

Mr. LODGE. I think not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 156) for the establishment of a light and fog signal station near Butler Flats, New Bedford, Mass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill, the title of which has been read?

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to have the bill read for information, subject to objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be established, on or near Butler Flats, entrance to the lower harbor of New Bedford, Mass., a light and fog-signal station, at a cost not to exceed $45,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ACCOUNTS OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. HUNTON. Mr. President, I ask——

Mr. HOAR. I understood the order of the Senate was that at the close of the routine business the President's message should be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message of the President of the United States has been laid before the Senate. It is lying upon the table at the request of the Senator from Massachusetts, and the Senator from Massachusetts is now recognized by the Chair.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to permit me to ask for the consideration of House bill 4340, in regard to the mode of settling the accounts of the post-offices in the country with the Post-Office Department.

Mr. HOAR. Will the bill require any debate?

Mr. HUNTON. I think not. It was brought up the other day by me and its consideration then asked for, but the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] asked that it lie over until the return of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask for the present consideration of House bill 4340. It will be recollected that I reported the bill from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. It was recommended by the Post-Office Department and by the commission appointed by the two Houses of Congress to consider such matters. As I have stated, at the request of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] it was laid over until the return of the Senator from Missouri, who is now here, and I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4340) to amend section 407 of the Revised Statutes so as to require original receipts for deposits of postmasters to be sent to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HAWAIIAN AFFAIRS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to print and refer the message of the President of the United States is now before the Senate, and the Chair recognizes the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire, before the President's message containing some information in regard to the proceedings in Hawaii passes from the power of the Senate by reference or by the order to print, to call attention to one matter, which I think should be understood now.

It will be remembered—I do not think any intelligent American is ignorant of the fact—that the President of the United States, deeming that it would be a shame, a foul shame, to expose the persons who had been engaged in the recent establishment of the present Government of Hawaii to the vengeance of a cruel and semibarbarous ruler, demanded from her an undertaking that there should be complete pardon and amnesty to all the persons engaged in that revolution. Nobody, however severe a critic of the present Administration, questions the wisdom and humanity of that stipulation. The Queen had many times broken her promises and her oath of office. She had been dethroned by her subjects for an attempt, by her own authority and without right, to impose a new constitution upon her people and to violate the old one.

When that suggestion was made to her, she was asked by Mr. Willis to issue a proclamation of amnesty, and she said that she thought the persons ought to be beheaded, their property confiscated, and their children driven from the realm, and she would not consent. Upon that the proceedings stopped for a time.

But I want to call attention to another matter, and that is, that the Queen also informed Mr. Willis that she had no constitutional or legal right to make that promise. She hesitated a moment, and then slowly and calmly answered, says Mr. Willis in his report:

There are certain laws of my government by which I shall abide. My decision would be as the law directs.

Then he goes on asking her if she fully understands the meaning of her words, and he further asked her:

Suppose it was necessary to make a decision before you approach any ministers, and that you were asked to issue a royal proclamation of general amnesty, would you do it?

She answered:

I have no legal right to do that, and I would not do it.

Mr. President, that answer of the Queen was well founded. The constitution of Hawaii, which has been furnished to us in one of the documents which have been laid before the Senate and of which I hold a copy in my hand, contains several provisions on this subject. Article 27 is:

That the king, by and with the advice of the privy council and with the consent of the cabinet, has the power to grant reprieves and pardons after conviction for all offenses.

Then there is another provision of the same constitution, article 78, which says:

Wherever by this constitution any act is to be performed by the king or the sovereign, it shall, unless otherwise expressed, mean that such act shall be done and performed by the sovereign by and with the advice and consent of the cabinet.

The cabinet is not, as under our Constitution, within the control of the executive head of the nation, because no cabinet can be removed except by a vote of want of confidence by the Legislative Assembly, which will be found in the forty-first article.

So it appears that this promise of amnesty which has at last been extracted from the Queen, so far as it is found in her ambiguous and doubtful letter (which I will ask to have read presently and printed as a part of my remarks), was a gross violation of the constitution of Hawaii. Every constitutional lawyer, every intelligent citizen understands the distinction between a power to pardon after conviction, which can extend only to a particular offender and which can only be exercised by a discretion instructed by the proceedings of a trial with the full knowledge of the particular fact bearing upon the particular guilt of the particular criminal, and a general sweeping proclamation of amnesty.

So what President Cleveland through his minister, Mr. Willis, was urging upon that sovereign to do was as gross a violation of her constitution as could be suggested or supposed; and the Queen notified our Government of the fact. She protested twice, "I have not a legal power to do this thing." The life, the property, the right of these men and their children to abide in their country are dependent upon a promise so extorted, by an authority which was informed when the promise was extorted that it was a grossly unconstitutional and illegal promise that had been obtained.

Mr. President, there is but one point of sympathy between the present Executive of the United States, who sent out Mr. Blount, and the deposed Queen of Hawaii, and that is a purpose on the part of both recklessly to disregard the constitutions of their country; the only difference being that the President of the United States disregards our Constitution recklessly and without provocation, and the Queen of Hawaii in this instance proposes to disregard the constitution of Hawaii only for the great temptation of a throne and on the urgent solicitation of our President.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether the answer finally given by the Queen that she would extend amnesty is capable of the construction that she would only extend that amnesty after conviction?

Mr. HOAR. I do not think it is. As I said, her letter, which I shall have read in a moment, is ambiguous and doubtful. But if it were, the Queen could not do it without the consent of her cabinet.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I understand that.

Mr. HOAR. And the cabinet could not be removed, if it refused, except by the order of the Legislature.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. What I desire to get at is what is the real meaning of the consent finally given?

Mr. HOAR. I will have the letter read.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Was it intended that she would extend amnesty at once before conviction, or did she mean to be understood that she would extend it only after conviction?

Mr. HOAR. I will send up to the desk the Queen's letter. I have it here in a paper, but the official copy is more convenient. Let the Secretary read the Queen's letter, contained in No. 16.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON PLACE, Honolulu, December 18, 1893.

SIR: Since I had the interview with you this morning, I have given the most careful and conscientious thought as to my duty, and I now, of my own free will, give my conclusions.

I must not feel revengeful to any of my people. If I am restored by the United States I must forget myself and remember only my dear people and my country. I must forgive and forget the past, permitting no proscription or punishment of anyone, but trusting that all will hereafter work together in peace and friendship for the good and for the glory of our beautiful and once happy land.

Asking you to bear to the President and to the Government he represents a message of gratitude from me and from my people, and promising with God's grace to prove worthy of the confidence and friendship of your people, I am, etc.,

LILIUOKALANI.

To His Excellency ALBERT S. WILLIS,
Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary,
United States of America.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, that letter is either a compliance with the condition of a proclamation of amnesty or it is not. If it be a promise of pardon it is an unconstitutional engagement, as the authorities of the United States had been again and again notified by the Queen herself. If it be not, what becomes of the transparent and shallow pretense that the liberty or the impunity of the persons who engaged in the revolution has been secured?

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senator from Massachusetts upon his tender regard for the maintenance of the constitution of Hawaii. His constitutional argument this morning has been characterized by his usual perspicacity. I do not know, though, whether the insistance of the President of the United States upon amnesty and full pardon and oblivion for all acts committed by those who took part in the revolution of January, 1893, was not a wise condition, notwithstanding the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senator from Massachusetts would still insist that the Queen, notwithstanding a compliance with that condition, should have tried and was bound by her constitutional duty to have tried those who had engaged in the revolution, or should withhold all executive clemency from those who had been tried and convicted of treason against her Government.

I believe that the President of the United States was right in saying that he would exact such a condition from her before he would intervene or exercise his good offices with the Provisional Government in her behalf, and that he was able with the power with which he was clothed, and that the United States were able, to make good that promise and to see that it was fulfilled. I do not know but that the argument is a little late, as the whole matter has dropped short of any exigency of that kind. As soon as the dispatch from Mr. Willis was received, as I understand from the message and the documents which have been sent to us, a dispatch was at once sent to him that the matter was closed and was to remain where it was left by the Queen's refusal.

But be that as it may, I do not think that even for the purposes of a moot question here on what is a proper constitutional view to take of the powers of the Queen under the constitution which has been overthrown, the contention of the Senator from Massachusetts is likely to play much figure in this constitutional discussion.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware, not being able to meet or to answer the force of what I said, has proceeded to make a most extraordinary distortion of my language. The Senator says that the Senator from Massachusetts manifested a tender regard for the constitution of Hawaii, and that I insisted the Queen should have those people tried. Mr. President, it requires all my respect for that Senator to suppose that he believed that when he said it.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator will allow me; I think he misunderstood me.

Mr. HOAR. I wrote down the Senator's language.

Mr. GRAY. Not that they should be tried, but that they should not have extended to them amnesty and pardon.

Mr. HOAR. That I insist they should not. Well, take it in either way.

Mr. GRAY. Take it in that way.

Mr. HOAR. I will repeat what I said, and I challenge the Senator to stand in his place and deny it. I said that when the promise was exacted from that woman it was a void promise, a promise which would be in violation of her oath of office, and that the Queen notified us that it was a void promise. She said, "I am bound by the law and I can not legally do this thing." Now, the Senator gets up and says that I insisted those people ought to be tried, when I pointed out and read the constitution to show that she was right, because she can not issue a proclamation of amnesty before trial, because the constitution confines her to a pardon after conviction, and she can not issue a pardon after conviction because the constitution says she can only act by the advice and consent of her cabinet, and in this particular case by the advice and consent of the cabinet and privy council both, both of which are necessary to a pardon.

When I make that suggestion and the Senator gets up and says I am arguing that those people ought to be tried or punished, it is a plea of guilty in behalf of the Administration; and the Senator gets up and says something else, and puts into my mouth something else and undertakes to defend something else.

I think those men ought not to be tried; I think they ought not to be punished, not because I think they ought to be pardoned, but because I think they have done nothing worthy of punishment. They ought no more to be tried or to be punished or to be pardoned than William Russell, or Algernon Sidney, or John Hampden, or George Washington, or Benjamin Franklin, or John Dickinson ought to have been tried or punished or pardoned. They were defending constitutional liberty in the way which, if not pointed out in the constitution, is established and sanctioned by the custom of free men, and has the force of law everywhere.

Mr. President, another thing which the Senator from Delaware said, it seems to me, requires a little explanation, and that is that the President, with the power with which he is clothed, would be able to have kept this void, unconstitutional promise, in violation of an oath of office given to Mr. Willis. With what power is he clothed? Is he to do it by an act of war, without the consent of Congress?

Mr. GRAY. The Senator has not quoted all that I said.

Mr. HOAR. I have quoted that which the Senator said, and that is what I am dealing with.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator is not dealing with all that I said.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will address the Chair.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose the President of the United States had the war power and was clothed with it, as somebody seems to think he is, is this a treaty? Is this a promise that the United States can insist upon? Is it a promise which the Queen, in the first place, notified Mr. Willis was unconstitutional, and a promise, in the second place, which can not rise to the dignity of an international promise, because the treaty-making power of the United States has never accepted it? It is not possible for the Queen of Hawaii, if she were clothed with absolute power, to make a binding promise to the United States which could be enforced by international processes, either of war or peace, unless by a treaty to which the Senate of the United States had given its consent.

Mr. GRAY. Or by giving an order to the marines, as Mr. Stevens did.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Stevens did not. That is another fallacy which I did not intend to enter upon now. Mr. Stevens never gave an order to the marines of the United States and never had and never pretended to have any authority over that subject. The authority to land the marines and the exercise of that authority was lodged in the admiral of the United States, as it could only legally be lodged, on an authority or order given him by the Secretary of the Navy. All that Mr. Stevens did was to bring certain facts to the knowledge of the admiral and to make his request.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. I know the Senator wants to be accurate.

Mr. HOAR. I do.

Mr. GRAY. But we have before us in the papers sent in by President Harrison, with the treaty of annexation, a letter of Capt. Wiltse to the Secretary of the Navy, in which he says: "At 4 o'clock this afternoon, by order of Minister Stevens, I landed the ship's battalion."

Mr. HOAR. I do not know what particular phrase may be found in the naval officer's report, and I do not care; but I do know, and the Senator, I think, knows, or will know——

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator cares for the fact, I have stated it, while the Senator stated it to be the contrary. Does it make no difference which way the fact is?

Mr. HOAR. I did not state it to be the contrary.

Mr. GRAY. I state it to be the contrary.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator hear my sentence?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I say I do not care what particular phrase, exact or inexact, may be found in a naval officer's report; the legal authority and the only authority which that man acted upon was the order of the Secretary of the Navy. He could act on no other; and there was no power to put him under the hand of a minister of the United States.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. Did the Secretary of the Navy authorize the admiral or anyone else to raise the flag of the United States over the capitol of Hawaii.

Mr. HOAR. That is a matter which, it seems to me, does not concern what we are talking about just now.

Mr. DANIEL. I think I can show the Senator from Massachusetts that it bears very much upon what he is dealing with now. The American commissioner was sent to Hawaii when the flag of the United States was over the capitol of the country. I should like to ask the Senator if that was not a condition of war between this country and Hawaii brought about by the action of the American minister?

Mr. HOAR. Not at all, when it was done by the consent of the lawfully recognized Government of Hawaii.

Mr. DANIEL. It was done by the consent of the hitherto de facto Government, but when they recognized the sovereignty of another country did they not cease to be de facto?

Mr. HOAR. Not at all.

Mr. DANIEL. They did not claim to be a legal government, except in so far as they were de facto.

Mr. HOAR. That is all any government can claim.

Mr. DANIEL. When they turned over all their de facto functions, so far as concerns the protection of the lives of British, German, American, Japanese, Chinese, and everybody, and all the property in the Hawaiian Islands to the custody and care of the sovereignty of the United States was not the United States the only sovereign power there?

Mr. HOAR. When there is any evidence that they did that there will be time enough to put that hypothetical question. I do not understand that to be the fact or anything like it. I understand that the de facto Government of the Hawaiian Islands invited the landing of our troops, but that they were landed with their function explicitly confined to the protection of life and property as they had been instructed by Mr. Bayard as well as by Mr. Foster and Mr. Blaine.

Mr. WHITE of Louisiana. Would it disturb the Senator if I should ask him a question?

Mr. HOAR. Let me finish.

Mr. WHITE of Louisiana. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. HOAR. I certainly can not answer four questions at once. It was said by a certain Irish orator that a man could not be at two places at once unless he were a bird. A man can not argue four questions at once unless his brain is in a very democratic state of confusion.

Now, I was replying to the Senator from Virginia. I say that that function was carefully confined and that Mr. Stevens carefully refused to do anything except to preserve the life and property of American citizens (I do not go so far as to say to preserve order) according to the universal instruction of this Government to its ministers there. Then, when the Provisional Government voted as it had the right, being the de facto Government, to offer a treaty of annexation to this country, they put up the American flag there as a matter of respect, courtesy, or honor, in anticipation of what they expected was to come to pass.

But it was done fully with the authority and assent of the existing lawful Government there. Who has not seen on the Fourth of July and on state occasions, as a courtesy, the flag of America in various countries of Europe side by side in a place of honor with the flag of the country where it was raised?

Mr. DANIEL. Would I interrupt the Senator if I should ask him a question right there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. I understand the Senator to say that the United States occupied Hawaii and raised its flag over the capitol by the invitation of the de facto Provisional Government. Now, laying aside its invitation, the question I should like to ask the Senator is, what right had the American minister or the American admiral, at anybody's invitation, to assume the sovereignty of a foreign country in the name of the United States without the authority of the President or of Congress?

Mr. HOAR. None at all.

Mr. DANIEL. And, as the Senator has investigated the subject, I should like to ask him, furthermore, what was the condition of affairs brought about by the establishment of a military protectorate over a foreign country in the name of the United States, and if after that the same legal conditions existed that existed when there was a de facto civil government?

Mr. HOAR. There was no such protectorate established; there was no such function assumed; there was no such significance given to the hoisting of the flag. It was an act of courtesy, pure and simple, on the part of the de facto Government, as I understand it. It had no more significance than my hanging the United States flag out of my window on the Fourth of July when I was traveling in Europe last summer.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg to call attention——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. HOAR. I do not yield any further.

Mr. DANIEL. All right, sir.

Mr. HOAR. I am not discussing that question. I did not rise to say anything on that point. That will be discussed quite soon enough, I think, for our friends on the other side, or for any of us, when the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations comes in and all the testimony is before us.

Mr. DANIEL. I should like to state the point I wanted to put to the Senator. I shall not argue it.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to recall the attention of the Senate and of the country to the one point which I was making, which was all I rose to say, and that is that this pretended stipulation for amnesty came from a ruler just overthrown because she had violated her oath of office, as everybody must admit. No man will claim that she had not been engaged in an unconstitutional act of overthrowing her Government. Not only that, but it came also from a ruler who had no power to carry it into effect, and who fully and fairly twice advised the minister of the United States that it was a totally illegal promise she was making.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. GRAY. I want two minutes, if the Senator from New Hampshire will give way to me. As the Senator from Massachusetts has said something so personal to myself I think I ought to say a word in explanation.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield a moment longer.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Massachusetts said I misrepresented him, and that I had distorted what he had said. I will not stop to dwell upon whether I deserve that from the Senator from Massachusetts, or whether that forgetfulness of the courtesy due to any Senator has in my case been forgotten. I did not distort what the Senator said, but the Senator totally misunderstood what I said. I did not say that the Senator from Massachusetts was in favor of those people being beheaded. I said he seemed to be unwilling that the Queen under the constitution should extend amnesty to them if they were convicted. That is all I said.

Now, in regard to the other matter, when I interjected perhaps a little out of order, but the Senator took no exception to it (certainly I did not intend any rudeness to the Senator from Massachusetts), that perhaps the President of the United States might do as Mr. Stevens did, land the marines in order to make good the exaction he had required from the Queen, the Senator said with a great deal of emphasis that Mr. Stevens never ordered the marines landed; that if they were landed they were landed by the authority of the naval commander in those waters, subject to the orders of the Secretary of the Navy.

I quote to the Senator from the report of Capt. Wiltse himself to the Secretary of the Navy that at such an hour this afternoon "I did land the ship's battalion in obedience to the orders of Minister Stevens." I ask the Senator not to answer it now, but to explain why on the very day or the next day after those troops were landed the committee on safety should proclaim the Provisional Government and sent a letter to Mr. Stevens closing in this way:

> We are unable to protect ourselves without aid, and therefore pray for the protection of the United States forces.

And after that request was made Minister Stevens ordered or requested Capt. Wiltse to land.

Mr. TELLER. How long after?

Mr. GRAY. On the same day.

Mr. HOAR. Now, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HOAR. May I be pardoned one moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator himself gives away two-thirds of his previous statement. He says they ordered or requested the naval officer to land the marines. These two phrases which he treats as equivalent contain all the difference in the world.

I may as well state now as at any time (I will interfere with the Senator from New Hampshire with but one sentence) that I do not conceive there can be constitutionally lodged in an American minister or an American citizen by any act of the President the authority to command a fleet or the captain of a ship. Undoubtedly we may say to the commander of our fleet at Constantinople, "If you shall hear from the minister in Greece that he thinks it advisable you shall repair to the Piræus and protect American interests;" but the authority must come from the official superior to the officer, and the request or suggestion from the minister is a mere condition, as if he had said, when the sun rise, or if there be an earthquake, or if there be a fire, or if there be disorder, you shall do it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the printing of the message of the President with the accompanying documents and their reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. DANIEL. May I say a few words before that is done?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Only by the courtesy of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. DANIEL. I do not wish to trespass on the Senator from New Hampshire unless with entire convenience to himself. I desire to occupy only about three minutes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will gladly yield to the Senator from Virginia for a few minutes.

Mr. DANIEL. I appreciate the Senator's courtesy.

Mr. President, I wish briefly to answer the point made by the Senator from Massachusetts, that no power can be lodged, as he says, in a minister of the United States to give orders to the military forces of the United States, a point which he makes for the purpose, I presume, of criticising the conduct of the present Administration.

Mr. HOAR. Not at all. The Senator will pardon me. That was a point entirely introduced by my honorable friend from Virginia, and I made my statement of the law in answer to his question. The remark was not made for the sake of criticising anybody.

Mr. DANIEL. Well, the general trend of the remarks of the Senator are adverse to the conduct of affairs by the present Administration.

Mr. HOAR. Yes; I think so. That I will admit.

Mr. DANIEL. I am glad now that we concur. I thought we did all the time as to that point. I wish simply to answer that point in the brief time allotted me in so far as to say that the point is a much belated one; that it is now over a year old, and should have been previously applied to the conduct of Minister Stevens, who assumed with respect to the military forces of the United States the attitude of a supreme commander-in-chief above the admiral, above the President, above the Congress, above the laws, and above the Constitution of the United States, and who through them made himself, and through himself made the United States, whether rightfully or wrongfully, the supreme sovereign authority in the Hawaiian Islands.

The Senator from Massachusetts refers, as does the late minister of the United States, Mr. Stevens, to the landing of troops for the protection of life and property. If he means American life and property that is one thing, but I call his attention to the fact avowed by Minister Stevens in his proclamation, that he entered the Hawaiian Islands with the strong hand of war, and that the Hawaiian flag was hauled down and surrendered, and the United States flag, under his orders, was raised over the capitol building at Honolulu with martial forces around it to support it there for the protection not of American property, for the protection not of American lives, but, according to the invitation of the Provisional Government, to assume the occupancy of the Hawaiian soil and the sovereignty of the Hawaiian people for the protection of all property, whether English, American, German, Chinese, Japanese, or Hawaiian, and for the protection of all the lives of the 90,000 population.

I ask the Senator, as he has investigated this subject much for the purpose of calling the attention of the American people to any who may have transgressed the Constitution or the laws, where has he found sanction in our Constitution, in our laws, for an American minister to invade a foreign country and assume in the name of the United States the sovereign protectorate over all the lives and property in it at anybody's invitation. It may be all right so far as resigning a weak, de facto government was concerned, but is it all right as far as this Government and its Constitution and its laws are concerned?

Now, is it not obvious to the Senator from Massachusetts that when this Government, whether rightfully or wrongfully, whether legally or illegally, had been placed in the attitude of holding the sovereignty over the soil and over the property and over the lives of that people, a condition of things had been created in which all former laws were abrogated and all former powers abdicated, and in which we had to extricate ourselves from a diplomatic mess as best we could? I should like to hear from him when he shall speak on this occasion, from his learned and trained mind, as to what was the status between Hawaii and the United States brought about by this conquest of its soil and this sovereignty over its people.

I beg leave to call his attention to the fact that the attitude in which is placed the American minister by my remarks is the attitude in which, in the Administration of Benjamin Harrison, the letters of the Secretary of State placed him, and that his elevation of the American flag (which the Senator says signified nothing more than his holding a flag out of a window) was regarded by Secretary Foster as an assumption and usurpation of power, and was especially repudiated eo nomine by him in legal effect. According to the instructions given the American minister that flag was ordered to be hauled down by Secretary Foster before the present Administration came into power.

This is all I have to say for the present, Mr. President.

Mr. HOAR. I think before we get through I shall show the Senator that the facts are not as he understands them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the motion that the President's message and accompanying documents be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOAR subsequently said: I understand that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] desires to say something in the course of a day or two on this matter, and therefore, with the leave of the Senate, I should like to have the President's message and documents remain on the table for the present, if there be no objection.

Mr. GORMAN. And printed.

Mr. HOAR. Just let them be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the motion by which the message and documents were ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations be reconsidered, and the message and documents be printed and lie on the table. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

TARIFF POLICY.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the resolution heretofore submitted by me be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. GALLINGER, December 20, 1893, as follows:

Resolved, That in view of the widespread industrial depression existing in our land, bringing disaster to the manufacturing interests and loss of employment and suffering to the wage-earning classes, it is the sense of the Senate of the United States that it is unwise to attempt any change in the tariff laws now on the statute books during the present Administration, believing as we do that the announcement that the protection to American industries and American labor secured by the McKinley tariff law is to be continued will reopen the factories and workshops of the country, giving remunerative employment to the hundreds of thousands of operatives now in enforced idleness, thus doing away with the suffering and destitution which prevail to a greater extent than ever before in the history of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I believe that if this resolution were adopted the business depression now upon the country would practically cease.

Never since the year in which the President of the United States was born—the terrible year of 1837—has there been such suffering, sorrow, and destitution in our land as exist to-day. From every State of the American Union, and from all classes and conditions of men, the cry for relief comes. From all the great industrial centers and from the laboring masses of our people comes the plea to Congress to leave the existing tariff law intact. In this plea Democrats unite with Republicans, and the employés with their employers. But in the very face of it all, the Democratic party seems intent upon overthrowing the high protective principle and substituting some form of a tariff for revenue only.

While the poor man asks for employment and his children suffer for bread the Democratic leaders coolly propose to enact a law that will necessarily reduce both the amount and the price of labor in this country, and bring the American workingman in direct competition with the labor of foreign nations, from which an army of toilers flee every year to the United States. It is an astonishing and an alarming condition of things, which has already wrought untold misery upon the workingman and brought incalculable loss and suffering to the manufacturers of the North.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE TARIFF.

In his message to the two Houses of Congress at the beginning of the second session of the Fifty third Congress the President made use of some most extraordinary language. In alluding to the Wilson tariff bill he frankly avowed that "the local interests affected by the proposed reform are so numerous and so varied that if all are insisted upon the legislation embodying the reform must inevitably fail." What stronger language could any Republican use than that? Indeed, the interests affected by the proposed tariff legislation are varied and numerous. They are found everywhere throughout the North, and upon their continuance depends the happiness and prosperity of intelligent and industrious communities. They have built up magnificent cities and enterprising villages; they have given employment to our people; they have established and maintained a high rate of wage, and they have created a home market for every dollar's worth of surplus product that the farmer has to sell.

But all this is now to be changed. These numerous and varied industries are advised by the President to remain silent while they are utterly destroyed by the Democratic party, in pretended fulfillment of a monstrously absurd promise in a political platform. Possibly they will remain silent, but the indications are that the lion of labor is being unleashed, and the party that passes the tariff bill that the President so strongly commends will have abundant leisure after the scepter of power has been wrested from it to regret its folly.

Again the President says:

Even if the often disproved assertion could be made good that a lower rate of wages would result from free raw materials and low tariff duties, the intelligence of our workingmen leads them quickly to discover that their steady employment, permitted by free raw materials, is the most important factor in their relation to tariff legislation.

THE M'KINLEY LAW GAVE PROSPERITY.

Let us see how that is. From the day the McKinley tariff law was enacted until the inauguration of Grover Cleveland on the 4th day of March last, unparalleled prosperity was upon all the country. No industrious man or woman was involuntarily out of employment in all the North. Every spindle was running, and the music of the loom and the hammer was heard throughout our borders. Wages were higher than those paid in any other land, and relatively higher than was ever before paid in the United States. All was peace, happiness, and contentment. But the Democratic party triumphed on a platform which declared high protection to be unconstitutional and a robbery. Notice was served upon the country that the promises of the platform were to be redeemed.

Almost immediately industrial depression commenced and work became scarce. What other result could reasonably have been expected? When this depression came the President, instead of patriotically declaring that he would oppose all efforts to overthrow protection, hastily summoned Congress together in August last, saying to the country that the whole trouble came from the so-called Sherman silver law, and that when the purchasing clause of that law had been repealed prosperity would again be assured. I did not agree with the President in that view, and on the 16th day of August—nine days after the assembling of the special session—took occasion to express my dissent in the Senate Chamber. Among other things I said on that occasion, speaking of affairs in my own State:

Mr. President, does anybody suppose that the wholesale dry-goods houses are refusing to buy Amoskeag ginghams because they are afraid that when the bills come due they will be allowed to pay them in dollars worth only 60 cents. Is it strange that people do not buy Amoskeag ginghams for future use when the great Democratic party is pledged to practically abolish the duty on them, and open a home market to the stocks that have been accumulating in England since the passage of the McKinley bill?

Is it any wonder that manufacturers hesitate about piling up goods which they may be obliged to sell in free competition with those produced abroad by labor costing only two-thirds what they pay for it here? What is there strange about that, and how will the repeal of the Sherman law help out that condition of things?

Is there anything mysterious in the fact that, with an avowed bitter and all-powerful enemy of every protected industry in the White House, and with both Houses of Congress pledged to carry out his destructive purposes, capital goes into hiding, industry ceases, and bankruptcy runs riot through the country? I discover nothing mysterious in this matter. It is the logical outcome of the triumph of a party pledged to the destruction of high protection in this country.

I need not tell the Senate or the country that those utterances have been justified by results. The Sherman silver law was repealed, largely by Republican votes, but what has become of the President's prophecy? Where is the renewed prosperity the country was to have? Where the labor for the unemployed, and where the bread for the hungry? Equally futile will be his promise that when the numerous and varied industries of New England and the North are crippled by Democratic tariff legislation the poor sop of free raw materials will give steady employment to the workingmen of our country. New England does not ask for free raw materials, but she does ask for legislation that will protect manufacturer and laborer alike from the underpaid labor of Europe and Asia.

FREE RAW MATERIALS A FALLACY.

"Free raw materials." What a fallacy the term is. Why, Mr. President, there is nothing in this universe that can properly be called a "raw material"—certainly nothing that can be moved from one place to another is entitled to that designation. The tree standing in the forest comes the nearest to it, but the moment the ax is laid to the tree it ceases to be raw material. Labor has entered into and become a part of the product, and to that extent it should be protected. Coal and iron ore quietly resting in the bowels of the earth may be called raw materials, but when they are mined and put on cars or vessels, and transported from one point to another, they cease to be raw materials, their chief value being in the labor which has been expended upon them. One definition has it that "actual raw material is a product of the earth in its normal condition." I like that definition, because it is a correct one.

If the Democratic party would only study it a little they would see that the raw material of one class is the finished product of another, and that at every step in the development American labor has a right to demand its full share of protection. New England asks for neither free coal, free iron ore, free lumber, or free wool. In them all is represented the toil and sweat of honest men—toil and sweat which have a right to demand adequate protection from the cheaper labor of Canada, Nova Scotia, Australia, and South America. Free raw materials and reduced tariff duties will primarily injure the workingman by lessening wages, and secondarily the manufacturer, because the laboring classes will have practically nothing with which to buy the products of our mills. It has been our boast that as a nation we consumed per capita more than any other country on the face of the earth (twice or three times as much as some), but all that will change when wages are reduced and the poor man finds it difficult to earn enough to procure food and shelter for his family.

THE UNEMPLOYED AND THE CAUSE.

Mr. President, it was my intention when the resolution was offered to present voluminous statistics which I had carefully collected, showing the number and condition of the unemployed in this country. But every Senator must have reasonably accurate information on this point, and I will content myself with saying in a general way that special reports recently made to Bradstreet's agency show that there are in 119 American cities, in enforced idleness, 801,000 workingmen, upon whom 1,956,000 people depend for support. Extend that to all the cities and large towns of the country, and the magnitude of the disaster which has come upon labor is absolutely appalling. And this is not all. There are other hundreds of thousands who are working at reduced rates and on short hours, thus getting only enough to keep the wolf from the door by the most rigid economy.

As an illustration of how things are going on under the shadow of the impending Wilson tariff bill, one of the leading New England woolen manufacturers said a few days ago that he was running his mills at less than one-half their cap city and on only the cheaper grade of goods. To induce merchants to buy these he has been obliged to practically guarantee them against loss in case the market price should be forced down by the passage, or prospect of the passage, of the Wilson bill. He also said that many of the woolen mills which were starting up were doing so for the purpose of getting out their samples, and not because they had orders amounting to anything. He represented the condition of affairs in the woolen manu acturing business as far the worst he had ever seen during nearly fifty years of practical experience.

With the Wilson bill a law, in his opinion the conditions will be much worse than now and will be more likely to be absolutely ruinous to woolen manufacturing, even with the great reduction in wages that is sure to come. The manufacturer quoted was not talking as an alarmist nor as a politician, but simply as a business man who sees the results of the sturdy efforts of two generations crumbling away and himself utterly powerless to prevent it. He was in a state of despondency over the present condition of his business and its future prospects both for himself and his employés.

Listen to this letter:

MY DEAR SIR: We have yours of the 1st instant, and in reply would say that we are not buying paper at present. Above all, we do not wish to stock up on a falling market. If the Wilson bill passes we may buy our paper in England.

Yours very truly,

ALBERT BRANDT, JR.

TRENTON, N. J., January 4.

That was the letter that the agent of the Mount Holly Paper Company, of Mount Holly, Pa., received on the 4th instant. And why not? Why should this house stock up with American paper at present prices (low as they are), when the Wilson tariff bill promises them cheaper paper from the mills of England?

DEMOCRATS AS WELL AS REPUBLICANS OPPOSED TO THE WILSON BILL.

Mr. President, I was greatly astonished to hear a distinguished Senator from a Southern State, a few days ago, declare in impassioned words that Republican manufacturers are closing their mills so as to create public sentiment against the reform of the tariff. It seemed to me that the Senator had not reflected on his words.

Does not the Senator know the condition that exists throughout the North in manufacturing districts? Does he not know that the petitions which are pouring in from workingmen come from Democrats as well as Republicans, and that the mass meetings that are being held in Northern cities to protest against the proposed tariff laws are nonpartisan? Does he not know that Democratic manufacturers, one of them the member of the Democratic national committee from New Hampshire, have been in Washington begging and pleading to be saved from their own folly in helping to elect Mr. Cleveland and a Democratic Congress? If he does not know these things he ought to acquaint himself with the facts before making such a serious charge against the Republican manufacturers of the country.

Does the Senator not know that according to a recent statement from Dun & Co., of New York, this reliable house says that—

Starting with the largest trade ever known, mills crowded with work and all business stimulated by high hopes, the year of 1893 has proved, in sudden shrinkage of trade, in commercial disasters and depression of industries, the worst for fifty years. Whether the final results of the panic of 1837 were relatively more severe, the scanty records of that time do not clearly show. The year closes with the prices of many products the lowest ever known, with millions of workers seeking in vain for work, and with charity laboring to keep back suffering and starvation in all our cities.

STARTLING STATISTICS.

The same trade circular gives the following dismal review of existing conditions:

All hope the new year may bring brighter days, but the dying year leaves only a dismal record. The review of different departments of trade given to-day exhibits a collapse of industry and business which is almost without precedent. The iron industry sustained a weekly production of 181,551 tons of pig iron May 1, but by October 1 the output had fallen to 73,895 tons, and the recovery to about 100,000 tons December 1 still leaves 40 per cent of the force unemployed.

Over half of the woolen manufacture is idle, and, excepting a brief recovery in November, has been ever since new wool came in May, for all sales at the three chief markets in the eight months have been but 106,795,460 pounds, partly for speculation, the price having fallen 20 per cent for fleece to the lowest point ever known, against 212,339,003 pounds in the same months last year.

Sales of cotton goods are fully a quarter below the usual quantity. The small advance attempted in boots and shoes a year ago was not sustained. But with prices as low as ever, the shipments of boots and shoes from Boston are 24 per cent less than last year in December, and though in November the decrease was but 10.8 per cent it has been 22 per cent for the last four months.

Not only manufactured goods as a whole but the most important farm products are so low that producers find little comfort in the outlook. Official and other reports deluded traders with the notion that crops of last year were so short that famine prices could be realized on purchases. Enormous stocks were bought and held with the aid of banks, until heavy receipts in the spring caused a collapse of wheat, pork, and cotton pools.

Disastrous failures helped to produce the alarm which soon made money impossible to get, but even at the worst hour of the panic prices were scarcely lower than they are now. Wheat has repeatedly sold in New York and Chicago at the lowest price ever known, and is but one-half a cent above it now.

Pork fell $7 in an hour when the speculation burst, but sells lower yet today. Cotton was lifted a cent with accounts of scarcity in September, but has lost most of the gain and sells below 8 cents.

BUSINESS FAILURES.

In the matter of failures Dun & Co. say:

In thirty-seven years covered by the records of this agency the number of failures has only once risen a little above 16,650 in a year. In 1893 the number reported has been 16,650. The aggregate of liabilities in all failures reported has in six years not risen above $200,000,000. This year the strictly commercial liabilities alone have reached $331,422,939. The liabilities of banking and financial institutions have been $210,956,844, and the liabilities of railroads placed in the hands of receivers $1,212,217,033. Classified returns show 3,226 manufacturing failures, with liabilities of $164,707,449; 10,683 failures in legitimate trade, with liabilities of $85,527,836, and 302 other failures, including brokers and speculators, with liabilities of $35,662,735.

It should not be forgotten that a very large proportion of these disasters have come upon the country at a time when the banks are glutted with money and the rates of interest unusually low. What is the cause of it all, unless it is that the proposed overthrow of existing tariff laws has paralyzed business by alarming manufacturers, jobbers, and merchants? All are waiting to see what the Democratic party proposes to do for the business interests of the country.

EXPENDITURES EXCEED RECEIPTS.

Mr. President, it is pertinent to ask what is the nature of the relief promised by the so-called Wilson tariff bill? During the month of December the expenditures of the Government exceeded the receipts $7,746,233.51, and for the six months from July 1, to January 1 the deficit is $37,664,329.17. This indicates that at the end of the present fiscal year the expenditures will exceed the receipts at least $50,000,000 and possibly $75,000,000. In the face of this condition of things the Democratic party proposes changes in the rate of duties which they admit will cause a further deficit of at least $70,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to add to what the Senator says on one point. In the published statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury it will be found that the amount of the deficit is constantly increasing, and it is now estimated at $78,000,000 for the present fiscal year.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am obliged to the Senator for that correction. I remember that a very little time ago the present Secretary of the Treasury made a suggestion that the deficit would be $28,000,000. He certainly has revised his figures very materially to have come to the conclusion that it will be $78,000,000. My attention is just called to the Secretary's statement mentioned by the distinguished Senator from Ohio. From this it appears that matters are much worse than I had supposed, as the expenditures have exceeded the receipts for the first twelve days in January over $6,000,000. If matters go on in this way the deficit for the fiscal year will be $100,000,000 at least.

In view of this condition of things what sane man can support the Democratic programme? And how is this enormous deficiency in the revenues to be met?

PROPOSED INCOME TAX—A SECTIONAL MEASURE.

The answer comes that one of the war taxes, against which our Democratic friends are in the habit of declaiming, is to be revived. An income-tax law is to be enacted. Tariff duties are to be lowered for the benefit of foreign manufacturers and the inevitable destruction of American industrial establishments, and then our own people are to be directly taxed to support the Government. Such statesmanship as that has heretofore been unknown in this country, and it remains to be seen whether the Congress of the United States will approve of the proposition.

Mr. President, this country had an income-tax law from 1863 to 1873, when it was repealed. It was adopted as a war measure, and used to help repair some of the ravages of the fierce strife of 1861–65. It was found to be inequitable, unjust, inquisitorial, and offensive—a tax upon the prosperity of our own people rather than upon the products and profits of foreign governments. It is said that such a tax will yield a revenue of $50,000,000, and thus make it possible to take off and reduce the duties on some imported articles. But how will this help the laboring man? It will not set a single American mill running or build a new one. On the contrary it will, by encouraging increased importations, close American mills, degrade American labor, and build up foreign interests at the expense of our own country. It will punish the North for its energy, enterprise, and thrift, and fasten upon this country a form of odious taxation, already once tried and repudiated—a form of taxation denounced not only by Republicans but by scores of prominent Democrats and Democratic newspapers in different parts of the United States.

Our Southern friends have much to say about sectionalism, and they never lose an opportunity to charge sectional feeling upon the North. But I know of no form of taxation so offensively sectional as this proposed income-tax law. In answer to a resolution recently introduced by me the Secretary of the Treasury has furnished the Senate tables showing the amounts paid by the several States and Territories during each of the years from 1863 to 1873, when an income-tax law was on the statute book.

These tables are so valuable that I will ask to have them incorporated as a part of my remarks. The tables are as follows:

Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting statement of the amount of revenue derived from the income tax from 1863 to 1873.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 18, 1883.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith the statement of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue showing the amount of tax derived from income from all sources, under the income-tax law of 1862, for the years 1863 to 1873 inclusive, called for in Senate resolution of the 11th instant.

Very respectfully,

J. G. CARLISLE, Secretary.

Hon. ADLAI E. STEVENSON,
President of the United States Senate.

AN INSTRUCTIVE ANALYSIS.

An analysis of these tables is instructive and suggestive. It appears that the grand total collected during the eleven years of the income-tax law was $347,220,887.86. Of this amount the sixteen Southern States, including the border States of Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, and West Virginia, paid $36,624,819.69, while the Northern States and Territories paid $296,706,524.28, the unaccounted balance (about $13,000,000) having been paid by United States officers and employés.

While the entire South paid $36,624,819.69, the eleven distinctively Southern States of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia, paid only $10,651,061.30, or about 3 per cent of the entire amount.

The Northern States paid over eight times as much as the South, and nearly thirty times as much as the eleven distinctively Southern States.

The six New England States paid $61,584,093.29, or 70 per cent more than the entire South, and six times as much as the eleven distinctively Southern States.

Massachusetts paid $41,162,496.35, being four millions and a half more than the entire South. Pennsylvania paid $47,748,326.82, being eleven millions more than the South, while New York paid $104,499,939.45, nearly one-third of the entire tax, and almost three times as much as the entire South.

That the tax was an unpopular one, and exceedingly difficult of collection, is shown by the fact that in 1873, the last year the law was in force, Pennsylvania paid 59 per cent as much as in 1872, New Hampshire 55 per cent, Massachusetts 24 per cent, Virginia 23 per cent, Louisiana 8 per cent, and Tennessee and Rhode Island only 6 per cent.

It is now proposed to revive this odious and inquisitorial tax, with the certainty that the North will have to pay the bulk of it, thus enabling the promoters of the Wilson tariff bill to strike down our manufacturing interests in behalf of importers and foreign manufacturers. It is a monstrous proposition, and it remains to be seen whether Northern Representatives and Senators will give their support to such a sectional and unjust scheme of taxation—a law that would necessarily turn a swarm of spies and informers loose upon the country, and pay a premium to tax-dodging and perjury.

And not only is the income-tax proposition sectional and unjust, but the entire Wilson bill is constructed along the same line. Southern rice is enormously protected, while Northern agricultural products are mostly on the free list. Southern oranges are cared for, but Northern apples are ignored. Southern marble is highly protected, but Northern granite is made to suffer. Iron ties for Southern cotton are looked after, but iron bales for Northern hay are heavily taxed, notwithstanding the hay crop of the United States, according to the census reports of 1890, amounted to $400,000,000, and the cotton crop to only $305,000,000. That is the kind of legislation that it is proposed to enact, and Northern Senators are expected to support it by their votes.

A SEVERE BLOW AT NEW ENGLAND IN THE INTERESTS OF CANADA.

Mr. President, I have endeavored to point out the evil effects of the proposed tariff legislation upon the North as a whole. Let me for a moment call attention to its effect upon the industries and products of New England. We are in close proximity to Canada, a country which has a high protective tariff against almost everything we manufacture and produce. The McKinley tariff law adequately protects our lumber and agricultural products against the lumber and agricultural products of our Canadian neighbors. But the Wilson tariff bill absolutely destroys the lumber industry of Northern New England, and in addition by putting lime, wool, vegetables, fruits, eggs, milk, and other articles on the free list, as well as greatly reducing the duties on horses, cattle, butter, hay, potatoes, leaf tobacco, and other agricultural products, the extent of the injury to our agriculturists can scarcely be estimated.

What wonder is it that the St. John Telegraph editorially says, "Now we will have a Canadian boom"? What wonder is it that the Toronto Globe declares that "the free list is most comprehensive" and is "advantageous to Canadians"? or that the Montreal Herald asserts that "our trade with the United States, which has rapidly fallen off for the last ten years, will pick up wonderfully if the Wilson bill becomes a law"? The Montreal Gazette acknowledges that "Canada's interest in the measure is somewhat extensive," and publicly boasts that "it is evident that the fact was not forgotten by the framers of the bill." Of course it was not forgotten. The Wilson bill is fashioned for the benefit of foreign producers, irrespective of nationality or allegiance. It is a world-wide measure, designed to give English, German, French, Canadian, Mexican, and Asiatic alike full access to American markets.

The only people it is intended to injure are American people; and it will not permanently give American consumers a single article for less than is now paid. When the McKinley bill passed Canadian cattle and horses were reduced in price the amount of the increased tariff, and now they will go up again as high as the price in the adjoining States. There is no doubt of that. What wonder is it that a prominent Canadian joyfully exclaims:

The Wilson bill will give Canada a great boom, and kill annexation. If this taking off the tariff by the Wilson bill did not benefit Canadians, what are we rejoicing over? Would we rejoice if the United States got the benefit? This bill is worth millions to Canada.

But, Mr. President, the full extent of the damage to New England can only be understood when it is realized that a tremendous cut is to be made in the duties on the manufactures of wool and cotton, granite, cutlery, jewelry, brick, and many other articles. But the heaviest and most disastrous blow will fall upon the knitting industry of our section of the country. Already the business is paralyzed and wages reduced in these establishments. A few days ago I presented a petition from the employés of the Olzendam Hosiery Company, of Manchester, N. H., signed by both Democrats and Republicans, saying they would hold the men responsible at the polls who would vote in Congress to destroy their best interests.

THE HOSIERY INDUSTRY.

There are knitting mills scattered all over the Northern States which have heretofore been prosperous and have given employment to a great many people at good wages. How do the owners and employés like the prospect now? In the ten years ending with the close of 1890 these establishments were increased one and a half times, or 150 per cent; the number of employés was more than doubled, while the sum paid out to them in wages increased from $7,000,000 to $18,000,000. All this time prices of manufactured goods have been continually growing less, because of improved facilities and home competition. But the new tariff will knock out all this business, unless wages come down to the price paid in Germany. In the McKinley tariff cotton hosiery is in four classes, according to prices, which range from 60 cents to $4 a dozen.

A compound duty is levied, rising from 20 cents a dozen and 20 per cent on the value to $1 a dozen and 40 per cent on the value. Cotton underwear is also put into four classes, from $1 a dozen to $7 a dozen. The duty rises from $1 a dozen and 35 per cent on the value to $2 a dozen and 40 per cent on the value. The proposed new bill sweeps away both the classifications and the duties. It puts upon stockings and underwear under $1.50 a dozen a single duty of 30 per cent on the value. Upon goods of higher grade is laid a duty of 35 per cent on the value, excepting that so-called "fashioned" fabrics shall pay 40 per cent. In the case of most of the articles these changes would involve a reduction of duty from two-fifths to one-half. The reductions upon woolen knit goods would be equally large. There is not a knitting mill in the United States that could continue operations with only a 30 per cent duty on the value of the goods, and pay the wages now paid in this country.

A MESSAGE OF DESTRUCTION.

So here is the message of destruction that the Democratic party proposes to send to the employers and working people in the scores of knitting mills all over New England and New York. Pass this atrocious bill and a thousand hosiery establishments will stop their machinery and close their doors, or else more than sixty thousand American men and women will accept wages such as are paid to the half-starved people of Saxony. One hundred thousand Americans depend for their daily bread upon the knitting industry alone, while as many more employed in spinning yarn and making machinery can prosper only when the knitting industry has prosperity. For all this host of honest Americans, and, indeed, for the men who have built up the business with their capital and enterprise, the advocates of tariff reform seem to have no more consideration than for a swarm of flies.

What is the motive of the attack upon these people? Is it that the fabrics may be cheapened? Never since knitting was invented were they as cheap as they are to-day. It will inevitably operate to the great benefit and enrichment of England and Germany by giving them our markets, or the wages of our operatives must come down so we can successfully compete with foreign countries. That's all there is to it or about it, and the laboring men are making note of it.

REDUCED TARIFF WILL NOT LOWER PRICES.

Mr. President, I know that it is contended that so-called tariff reform will cheapen all articles of consumption, and thus benefit the masses. History teaches otherwise, but even if it were so, how is the laboring man benefited by cheap clothing when he has nothing with which to buy it. President Fillmore, in 1852, pointed out that when foreign countries get possession of our markets they fix the price to suit themselves. It has been so under every low tariff that the country has had, and will be so if the proposed new tariff becomes a law. The experiences of 1837 and 1857 will be repeated, and after great suffering a President and Congress will be elected charged with the commission to again restore the high-protective principle.

Instead, however, of prices having increased under high tariff laws, as our Democratic friends have taught the people to believe, the contrary is the fact. A recent issue of the American Grocer gave a table showing the quantity of food products that $100 would buy at wholesale rates for the past thirty years.

The table is as follows:

Articles.		1862–'67.	1872–'77.	1882–'87.	1891.
Tea, Japan	pounds	187	244	454	500
Sugar	do	606	891	1,333	1,848
Mess beef	barrels	7	8.25	8.25	13

It will be observed that in the entire list only one article (coffee) cost more in 1891 than at any former period named in the table, while many articles were bought in 1891 for less than one-half what they cost in some former years.

THE TARIFF OF 1846.

Mr. President, Democratic orators and newspapers make the astounding claim that the tariff of 1846 brought universal prosperity to this country and that the workingmen from 1846 to 1860 enjoyed better wages and better living than for any like period since. Every man who lived during the period of the Walker tariff law knows to the contrary, and yet this statement is made, repeated, and reiterated without a blush by our Democratic friends. They never cease to talk about this period as "the golden era of prosperity." Why, I know a reputable citizen of New Hampshire who says that during that period he cut a cord of green hard wood, split it, hauled it to the market, 8 miles, and exchanged it even for an arithmetic. He must surely have been impressed with the feeling that it was a "golden era of prosperity." A recent letter to one of the leading papers of my State, by an intelligent workingman, shows that utter misrepresentations are being made on this point. He says:

The pay roll of the Gilford Hosiery Mill in Laconia for the month of February, 1849, was taken and averaged at ten hours per day, and the wages, including overseers, averaged 39½ cents per day. In the Ashland Knitting Company's Mill for February, 1893, the pay averaged $1.14 per day of ten hours, including overseers, the same as in the other case. A bill of goods charged on a book kept in John Shepherd's store in this town in the month of February, 1849, amounting to $18.08, was compared with the same bill figured at the price of goods in the same store in February, 1893, and it was found they could have been bought for $14.47 at the latter date. Thus in 1849 it would have taken forty-six days' work to buy the goods amounting to $18.08, and in 1893 it would have taken only thirteen days to buy the same goods then reduced in price to $14.47.

It does not require a great mathematician to figure out the fact that it took three and one-half days' work in 1849 to buy as much as could be bought for one days' work in 1893. And yet the changes are rung on the contention that our people were better off in 1849 than in 1893, even the author of the Wilson bill making that absurd claim.

ENGLAND VS. THE UNITED STATES.

And an equal fallacy prevails as to the relative cost of living in this country and in England. Meat, flour, and many other necessaries of life cost the Englishman more than the American. Possibly clothing is a little cheaper in England, but the difference is a mere bagatelle when the difference in wages in the two countries is considered.

And this leads me to observe that all the efforts of our Democratic friends to prove that the workingmen of free-trade Great Britain are as well off as those of protection America have utterly failed. Every intelligent and unprejudiced observer has given testimony to the contrary. I have here the observations of a friend of mine, an educated American traveler, a man of large intelligence and of affairs, well known throughout the country, whose conclusions are worthy of the highest credence. They are so complete and thorough that I will give them a place in this discussion.

STATISTICS OF ENGLISH CHEAP LABOR.

FREE-TRADE SLAVERY.

To the workingmen of America:

Four years ago, when Grover Cleveland first appealed to you to indorse his free-trade policy, I went to England to learn with my own eyes what free trade had done for the wage-earners of that country, and to report to you the facts as they existed there. Many years of my life have been spent toiling as a mechanic, and well do I know from my personal experience what a fair day's pay means to the workingman, and the comforts that are given or denied his family according to whether he is well or poorly paid. As I said in 1888, in presenting my picture of the workingman's life in free-trade England, I have no wish to paint the colors any blacker than they are. God knows they need no coloring from me to make them such that no man wants to look upon their like a second time. If every workingman in America could go where I have gone the last two months and see what I have seen among the working classes of England—could take with him the picture of the comfortable and contented homes of our industrial classes, well fed and well clothed, and contrast with them the wretched places called homes in "Merrie England"—if, I say, all of you could have traveled around among England's workers as I did, there would not be one among you who would not denounce as a traitor to this nation the man or the party that advocated a free-trade policy for America.

FACTS NEVER CONTRADICTED.

Though my report to you four years ago went into every city and village in this country, and was mailed abroad as well, I have yet to hear the facts therein stated contradicted or my deductions challenged. The free-trade press has ever since followed me with its vituperations and misrepresentations, but though four years have passed not one of them has attempted to dispute the truth of my statements. I have taken the same care this summer to have my data as to wages and ways of living indisputably established, and I undertake to prove to the satisfaction of any unprejudiced man the truth of every line in this document.

My tour this summer covered much the same territory as that through which I traveled in the summer of 1888. I left New York in July and returned to it September 15. In that time I traveled the Black Country, as it is called, of England, visited many of the same places and saw many of the same faces as four years ago. Time had not dealt kindly by them, especially the women. the sound of whose hammering on the anvil, the clank of the chains at which they work, and the noise of the pit upon which they shovel and wheel coal, were still all too horrible to the ear of one accustomed to seeing the mothers, wives, and sweethearts of his fellow-workman comfortably housed and spared the terrible burdens which these unfortunates have to bear.

Where, in our land of the free, I ask you, can we find mother and daughter—aye, and often granddaughter—toiling day after day for a lifetime, side by side, at the forge or on the coal pit?

Where throughout our broad land are our women made to slave like beasts of burden—ill paid, poorly fed and clad, and looking only to death to relieve them from a toil to which in life there is no ending?

Free trade! No! Slave trade! And even worse than that it is, and the eye that can witness this spectacle undimmed, or the heart that does not go out in sympathy, has no place for humanity. But free trade is the cause of it, and for that reason is the curse of England.

ENGLAND'S ARMY OF PAUPERS.

I landed in Liverpool in August. On the steamer going over I picked up Whittaker's Almanac, and found from its pages that there were 974,421 paupers in Great Britain in a population of 35,246,562. That is 1 to every 36 people. According to our last Federal census we have only 97,265 paupers among the 65,000,000 in the United States, or 1 in every 643 of population. In England 2.8 per cent of the people are paupers and charges on the counties; in this country but .15 per cent. One person out of every 12 in the United Kingdom needs parish relief to keep him from starvation. It cost $40,467,345 last year to support England's paupers. In London, out of 9 persons who die, 2 die in a workhouse, hospital, or other public institution; in Manchester it is but 1 out of every 5; and, in Liverpool and Birmingham, 1 out of every 6. A couple of years ago a return was issued by the Glasgow medical officer of health in which he showed that out of every 100 houses in Glasgow 30 consisted of only 1 room, 41 of 2 rooms, 14 of 3 rooms, 7 of 4 rooms, 5 of 5 rooms and upward. Out of the children born in the one-room houses, 1 out of every 3 died in infancy; in the houses consisting of 5 or more rooms, 1 out of every 50.

What a commentary on the condition of the people of the two countries! The one the greatest protectionist nation in the world and the other the leading exponent of free trade. The one having its people contented and well fed and the other starving or paupers. Remember, also, in making this comparison that our country is annually adding to its population hundreds of thousands of immigrants made up of the poorer classes from foreign nations, and that they form the larger part of our paupers.

PAY OF ENGLISH RAILWAY MEN.

Liverpool reached, my next move was to get to Wigan, 16 miles distant, at the entrance to the "Black Country," where 45,000 people are said to live, but really only exist. At the railway station of the London and Northwestern Road I learned from the engineer in charge of the train that he got $1.68 per day of ten hours. On express trains the pay is $1.80 for ten hours; firemen get $1.32. The conductor told me he had $1.32 per day; that trackmen has $4 cents; track layers, $4.86 per week; laborers, $4.20; machinists, first class, $7.68, and second-class, $6 72 per week. Talking further with this engineer, I learned from him that he had two children at work receiving $1.68 each a week, while his wife worked in a factory for $4.80. He lived in three rooms, for which he paid $1.32 rent per week. Let railway employés in America compare these wages with their own—more than twice as large!

Wigan again, and Bailey's Court! What a picture of hopeless misery and despair it is! The sunshine of life shut out by clouds darker and thicker than those hanging over the town. From tall chimney tops columns of black smoke shoot upward; from great buildings, soot covered and begrimed with the dust of ages, are heard the hum of turning wheels and the roar of busy machinery; trucks laden with stuffs more precious to England than human life—the tokens of her boasted commercial supremacy over land and sea—fill the streets with deafening noise, while long rows of low brick tenements, two stories high, with stone floors, with little windows, affording scarce a breath of pure fresh air or a ray of bright sunshine, stand as mute reminders that the passing throng of poorly dressed men and women have places they call home, however little of home there is in them to an American eye.

Picture such a home in one of New England's thriving mill towns! Imagine Bailey's Court, for instance, in any of our industrial cities! Here are two rows of tenements built of brick with their only breathing spot a stone courtyard in the rear not four feet wide. The largest room in the house is the one you enter from the street, and has but one window, four feet long and two feet high. Little panes of glass but a few inches square make up this "window." The stone floor is bare—sometimes with a rug here and there—an uncovered table serves for the family to eat from, and upstairs are the two sleeping rooms, which are as many as any family, no matter how large, can afford. This "home" costs 84 cents a week rent. Sir Francis Powell, M. P., owns these tenements, and they are over one hundred years old.

THE STORY OF TWO BUTCHERS.

Two butchers who live there told me something of their existence. One has a wife and five children, another a wife and three children. The latter said his food cost as follows: Butter, 26 cents per pound; flour, 15 cents per pound; beef, 8 to 20 cents per pound; pork, 11 to 16 cents per pound; sugar, 4 to 6 cents; rice, 8 to 16 cents; cheese, 12 to 16 cents; milk, 6 cents per quart; chickens, 40 to 60 cents each; potatoes, 20 pounds for 24 cents.

HOW A SLATER EXISTS ON $1.32 A DAY.

A slater whom I met said he earned $1.32 per day and paid 8 cents each night for his lodging. He said he could board by the week for $3.36. He preferred to live another way, though, and paid about the following sum for his meals:

	Cents.
Breakfast:
Bacon	4
Tea	3
	—9
Dinner:
Mutton	6
Bread	2
Pot of beer	4
	—12
Supper:
Bacon	4
Cheese	2
Bread	2
Pot of beer	4
	—12
Total	41

As he receives $1.32 per day he has left after this scanty living 91 cents. I asked him what he did with this balance. "I swallow it," said he, meaning that he spent it for liquor. Then I asked him as to the cost of his clothes in a year and got these figures, which are a fair average for a year's supply for this type of workman:

3 pairs of breeches, at $1.92	$5.76
2 coats, at $1.50	3.00
3 shirts, at 78 cents	2.34
3 vests, at $1.08	3.24
3 caps, 24 cents each	.72
2 pairs of shoes, at $1.96 each	3.92
3 pairs of socks, at 32 cents each	.96
Total cost	19.94

I venture to say, though, that no slater in America would wear the clothes this man buys, nor eat the food that he does.

A POORHOUSE THEIR ASYLUM.

Wigan is one of the great coal-producing centers of England, as well as one of its manufacturing places. The town has been literally undermined for coal, some of the shafts running as far as 2,500 feet underground. Close to the center of the city is the Meadows Colliery, where men and women work together year after year, and the first sight that reaches their eyes when they come above ground is the Wigan poorhouse, just opposite the entrance—a constant reminder of the end for most of them, should man, woman, or child stop for a day from their treadmill of toil at the mines!

A WOMAN FORTY YEARS WHEELING COAL.

Forty women of all ages and conditions were at work wheeling coal when I reached the Meadows Colliery. One of them, though old and wrinkled, seemed to have the muscles of an animal. She told me that her name was Eliza Rider, 55 years old, and that she had been wheeling coal for forty years. She earns 40 cents a day of ten hours. When I asked her about her clothes, she said that she wore trousers cast off by the men. On the top of the pit I took photographs also of the women with their clogs on, while wheeling coal from the pit to the dumps. They told me they got 40 cents a day of ten hours. Some were paid 52 cents.

One of the women said that her husband worked in the pit and that her child was kept by her mother. She paid 60 cents a week rent and 48 cents a week for coal. Her husband earns 90 cents a day in the pit, making $5.40 for him and $2.40 for her—making $7.80 in all per week for the family. She said: "I pay my mother 96 cents a week to care for my child, so that I can work. I have worked here for eight years, and before that was in a cotton mill. My supper is usually a pot of potatoes and meat or potatoes and bread; seldom have meat and bread together, as I can not afford both. On Sundays I have green peas and beef (12 to 14 cents a pound for the beef), boiled potatoes and pudding, but no bread. The meat lasts me until Tuesday. Sometimes I purchase two pounds of cheese at 16 cents a pound. My breakfast is usually bread and butter, meat pie, and tea. I have corn cake, bread and butter for dinner." She gave her name as Margaret Fuld, and said that she lived at 46 Sale street. I took her photograph as she was eating the dinner described above.

POOR WAGES IN THE MINES.

About 400 men work in the mines. One of the bosses told me that he worked usually five days a week and made $10.80, but he was frequently laid off and earned nothing. Two men who worked under him were paid $1.56 a day of ten hours. A laboring man gets 90 cents a day. The engineer in charge of the engine on top of this pit gets $1.32 a day. The girls helping to shove the coal cars get 44 cents a day.

CLOGS FOR THE POORER FOLKS.

The working people in these parts all wear clogs, and when they appear on the sidewalks or walk on the stone floors of their houses the clogs sound like hammers. They cost from 48 cents to $1.08 per pair for adults, and the children's sizes from 42 to 52 cents a pair. I bought ten pairs of these clogs of various sizes to let the American people see what the poor people of Great Britain wear. I also bought eight pairs of shoes such as are worn at the iron works. They cost from $1.74 to $2.28, are very thick, with big nails on the soles, and by their looks would last a man or woman a lifetime. The men who make these shoes get $1.20 a day.

THE NAIL-MAKERS OF SOUTH STAFFORDSHIRE.

From Wigan I went to Manchester, reaching there on August 22, and from Mr. James Cattan, editor of the Sunday Chronicle, I secured considerable information about the strike of the nail-makers against reduced wages, and also the cuts printed on another page representing the poverty-stricken women working at the smitheries for a bare pittance—which is not so small, however, but that the employers had some thought of reducing. Hence 8,000 men, women, and little children who made nails in the desperate effort to keep soul and body together went out on strike, and their sufferings as a result are beyond my powers of description.

Perhaps the best insight into the condition of these nail and chain makers of South Staffordshire can be given by extracts from an official report of the British House of Commons by Henry G. Calcraft, labor correspondent of the Board of Trade. Mr. Calcraft described his investigations as follows:

PICTURE OF A NAIL-MAKER'S HOME.

"Joseph Wilks, a man of 40, I found making 2½-inch cone-headed nails, for which the price was 6s. 6d. per hundredweight. It took 2,376 of these nails to the hundredweight, and he would make 2 hundredweight in a week ($3.12). With his wife to help him he might make a little more. From this he had to allow for fire, rent of shop and tools, which would be about 1s. 6d. per week. Across the end of his hearth Wilks had a rough seat and bench erected, on which sat two or three of his younger children. He said he would never have married if he had known he had to be a nailer all his life. * * *

"They lived mostly on tea and bread and bacon. On Sunday they might be able to get a morsel of meat or 'beef cheek' (ox cheek) to boil and make broth with. Questioned as to the family budget for the week, the wife enumerated as the chief item of expenditure, two quarters of tea at 6d. a quarter; 4 pounds of sugar at 2d. per pound; bread, 3s. to 3s. 6d.; 1s. 10d. for coal; 2s. for house rent, and 1s. 6d. for bacon (8s. 6d. in all for living, out of 13s. for a week's work, leaving but 4s. 6d. for clothing and all other expenses). Beyond this she could not go, and she was much better informed or more willing to give information than most of the women I questioned.

AT THE FORGE!

"At another fire, Joseph Walters and his wife were employed on dog-head spikes. The man was thin and worn, though his wife was stout. They had a family of eight young children.

* * * * * * * *

The pair of them could earn 16s. or 17s. per week, by working fourteen to fifteen hours a day. From this they had to find breeze, shop rent, and tools, which would run up to 2s. or 2s. 6d. a week. Thus for dog chains of, say, 4½ feet long, made of one-eighth-inch iron, and consisting of 36 twisted links, he paid 1d. each. A very skilful woman could do 14 dozen in a week if she worked eleven or twelve hours per day. Her rent, tools, and fire would possibly run to 4s. for the week.

"Entering a domestic shop I found two women making chains and another making hob nails. One is a woman of 40, who is the mother of six children. She is making spike chain and can earn 3s. a week, but only comes into the shop when she can spare time. Sometimes, however, she works on till 10 at night. In another shop there is a girl of 19, who has been four years at the trade making chains. She is a good hand and can earn 9s. to 10s. a week.

THE LIVELIHOOD OF AN EXPERT.

"Mrs. Davis is the wife of a vise maker and has a family of ten children. Her husband is much out of work. She is making the best small chains, and is one of the best in the trade. One of her daughters blows for her. Mrs. Davis says she might earn 5s. per week if she stuck all her time in the workshop. Two of the family were at work as chain maker and vise maker, and earned 6s. and 3s. 6d., respectively. Their rent was 2s. 6d., and there was 9d. to pay for schooling. How the family lived from one week to another she really could not tell. Several of the children were without shoes, and how to get them for the winter she did not know. They had to be content with bread and butter, or bread and lard, and tea to most meals, but sometimes they would have bacon or fish and bread to dinner. That day they had only gruel. They used 3 pecks of flour a week, at 2s. a peck. They had to make one-fourth pound of tea serve the week, and about 2 pounds of butter, at 10d. a pound. They occasionally got for Sunday's dinner a bit of meat, such as it was. It will be noticed in this case, as in many others, that very large families are the rule rather than the exception among these workers.

BACON AND CHEESE THEIR MEAL.

"Another woman on small chain says she can clear 2s. 10½d. a week, but has to attend to housework. On her smithy hearth she has a box rigged up for the accommodation of three children, which are half her family. Her husband, she said, was a day laborer, and earned 3s. to 3s. 6d. a day. She was generally at work from 7 in the morning to 6:30 in the evening. Their rent was 2s. 9d., but even with her husband's wages and her earnings she did not think she could live well. She had not tasted meat for three days, and bacon and cheese was what they mostly had with their bread. This is a striking case as showing that even where the husband earns a wage, as a laborer, much above the average of the chain makers in this locality, the wife spends nearly all her time in the shop for 2s. 10½d. a week, with the evident result that, at least, all she may earn is lost by defective housewifery and neglect of family.

"There are some children here asleep in a box, where their mothers have placed them. Of these workers, two divide 10s. between them weekly, and the other takes 6s. 3d. They work all day and even have their meals taken to them at the shop. The inspector, they said, had been there the day before and prevented them working long hours, so that they would earn less wages now.

"A question as to how much it cost them for butcher's meat was received with scornful laughter. Meat and potatoes, it appeared, was a treat reserved for Sundays only, and very often they did not have any then. It may be taken as a general rule here that the standard of living reaches always its highest point on the Sunday, and falls off day by day until the Saturday. Even in the case of this man who, with his wife and family, seemed above the average of his fellows, this was so; and on the day of my visit he had breakfasted on oatmeal gruel; not wholesome oatmeal porridge, but thin, watery gruel. For dinner there had been the familiar bread and bacon, of which latter, one-half of a pound had to serve the whole family. A few other items of his weekly budget were: coal, 1s. 6d.; one-quarter of a pound of tea at 6d.; two pounds of butter at 10d.; and potatoes, occasionally, came to 6d.

"Mr. Green has further furnished me with a written statement as to the average earnings of his work people, from which the following particulars are extracted:

Approximate number of work people.	Average weekly wages.
110 men	14s. or $3.36
250 women	7s. or 1.68
30 youths	8s. or 1.92
30 girls	8s. or 1.92
80 young women	7s. or 1.68

"Particulars taken from the books of the firm for a week averages as follows:

	Nailers.		Chain-makers.
	s. d.		s. d.
Men	14 2 or	$3.40	20 5 or	$5.10
Women	4 9 or	1.14	7 4 or	1.76
Youths	7 7 or	1.82	12 1 or	2.90
Girls	4 1 or	.97
Young women	6 7 or	1.58	8 8 or	2.08

Such is the report of the Government investigator!

THE MISERIES OF CRADLEY HEATH.

Cradley Heath is at the other end of the "Black Country" from Wigan, and I went there after leaving Manchester. That is where women by the hundreds are to be found working as blacksmiths. Let me give you a little picture of one "smithy." It was a low brick building, separated from a dwelling house by not more than 3 feet. In the house lived Mrs. E. Fosbrook, who, though married and a mother, was but 21 years old. She was making chain in the smithy when I looked in, and at the forges about her were five other women, all toiling away from 9 in the morning until 9 at night—a stretch of twelve hours—for which each was paid 36 cents. It was a most pitiful sight indeed.

MOTHER AND DAUGHTER SIDE BY SIDE.

Next to Mrs. Fosbrook's blacksmith shop was that of Mrs. Polly Fokes, who was working away at the anvil as I passed by, surrounded by four women and a boy, all making chains. They got 30 cents a day apiece, so they told me. Mrs. Fokes's two daughters were at work, too, and one of them, Miss Polly Fokes, made me a piece of twisted chain 2 feet long in 13 minutes, and another piece of plain chain 2 feet long in 10 minutes. I have both chains in my office in New York City. Polly Fokes blows the bellows herself, and handles the tongs as a man would a piece of meat on a fork. Annie Fokes, her sister, who was 16 years old, earns 30 cents a day; but after paying the blower boy and for coal she has only $1.20 left each week for her work. A Mrs. Frances, who was making what is called No. 1 chain, and is married and 45 years old, earns 30 cents a day. Her daughter works by her side and gets the same pay. The blower boy is paid 24 cents a day. He told me he was 15 years old.

THIRTY-FOUR YEARS AT CHAIN MAKING.

Further down the yard in another blacksmith shop, Mrs. Henrietta Parry, 50 years old, told me she had worked thirty-four years at the forge making chain, and never getting more than 30 cents per day.

Is it to be wondered at that these people often give way under the terrible strain of such daily burdens and prefer the poorhouse or an early grave to such a slave life at the forge?

HUSBAND, WIFE, AND DAUGHTERS.

In another section of the city, called Dudley Woods, the property of Lord Dudley, I found Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin Billingham both making chains. Her husband said he made $4.08 a week, when he worked from 5 in the morning until 7 at night. His two daughters worked in the same shop with him, as well as his wife.

DO WE WANT THIS IN AMERICA?

Next door I saw a scene that would touch the heart of the sternest. Mrs. Margaret Tibbitts, 38 years old, was working at the forge, while her two sons and her daughter were hammering chain. In a chair at one end of the shop was her baby, tied in so that the little one could not fall to the floor. Mrs. Tibbitts told me that she had made chain for thirty-three years! She said: "I make from 6s. to 7s. ($1.44 to $1.68) a week. My son earns $1.92, my daughter, $1.20. I pay for rent 2s. 9d. (66 cents). When I can earn enough money by steady work, I have meat two or three times for my meals; otherwise, not.

Returning to Manchester, I stopped at Birmingham. The barmaids at the station told me they worked sixteen hours a day for $96 a year.

TWELVE CENTS AN HOUR FOR STEVEDORES.

From Manchester I went to London and visited the London docks. Stevedores there receive 12 cents per hour for unloading barges and ships. They get 30 cents an hour in America. I went into a restaurant on Thames street, where the laboring men go by the score for their meals, and had breakfast with them. A cup of coffee costs 3 cents, bread and butter 2 cents, and for myself and another I paid 9 cents in all for breakfast. Usually the men have a fish called a bloater, for which they pay 2 cents. When they can afford it they get a meat pie for 4 cents; potatoes 2 cents; bacon 4 cents, or beans 2 cents. These dock men, though paid 12 cents an hour, average much less, as thousands of them are idle at a time, and very few get more than five or six hours a day throughout the year.

A mason in London gets 18 cents an hour, and a bricklayer 19 cents per hour. The policeman on the dock informed me that he received from $5.04 to $7.35 per week, according to grade. In the Bank of England there are 29 men on guard. Of these a private gets 24 cents a day and a corporal 36 cents, working from sunrise to sunset. A laborer in the streets gets from 96 cents to $1.20 per day. An omnibus driver, working fifteen hours a day, is paid $1.92. He begins at 8.30 a. m. and runs until midnight, driving 3 horses at a time and using up 15 horses during the fifteen hours in which he is employed.

THE "CHEAP" CLOTHING CRY.

A great deal has been said about cheap clothing for working people. Take, for instance, a carpenter in New York who gets $21 per week; in fifty-two weeks he earns $1,092. He purchases for himself during a year clothing to the amount of $65, which is a very large sum. He has left $1,027.

A carpenter in England receives $7.92 per week for fifty-two weeks, which amounts to $411.84. Take from that $43 for his clothing in England, for himself he has left $368.84, while the American carpenter has $1.027.

Now, can any free trader make any figures that will enlighten the American workingman any better than these facts?

HOW ENGLAND RAISES HER INCOME.

It is said by the Democratic party and many others that the English people are not taxed—that free trade being England's national policy the consumer is freed from any tariff on his purchases. But has the American workman ever thought of how England raises her $462,509,299 of yearly revenue? Scarcely an article on the English dinner table is without a tax—and a tax, too, that is directly paid by the consumer. Tea pays 8 cents a pound, coffee 4 cents, beer, which is largely consumed by the whole population, pays $5.98 a barrel tax; cocoa pays 2 cents, chocolate 4 cents; fruits pay various duties. To receipt a bill costs you 2 cents each time, and various other obnoxious forms of direct tax are enforced which fall most heavily on the poorer classes.

The custom-houses of Great Britain return to the government nearly one hundred millions a year, and it can fairly be stated that these tariff duties being on the Democratic plan for revenue only, are indeed a tax and a burden on England's population. Next to the customs duties the excise brings in the largest revenue to the government, aggregating $118,674,801 last year.

IRELAND TAXED TO DEATH.

Well may Ireland say that she is taxed to death when we see that she pays the British Government $21,745,810 each year, or about $4.50 for each person. This is in addition to the salary of the lord lieutenant ($100,000) and his twenty associates, with salaries aggregating $300,000 more. Figures that I got in London show that 3,407,493 of Ireland's people left for America in the last thirty years, and yet Ireland's whole population to-day is only three-quarters of a million more.

THE ECONOMIC ASPECT OF HOME RULE.

The English Government sends ironclads to Cork and policemen all over the various counties of Ireland. In Ireland the constabulary are a government force; in Great Britain they are a municipal force. Is this discrimination necessary? Before answering the question, let us look deeper. The total number of police in Ireland is 13,983 (including Dublin), and the total cost is $7,606,665.60, or $543.98 per man; and there is one policeman to every 336 persons. In Scotland the police number 4,155, costing in all $1,817,136, or $437.32 per man; and there is one policeman to every 986 persons. Thus the force across the channel is more costly per man than the force across the Tweed, while the cost per head of population is still greater, being respectively $1.63 (nearly) and 44 cents. Thus "the guardians of the peace" in Ireland are not only a more expensive force in every way than those in Scotland, but they are, in proportion to the population, nearly three times as numerous. * * *

FREE-TRADE WAGES AND PROTECTION WAGES COMPARED.

I have secured this statement of weekly wages of various trades in Great Britain and in New York from official sources. If we have free trade in America we must reduce our wages to the same level of Great Britain and other free-trade countries. All the Republican protective policy seeks is to add the difference in labor in America to all imported goods from the other side of the ocean, so that our mechanics may be protected from the cheap pauper labor of Europe. This table of wages answers all the free-trade fallacies of the Democratic party and can not be disputed:

CHEAPNESS DEARLY BOUGHT.

I have returned to this country with these facts amply established and substantiated by other evidence than my mere say so, in the hope that they will impress those workingmen of America who may still be deluded by the cry of cheap goods. As Governor McKinley has said, "Cheap goods mean cheap men," and the craze for cheapness has made human life the cheapest thing to be had in the industrial markets of England. The American workingman is the most intelligent and best paid in the world. The question that is before him in the pending national contest is whether he will vote to maintain himself and his associates in this proud supremacy, or whether he will place himself and his products in competition with and therefore on the same plane with the pauper paid, poorly fed, and clad and usually ignorant working classes of free-trade England.

I leave the question for the American workman to answer.

Respectfully,

NATHANIEL McKAY.

SEPTEMBER, 1892.

Notwithstanding the warning contained in the above remarkable and truthful document, the workingmen of the United States, under the bad advice of their leaders, voted for the Democratic party in November, 1892. The recent elections in the great States of New York, Ohio, Iowa, New Jersey, and Massachusetts show that they have repented of their folly; but it is a grave question whether the purpose of the Democratic party to overthrow high protection can be thwarted. The old proverb of "Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad" seems to be in process of fulfillment so far as that party is concerned. Certain it is, however, that if a low-tariff law is enacted the people of this country will be amply revenged as soon as they can get to the polls in a national election.

The undeniable fact is that under high protection the United States has been the most prosperous country in all the world. Only when the blight of low tariff has come upon it, or the threat of low tariff has hung over it, has its great energy been paralyzed and its marvelous prosperity stayed.

FURTHER FACTS ABOUT ENGLAND.

When we talk (or, rather, when the Democratic party talks) about opening our markets to the nations of the world, it should not be forgotten that there are 32,000 foreign ships, of 23,000,000 tons, ready to carry the manufactured goods of Europe to the United States. They are to-day watching and waiting for the passage of the Wilson tariff bill to start on their journey of destruction, so far as our manufacturing interests are concerned. England alone has 11,965 ships, the tonnage of Great Britain being six times that of the United States.

There are millions of dollars' worth of goods stored in the warehouses of London, Manchester, and other continental ports ready to be shipped to America when the Wilson bill becomes a law. There are millions of pounds of wool in Australia and New Zealand waiting for a cable message that high protection is overthrown in this country. Heaven only knows what will become of our people if the Democratic programme is carried out.

AN ALARMING SITUATION.

Mr. President, the situation is at once serious and alarming. The President coolly says to the workingmen, "Wait awhile and see what prosperity will come to you after free raw materials reduce your wages and tariff reform gets this country out of the narrow home market into the boundless markets of the world." The author of the Wilson tariff bill folds his arms and says, "Be patient, workingmen, until my bill becomes a law, when the increased influx of foreign commodities will, in some mysterious way, start up the closed mills and factories and give you employment." All over the land the cuckoos of tariff reform sing the same song, while the factories are idle and want and sorrow are in thousands and tens of thousands of households. The laboring man wants work, not words; bread, not glittering promises and idle theories.

The outlook is certainly not reassuring. The authors of the Wilson tariff bill frankly tell the country that its passage means that $200,000,000 worth of goods made in this country under the McKinley law will be brought from abroad—one hundred millions under the extension of the free list and one hundred millions under the lower duty list. There is no contention that these goods can not be produced by American labor out of American materials. They are to be imported, as is claimed, because they will be sold cheaper than American-made goods. Is it to be wondered at that in the face of this condition gloom settles over our people and that the future looks dark and uninviting? Under such circumstances why should not people postpone their buying and manufacturers close their mills in anticipation of the American market being flooded with foreign goods?

BUSINESS DEPRESSION NOT AN ACCIDENT.

Mr. President, the depression which has settled upon this country like a pall is not an accident. It is the legitimate and necessary result of tariff agitation and the threatened lowering of duties. We might just as well look the fact squarely in the face that if the assault upon the tariff, led by the President, succeeds, a long period of business depression is inevitable. With foreign goods flooding our market, and American labor unemployed, our people will not be prosperous even if they do get dress goods a cent a yard cheaper than they do under the existing law.

But this is not all. To hold the rest of the market wages must necessarily be reduced, the income of our people largely curtailed, and their purchasing power greatly lessened. This is the feast to which we are invited; this the reward the workingmen are to receive for their votes at the last Presidential election. They were invited into the parlor of tariff reform, and now they are caught and tangled in the web of free trade—drinking the dregs of idleness and sorrow, and vainly looking to the Democratic party for relief.

DANIEL WEBSTER AND LOW TARIFF.

Mr. President, Daniel Webster, New Hampshire's most noted son, has sometimes been quoted as an advocate of low tariff. Possibly in his younger days he gave utterance to views which justify that charge. But in his mature years, and after long experience in public life, he was an earnest and powerful advocate of high protection. When the Walker tariff bill of 1846 was under consideration—a measure aimed at New England as the proposed tariff bill is—Mr. Webster made a long and eloquent speech in opposition to it, saying among other things:

You indulge in the luxury of taxing the poor man and the laborer. That is the whole tendency, the whole character, the whole effect of this bill. One may see everywhere in it the desire to revel in the delight of taking away men's employment. It is not a bill for the people or the masses. It is not a bill to add to the comfort of those in middle life or the poor. It is not a bill for employment. It is a bill for the relief of the highest and most luxurious classes of the country, and a bill imposing onerous duties on the great industrial masses and for taking away the means of living everywhere throughout the land.

Mr. Webster's words were words of wisdom and truth, amply justified by the practical workings of the Walker tariff law, which he so vigorously denounced. And yet notwithstanding all past experience with low tariffs, it is seriously proposed to enact another. To-day labor is unemployed, the fires are out in the furnaces, and the loom and the shuttle are silent; gloom and misery have taken the place of cheer and contentment; all as a result of threatened tariff changes. Why not abandon the whole thing, and stand by the American protective system, which has heretofore brought prosperity to our country and happiness and plenty to our people? In behalf of capital; in behalf of labor; in behalf of national honor and national prosperity, I appeal to the American Senate to put its seal of condemnation on this effort to hand our country and our people over to the tender mercies of foreign nations.

During the delivery of Mr. GALLINGER'S speech,

The PRESIDING OFFICER said: The Senator from New Hampshire will suspend for a moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 2331) to repeal all statutes relating to supervisors of elections and special deputy marshals, and for other purposes.

Mr. GRAY. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be informally laid aside until the Senator from New Hampshire concludes his speech, and that it may then continue the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, not losing its place, until the Senator from New Hampshire concludes his remarks. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from New Hampshire will proceed.

After Mr. GALLINGER concluded his speech,

Mr. GRAY said: Mr. President, I ask, in pursuance of the unanimous consent given, that the unfinished business, which was informally laid aside so as to allow the Senator from New Hampshire to conclude his remarks, be now laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TURPIE in the Chair). The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 2331) to repeal all statutes relating to supervisors of elections and special deputy marshals, and for other purposes.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President——

CONDITION OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to interpose upon a matter of business?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have in my hand an important communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, which I am authorized by the Committee on Finance to ask may be printed as a public document.

I wish to state that I have in my hand the bill alluded to in the communication which I have just sent to the desk, and I also ask that it may be printed in bill form, not as a bill reported from the Committee on Finance, but for the purpose of convenience in considering it and possibly amending it. I ask that when printed in bill form it may be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered in the absence of objection.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am much obliged to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. QUAY. It seems to me, before the order for the printing of the bill and accompanying document is made, it should be read for the information of the Senate. I desire to know what we are ordering to be printed.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have not the slightest objection, except the objection that it would take the Senator from Illinois off the floor, which I would not think of doing. I would not have thought of presenting the document at this time if I had thought it was necessary to have it read.

Mr. QUAY. It seems very brief, and if the Senator from Illinois has no objection I should like to have it read.

Mr. PALMER. I have no objection.

Mr. VOORHEES. I can say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that it will be published in all the newspapers. It was published in some of them this morning.

Mr. FRYE. Why not have it printed in the RECORD?

Mr. VOORHEES. That is not necessary. I have asked to have it printed as a Senate document. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], sitting near the Senator from Maine, can inform him as to the proprieties upon this question better than I can.

Mr. CHANDLER. To whom is the letter addressed?

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator from Indiana state the substance of the letter and of the proposed bill?

Mr. VOORHEES. It is a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Finance by the Secretary of the Treasury, and I am authorized by the Committee on Finance to ask that it be printed for the information and use of the Senate.

Mr. QUAY. If the Senator from Indiana will permit me to inquire, I ask to what does the letter refer? What is the subject of the bill and letter?

Mr. VOORHEES. It relates to the condition of the Treasury Department and the question of financial credit. There is no secrecy about it at all. If it were not for taking the Senator from Illinois off the floor or interfering with his discussion I should ask that it be read.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to say that the Senator from Illinois has just said it would not disturb him in the least to have it read now.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then it may be read so far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter with the accompanying bill will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the letter; which is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., January 13, 1894.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your verbal request, I have the honor to submit for the consideration of the Finance Committee of the Senate statements showing the actual condition of the Treasury on the 12th day of the present month, and an estimate of the receipts and expenditures during the remainder of this month and the month of February.

It will be seen from these statements that there is an urgent necessity for such immediate action as will replenish the coin reserve and enable this Department to continue the payment of public expenses and discharge the obligations of the Government to pensioners and other lawful creditors.

When my annual report was prepared it was estimated that the expenses during the current fiscal year would exceed the receipts to the amount of about $28,000,000, and I asked Congress for authority to issue and sell bonds or rather forms of obligations to an amount not exceeding $50,000,000, bearing a low rate of interest and having a reasonably short time to run, to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to supply such deficiencies as might occur in the revenues.

The estimate then made was based upon the assumption that the worst effects of our financial disturbances had already been realized, and that there would be a substantial increase in the revenues for the remainder of the year. While it was not believed that the deficiency then actually existing would be supplied by increased revenues in the future, it was hoped that no additional deficiency would occur, but the receipts and expenditures during the month of December and up to the 12th day of the present month show that the estimate of a deficiency of $28,000,000 at the close of the year was much too low. The actual receipts and expenditures during each month of the year and the monthly deficiencies have been as follows:

RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES FISCAL YEAR 1894.

	Receipts.
July, 1893	$30,905,776.19
August, 1893	23,890,885.30
September, 1893	24,582,736.10
Actual for three months	80,379,621.90
October, 1893	24,553,394.97
November, 1893	23,979,400.81
December, 1893	22,312,627.00
January, 1894, twelve days	10,309,959.37
Total	162,085,394.06

RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES FISCAL YEAR 1894.

Expenditures.

July, 1893	$30,675,888.60
August, 1893	33,305,228.48
September, 1893	25,478,010.17
Actual for three months	98,430,694.59
October, 1893	29,568,892.34
November, 1893	31,302,026.41
December, 1893	30,058,260.51
January, twelve days	16,263,655.14
Total	205,643,428.99

Excess of expenditures.

July, 1893	$8,770,112.41
August, 1893	9,414,343.18
September, 1893	896,254.07
Actual for three months	17,560,072.69
October, 1893	5,035,397.37
November, 1893	7,322,625.60
December, 1893	7,746,233.51
January, twelve days	5,893,715.77
Total	43,558,044.94

If the same average monthly deficiencies should continue, the total difference between receipts and expenditures on the 30th day of June next will be $78,167,532.

According to the best estimate that can be made the total receipts during the present month and the month of February will be $41,900,000, and the total expenditures will be $60,300,000, showing a deficiency during the two months of $18,400,000; but this does not include any payments on account of the sugar bounty, claims for which to the amount of nearly $5,000,000 have already been presented and are now under investigation in the Department.

The assets of the Treasury and the current liabilities in excess of certificates and Treasury notes outstanding were as follows on the 12th day of the present month:

ASSETS.

Gold	$74,108,149
Silver dollars and bullion	8,092,287
Fractional silver coin	12,133,903
United States notes	5,031,327
Treasury notes of 1890	2,476,000
National-bank notes	14,026,735
Minor coin	988,625
Deposits in banks	15,470,863
Total cash assets	132,327,889

LIABILITIES.

Bank note 5 per cent fund	7,198,219
Outstanding checks and drafts	5,053,917
Disbursing officers' balances	28,176,149
Post-Office Department account	3,897,741
Undistributed assets of failed national banks	1,927,727
District of Columbia account	142,613
Total agency account	46,996,366
Gold reserve	74,108,149
Net balance	11,223,374
Total liabilities	132,327,889

It will appear from this statement that the coin reserve has been reduced to $74,108,149, and it is evident from the condition of the Treasury that the Department will have no means to defray the ordinary expenses of the Government unless a large part of the payments are hereafter made out of that fund. If this is done the coin reserve will be reduced by the 1st of February to about $66,601,804, a sum wholly inadequate for the purposes for which it was created.

On account of this critical condition of the Treasury I have considered it my duty, in addition to the earnest recommendations contained in my annual report, to appear twice before your committee, and after full explanations of the situation urge prompt legislative action on this subject. With the permission of the committee I have prepared and presented for its consideration a bill which, if promptly passed, would, in my opinion, meet all the requirements of the situation by providing the necessary means for defraying the public expenses and replenishing the coin reserve to such an extent as to assure the maintenance of the parity of all forms of United States currency.

While this proposed measure of relief has not yet been disposed of or considered by the committee, the great differences of opinion which are known to exist in both branches of Congress concerning the propriety of granting additional or amended authority to issue bonds in any form or for any purpose, render it doubtful whether new legislation upon the subject can be secured in time to provide the means which are imperatively demanded in order to preserve the credit and honor of the Government.

Authority to issue and sell bonds for the purpose of maintaining specie payments was expressly conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury by the act of January 14, 1875, but it has not been exercised since 1879, and, on account of then high rate of interest provided for and the length of time such bonds would have to run, I have not been satisfied that such an emergency has heretofore existed as would clearly justify their issue. But the necessity for relief at this time is so urgent, and the prospect of material improvement in the financial condition of the Government is so problematical, that, unless authority to issue and sell shorter bonds, or other obligations, bearing a lower rate of interest than that specified in the existing law, is granted by Congress at a very early day, I shall feel constrained by a sense of public duty to exercise the power already conferred, to the extent, at least, of providing an adequate coin reserve.

If this action should be taken, Congress ought, nevertheless, to provide promptly for the deficiency in the revenues during the current fiscal year, and I will from time to time advise your committee of the condition of the Treasury, in order that this subject may receive due consideration.

I have the honor to be, yours, very respectfully,

J. G. CARLISLE, Secretary.

Hon. D. W. VOORHEES,
Chairman Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

Before the reading was concluded,

Mr. QUAY. I see that the letter which is now being read was printed in the newspapers before it was sent to the Senate. I suggest that the reading be suspended and that the letter be published in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The further reading of the letter will be dispensed with unless objection is made.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to have the bill read. I do not care about having the reading of the letter concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read as follows:

An act to amend section 3 of "An act to provide for resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 3 of "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, be, and the same is hereby, so amended that in lieu of the descriptions of bonds therein authorized, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue from time to time as he may deem necessary, and in such form as he may prescribe, coupon or registered bonds of the United States in denominations of $25 and multiples thereof, redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the United States after —— years from date, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent per annum, payable quarterly in coin, and to sell the same at not less than par in coin; and the proceeds of such bonds shall be held and used to maintain the parity of all forms of money coined or issued by the United States, but the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to use from time to time such part of such proceeds as may be necessary to supply deficiencies in the public revenues during the fiscal year 1894.

SEC. 2. A sum sufficient to carry the provisions of this act into effect is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. PLATT. I did not exactly understand what the chairman of the Finance Committee requested with reference to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He requested that the letter and the bill should be printed as documents, and that both be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PLATT. There is no objection to that course, but I understood the Senator from Indiana to make some suggestion about the bill being printed in the form of a bill, when he did not offer it. It can only be printed as a Senate document, I suppose, unless it is offered in the Senate as a bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. In one sense it is offered as a bill. It is a bill prepared and submitted to the Committee on Finance by the Secretary of the Treasury. It is not a bill introduced into this body and referred to that committee, but it was suggested in the committee, I think, by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who is quite experienced on subjects of this kind, that I should state that it was desirable to have it printed in the form of a bill, so that it would be easier of consideration and easier of amendment. That is all the reason why I made the suggestion.

Mr. PLATT. It should be printed as a Senate document and not as a bill introduced.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand the request of the Senator from Indiana, it is not only that it be incorporated in the document, but that it may also be printed in bill form, without in any sense introducing it as a bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa why it should be printed in bill form if it has no author. A bill can come here only reported from a committee or introduced by a Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Indiana gave the only reason which could be given, that I know of.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is all the reason there is.

Mr. TELLER. I did not hear the reason assigned.

Mr. ALLISON. The reason is that when the bill comes to be analyzed and matured some one may probably want to suggest an amendment, and if so it is more convenient to insert amendments when the bill is printed in bill form.

Mr. TELLER. The communication came through the committee. The Secretary of the Treasury had a right to suppose that if his suggestions were agreeable to the committee they would report a bill, and that is a proper thing for the committee to do. If the committee are not agreeable and not in accord with his suggestions they do not need to do anything. There is no precedent for the printing of a bill of this character in the form of a bill when it has neither committee nor Senator back of it, and if I can object to it I will do so, although it is a matter of no great consequence.

Mr. VOORHEES. It is a matter of not the slightest consequence.

Mr. PLATT. The committee can order the bill printed.

Mr. VOORHEES. The bill can be printed in connection with the letter of the Secretary; I care not in what form. We shall find out what is in it before we get through.

Mr. TELLER. It should be printed of course with the other part of the communication as a part of the public document, but it has no business to be printed as a bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then do not print it that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will order the printing of the letter and the bill as a public document unless objection be made. It is so ordered. The unfinished business will be proceeded with, on which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] is entitled to the floor.

REPEAL OF ELECTION LAWS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2331) to repeal all statutes relating to supervisors of elections and special deputy marshals, and for other purposes.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I have no desire to take the floor at present in the discussion of this measure. I had understood the consideration of the bill was fixed for to-day, and I had hoped that the chairman of the committee would be present in order to present the views of those who favor this measure in that elaborate and learned form in which I knew he would be likely to discharge that duty. I have no formal argument to address to the Senate. I simply approach the question as it has for years impressed itself upon my mind. I only propose to give my views as they occur to me in the course of the desultory argument which I shall offer to the Senate.

I beg to state in the beginning that I have read the report of the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections as presented by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] and have given attention to the historical statements made by him, both such as relate to the history of this legislation and to the conditions which led, in the judgment of the minority, to the adoption of this law and laws like it.

I may be allowed to speak of myself to this extent, at least, and to state that I have no sympathy with the State legislation to which the report alludes. I believe all that legislation to be cruel, and not only cruel, but a blunder, for I believe that the only mode by which constitutional republican government can be maintained or made effectual to secure popular rights and individual happiness is to give the fullest effect to the true principles of republican government.

The report of the minority, or rather the report of the Senator from New Hampshire, approved by his political associates, gives examples of much State legislation enacted immediately after the war. That legislation was based upon an entire misconception, as I think, of the principles of constitutional government. I think it was based upon an entire misconception of the requirements of the condition. That the colored race, who were freed by the war, were left in the Southern States in that precise condition in which slavery had left them, is apparent. Historically we need no light upon a subject of that sort, but it would have been far wiser, in my judgment—that was my opinion then and it is my opinion now—to have secured to this enfranchised people the fullest enjoyment of their rights.

The colored people were ignorant beyond all question. In 1866 I was at Raleigh, N. C., presiding over a court-martial. The court-martial had occasion to examine a great many colored witnesses. One of them was a negro who was so lately imported, or whose ancestors were so lately imported, that he had scarcely learned the English language. After he had testified, I asked him, "If you had the right of suffrage how would you vote?" He failed to understand me. He said, "Sir?" I said "Suffrage; if you had the right to vote, how would you vote?" Said he, "Sir, I suppose I would vote according to my intrusts," and I think in that statement that negro from the rice fields near Wilmington stated the true philosophy of the vote, that a man should vote according to his own interests. I have no doubt that if the Union people had been in the South treated with confidence they would have perceived the unity of their interests and those of their late masters and that the conditions would have been far better than they were after the lapse of ten years.

I am gratified now to believe that these laws have exhausted their force; that the relations between the lately enfranchised and their neighbors are better and that legislation of this sort is becoming obsolete, and it will become so as those people advance in knowledge, in education. I do not mean the education of the schools, but I mean the acquisition of that practical knowledge, the means of earning a livelihood, which is true education after all. I think we may give ourselves but little trouble now in regard to the relations between the two races in the Southern States.

I can not say that in the beginning I disapproved of much in this legislation. I confess at the close of the war I insisted upon giving to the negro man the ballot as being far cheaper and far safer than to give him the musket, because I felt that the National Government was obliged to protect him in his liberty and in the new right to acquire property. I felt that to give him the ballot was to place in his hands a great educational agency, the employment of which would suggest to him to cultivate amicable relations with his white neighbors, and would teach him to vote, as this negro from the rice plantation near Wilmington said, according to his own interest. I favored giving to the negro the ballot. I felt that it was a great educational agency, and by that means I would assist in hastening the time when the races in the late slave States would live in harmony and would consult their mutual interests. Those were my views.

I was not unmindful, though, that legislation which secured the rights of the black men might dangerously affect the rights of other races and the rights of the free people of the States in which slavery had never existed. I may state as another personal matter that from February, 1865, to May, 1866, I was the military commander of the Department of Kentucky under martial law. I saw the dissolution of slavery in Kentucky, that State having been excepted from the operation of the proclamation of 1862. I saw there that under the legislation of the times, in the temper of the times, while the power held by a military commander was necessary, perhaps, for a state of war, it was subversive of all just conceptions of popular liberty. Although I exercised the powers of a department commander for some fifteen months, I declare to-day when I think of the enormous powers that were conferred upon military commanders as the necessary logic of the war, I tremble that so much power was conferred upon any single individual.

It was not that circumstance alone which was startling. It was that large powers were not only conferred by military orders but they were maintained and supported by a public sentiment all over the United States. The people had become so accustomed to the swift and decisive methods of the government of the bayonet that they were impatient of the slow processes of civil government. This feeling was not confined alone to the loyal people of the States lately in insurrection or rebellion, for they were maddened by local strifes, and it was not strange that they should seek to employ force to overcome their immediate neighbors and enemies, because such was the condition of most of the Southern States; but this sentiment prevailed over the whole North, and it is somewhat remarkable, too, that it had taken possession of the great Republican party.

The Republican party in its incipiency was, more than any other party in this country, the party of freedom. Its demand was liberty. It was devoted to individual liberty. But the war had not only infected all the country, but this great party, too, had caught the contagion of despotism, and even in 1872 it had become a purely political party. It had lost that intense, earnest, fervent love that brought into its ranks thousands of men early in the struggle. It had become a mere political organization devoted to the preservation and maintenance of its own power, and it had become thoroughly infected with the despotic principles or the principles of the passions of the war, which cool, earnest men forgot when the struggle was over, but this party perpetuated its passions and crystalized them in the form of much of the legislation that we now seek to avoid.

I beg leave to restate that proposition. During the war patriotic men were earnest in their efforts not only for the restoration of the Union, or the maintenance of the Union, but they were earnest in their attempt to overthrow slavery. At the close of the war men were earnest in giving effect to true republican principles, democratic principles; and the logic of that condition was the civil-rights bill.

I want to state at this point that the civil-rights bill passed in 1864–'65 was of itself the embodiment of the enlightened conviction of the men of the times; and the subsequent amendments to the Constitution were the logic of the war and the logic of liberty. Their purpose was not to mar, but to complete the Federal Constitution. They were not meant to enslave, but they were meant to guarantee and secure liberty throughout the land. They were the inspiration, not of the passions of the war, but of the enlightened sentiments that animated the contest—the spirit of liberty—and the spirit of liberty and the guaranties of liberty were made a part of the Constitution of the country.

The Republican party, however, as I said before, became animated by the desire to maintain itself in power. It was engaged in a great struggle with rival parties elsewhere, and it sought by means of this legislation to perpetuate itself, as I think, and as I think I shall demonstrate in a moment.

The Democratic party, with which I did not act, was made powerless by the war. The Republican party, which I have described, was in the beginning made up of all the elements, the lovers of liberty and others, because, Mr. Blaine says in his admirable book, in substance, that the protectionist cared nothing about the controversy.

He says Pennsylvania felt no particular interest in the great trial, but the protectionists of Pennsylvania were brought into the Republican party because of the vestige of protection which was stolen into the platform at one of the national conventions. He states that during that time thousands of men who voted for Lincoln had no interest whatever in the struggle. Indeed, I beg leave to say that diverse elements were brought into the great

Republican party by its desire to attach the great party of liberty and union to the car of protection, and when that element took control of the Republican party, it for its own purposes sought to maintain itself in power by legislation such as that which the pending report assails.

I do not deny that Congress has the power to regulate the elections of Representatives in Congress, and if a law should be presented which should be uniform in its application and just in its effects I would give it consideration, at least; but at present I am not called upon to discuss legislation of that kind, because I propose to present a counter idea.

I have said before that in my judgment the people of the Southern States were mistaken. Instead of passing laws such as are now quoted in the report of the minority of the committee, it would have been wiser to trust the colored men who were under the protection of the Government. It would have been wiser to give them the confidence of the people and the confidence of the States. It would have been wiser to have conceded them and asserted for them all the powers which the amended Constitution gave them. That is my judgment, and I believe now that the radical defect in Republican legislation is that it is based upon an utter want of confidence in the people of the United States.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], in the views of the minority, says that this proposition of repeal is meant to give effect to the doctrine of State rights. I suppose he means State rights as understood by those who sought to dissolve the Union. I have never understood that State rights involved secession. In fact, I know that the doctrine does not involve the right of secession; nor do I regard it as essentially important to discuss the question of the rights of the States; I mean their mere municipal and political rights. I am discussing the right of the people that lies behind all governments.

I have said already that the mistake when we passed these laws was the failure to trust those who were to be governed. The doctrine I mean to assert as being one necessarily opposed to this legislation is that the laws are based upon a distrust of the people, those for whom governments are ordained and for whom governments should be conducted. That is the radical fault of the laws, and at this moment I present that as a distinct line of objection.

I have said that possibly Congress might pass some uniform law for the regulation of the elections of members of the House of Representatives, and that possibly such a law might be framed to meet my judgment and to meet my approval, but such has not been the policy or purpose of the authors of these laws. The purpose of this legislation has been to secure party success. The purpose of this legislation has been, in my judgment, to give to the minority the right to control the majority, and those laws secure not popular government, but party government, which must have been their original purpose.

Now, here is the point to which I wish to direct attention. The law provides for various officers who are to interfere to a certain extent with the elections. I read from the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 2011. Whenever, in any city or town having upward of 20,000 inhabitants, there are two citizens thereof, or whenever, in any county or parish, in any Congressional district, there are ten citizens thereof, of good standing, who, prior to any registration of voters for an election for Representative or Delegate in the Congress of the United States, or prior to any election at which a Representative or Delegate in Congress is to be voted for, may make known, in writing, to the judge of the circuit court of the United States for the circuit wherein such city or town, county or parish, is situated, their desire to have such registration, or such election, or both, guarded and scrutinized, the judge, within not less than ten days prior to the registration, if one there be, or, if no registration be required, within not less than ten days prior to the election, shall open the circuit court at the most convenient point in the circuit.

I have said the purpose of this law is to perpetuate party power. In this case two or ten citizens of any of the divisions mentioned in the act may put the circuit court in motion, may subvert the laws of the States and supersede the officers of the States, because to render them subordinate to officers to be appointed by the court is in effect to supersede them. This law is intended to guard and protect popular rights, but its application is made dependent upon the will of two or ten or more individual citizens, who are only required to possess character. I believe "good standing" is the phrase used; but I recollect that on a late occasion in the Congressional district in which I live an attempt was made to ascertain the names and the standing of the citizens who made the application that set the courts of the United States in motion, and that led to the appointment of numerous inspectors and other officers to supervise the election.

I remember, I say, that an attempt was made to ascertain the character of the men who made the application, and those in authority would not disclose the names. The whole State machinery was subverted by the act of unnamed and unknown persons. No inquiry was allowed. It was the law. The judge saw them, I suppose, but no issue was allowed to be made there as to the necessity of the subversion of the State laws or the character of the men at whose instance this subversion took place.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me, I will endeavor not to interrupt him for any light reasons?

Mr. PALMER. It is no interruption at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. I know he does not wish to convey any erroneous impression. The Senator knows very well that the petition upon which the judge is to open the circuit court and appoint supervisors is a public record of the court. Now, does the Senator mean to convey the imputation upon the court or the judge in the case which he has in mind that he refused to allow an inspection of the court records? If he does, I wish the Senator would kindly state the time, place, and circumstance.

Mr. PALMER. I have made my statement. I say it was never ascertained who it was that led to the appointment in the district represented by Mr. SPRINGER; that the names of the parties at whose instance the machinery of the Government was put in motion were never known.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then will the Senator allow me to say it was simply because no one went to the court record and looked for the papers.

Mr. PALMER. The Senator may speak of that which he knows. I speak of facts of which I am familiar. I make the statement standing by itself. But even if it were conceded that the men were known, the two, or the ten, or the fifteen, and even if it were conceded that they were men of unquestionable reputation, men of the best standing, would that affect the proposition that the whole machinery of the election is changed or that additional machinery is created or employed at the will of this small number of inhabitants?

The laws of the State of Illinois in regard to elections are efficient and ample. They provide for the division of the counties and cities into districts of convenient size. Our legislation is exceedingly careful on that point. We have the benefit, the doubtful benefit, I think, of the Australian ballot. We have all the careful guards that can be thrown around the local elections, and there has been, so far as I know, no complaint of interference in our elections; I mean none beyond the ordinary complaints that may attend an election everywhere, and yet in that county a number of men were permitted by the operation of this law to completely subvert the local system of election.

Mr. CHANDLER. Right there will the Senator allow me again?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I merely intervene to suggest that he is making a mistake, which he does not wish to fall into, I presume. He has two or three times said that the United States officers supersede the local officers; that the United States officers subvert the local officers. He has said that the local machinery is a perfect machinery in Illinois. I ask the Senator to be candid enough to state that the United States supervisors do not supersede or interfere in any way whatever with the local election officers of the State. They are mere lookers on at the election, as the Senator, I think, very well knows. Therefore, I think he wants to correct his language when he says that the supervisors supersede the State officials and subvert the State officers who are engaged in conducting the election under the wise laws which he describes.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I am not at this moment prepared to follow the Senator in all his suggestions. He says they are mere lookers on. Does he mean by that to express the truth and the whole truth and nothing else but the truth? Is that all they are—mere lookers on?

Mr. CHANDLER. I think so. That is the whole theory of the law. If the Senator will read the powers of the supervisors, which are before him enumerated in the statute, and thinks that they are anything more than lookers on, then I shall be glad to have him show the Senate and the country what they do more than look on.

Mr. PALMER. I am anxious to confine the Senator to his own language. He says they are mere lookers on. By that he means to affirm or assert that they have no other power than that of standing by and looking on. Is that what the Senator means to assert?

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that on page 21 of the minority report that statement is repeated:

The latter are merely witnesses of what is going on. They are only watchers. The whole plan of the present law is based upon the principle of noninterference with the conduct of the elections.

There is this qualification, if there is any qualification of what I have said:

It is true that the special deputy United States marshals are authorized under certain limitations to aid in keeping the peace at the polls; that criminal acts of citizens are punishable by national laws in the national courts, and that the supervisors make and preserve records of what they see, and testify to and prosecute such crimes as come to their knowledge.

But with reference to what takes place upon election day, when the State officials receive the ballots and count them, the supervisors are mere lookers on and do not hinder in the slightest degree the election officers in the performance of their functions.

Mr. PALMER. How does the Senator explain the numerous arrests that are made by United States officers on election day, if they are mere lookers on? How does he explain the complaints of numerous arrests made on election day?

Mr. CHANDLER. Arrests of illegal voters.

Mr. PALMER. Then they are something else besides lookers on, are they not? They are efficient, active lookers on, and give effect to that which they discover.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator must get my admission before he takes advantage of it. The Senator said they supersede the State officers or the local officers of election.

Mr. PALMER. I do say that.

Mr. CHANDLER. I say they do not supersede the local officers. They conduct the election precisely as if the supervisors were not there. Now, the supervisors witness offenses committed by persons who illegally register and who illegally vote, and those men are complained of. If the Senator will find cases in which election officers are interfered with by the supervisors in the performance of their duties, then I shall think they do something more.

Mr. PALMER. Section 2018 of the Revised Statutes defines the powers and duties of these mere lookers-on, as follows:

SEC. 2018. To the end that each candidate for the office of Representative or Delegate in Congress may obtain the benefit of every vote for him cast, the supervisors of election are, and each of them is, required to personally scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot in their election district or voting precinct cast, whatever may be the indorsement on the ballot, or in whatever box it may have been placed or be found; to make and forward to the officer who, in accordance with the provisions of section 2025, has been designated as the chief supervisor of the judicial district in which the city or town wherein they may serve, acts, such certificates and returns of all such ballots as such officer may direct and require, and to attach to the registry list, and any and all copies thereof and to any certificate, statement, or return, whether the same, or any part or portion thereof, be required by any law of the United States, or of any State, Territorial, or municipal law, any statement touching the truth or accuracy of the registry, or the truth or fairness of the election and canvass, which the supervisors of the election, or either of them, may desire to make or attach, or which should properly and honestly be made or attached, in order that the facts may become known.

This imposes something more than the mere duty of looking on. It imposes upon this class of officers positive, active, specific duties—something more than merely looking on.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator now state how that interferes with the State officers? How do they look on? They see, they look at the ballots, they count them, but how do they interfere with the State officers or supersede the State officers or subvert the State officers in the slightest degree?

Mr. PALMER. Can the Senator imagine two equal political powers operating upon the same subject at the same moment?

Mr. CHANDLER. No, Mr. President, but I can imagine the Senator painting a gorgeous picture and myself looking on to see how well he does it and taking note of it and preparing to testify about it.

Mr. PALMER. The Senator rather evades the inquiry. At this point there must be some paramount authority. The word "paramount" has been used very much lately, and it is understood to mean superior. On that occasion one or the other, the State authority or that of the United States, is the superior and the paramount authority.

Mr. TELLER. Which is the paramount authority under the existing statute?

Mr. PALMER. I understand that according to the interpretation given to the Constitution and laws of the United States they are paramount, and that the laws of the United States are paramount whenever enacted in pursuance of the Constitution. I understand that this is for the time the superior authority.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to be fair with the Senator. He has read the statement as to what the supervisors have a right to do. The national law is paramount; they can not be interfered with in doing it; but in what respect do they supersede, or subvert, or hinder the State officers who call the elections, hold the elections, make the count, and make the return thereof?

Mr. PALMER. I ask the Senator again, if they do not affect the action of the State officers, if they do not control them, if they do not influence them, why do they exist, why are they appointed?

Mr. CHANDLER. For the purpose of watching the election and furnishing proof to be used in an election contest or upon the prosecution of crimes against the national election laws, or, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] suggests to me, crimes against the State laws.

Mr. PALMER. That the Senator regards as mere on-looking, as no active power, but the simple negative power of seeing that some other person does his duty?

Mr. CHANDLER. That is the whole theory of the section which the Senator has read.

Mr. PALMER. But it is not the practical effect of the law, Mr. President.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator from Illinois will allow me a moment, the Senator from New Hampshire has said over and over again that the powers conferred by the statute upon the supervisors are merely those of watching and observing what is done by another set of officers.

Mr. CHANDLER. At the election.

Mr. GRAY. At the election. Whereas the section of the statute which the Senator from Illinois has just read provides expressly that their duties are active, not passive. It is required of them that they must be present, and, in the language of the law, "personally scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot in their election district or voting precinct cast, whatever may be the indorsement on the ballot, or in whatever box it may have been placed."

It is impossible, it seems to me, to say that that is merely the passive duty of on-looking. It is the duty of scrutinizing, counting, and canvassing each ballot. That is all the State officers are required to do. They are required to scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot; and here is another set of officers provided for by the statute of the United States, who are to intrude themselves into the voting places and into the control of the boxes sufficiently to enable them to perform their duties, in order that they may perform the same duties the State officers are to perform. The Senator from New Hampshire says that is merely passive, merely watching, merely on-looking, and yet he admits that they may go further, and be the ground upon which public prosecutions may be had against the officers of elections.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have the honor, if the Senator from Illinois will allow me, to ask the Senator from Delaware the same question I asked the Senator from Illinois, and which has not yet been answered; that is, in what way the performance of the duties which the supervisors are commanded to perform in any way supersedes or hinders or subverts the State election officers in the duties which they are performing at the same time?

Mr. GRAY. With the permission of the Senator from Illinois, in the first place, there is this sentimental objection—and I shall come to the practical objection afterwards——

Mr. CHANDLER. I think it is all sentimental.

Mr. GRAY. That it is an indignity placed upon the State officers and the State autonomy; it is a proclamation by the Congress of the United States that the States of which this Union is composed are not fit to be trusted in the conduct of their own elections.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is hardly a fair answer.

Mr. GRAY. One moment. It is a proclamation by this high legislative body, the Congress of the whole Union, that the States which compose this Union, and which are the primal factors in creating this Government under our principles of separate State government and local self-government, are not qualified for and not fit to be trusted with the most important governmental function of all—that is, the conduct of a State election.

Now, to the practical matter. Aside from that indignity which is put upon the State, that degrading of a self-governing community, there is this practical result, that the intrusion of these Federal officers into the voting places provided for a State election is an assumption of superiority and supervision on the part of the Federal officers and of inferiority on the part of the State officers. It results in this practical thing, that these supervisors have the right, and have frequently exercised the right, to call upon the United States marshal to arrest the State officers and drag them or bring them before United States committing magistrates and hold them for trial.

Mr. TELLER. That was an abuse of power, was it not?

Mr. GRAY. Possibly.

Mr. TELLER. Yes, that is an abuse of power not authorized by law.

Mr. GRAY. There ought not to be that opportunity.

Mr. CHANDLER. I dislike to intrude upon the Senator from Illinois——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. With the permission of the Senator from Illinois, I thought that the Senator from Delaware, when he began to answer my question how the performance of their duties by the United States supervisors interfered with the State officers, would make a speech on the subject of State rights and would make a sentimental objection, that an indignity is put upon the States by the presence at the polls of United States officers. That is the staple argument which is developed in the report of the majority of the committee. I do not propose now to deal with that, although I think it will not be difficult to show that there are some reasons why the nation might well distrust the operation of the laws of some of the States.

But my question was specific, and that was, how the supervisors in looking on, in counting the votes, in making a record of the vote, and in returning it to their chief supervisors, interfered with the performance of their duty by the State officers. I respectfully submit that the Senator from Delaware has not shown in the slightest degree how there is an interference with the State officers under the law. He does not state it; he does not pretend to state it. He says that the presence of the supervisors there, which is offensive to the advocates of State rights, tends to create disorder; but he does not point out that the statute itself either contemplates or justifies anything of that kind; while the Senator from Illinois began his proposition by saying that the purpose and intent of the statute was to supersede State officers and subvert State authority, while I say that the purpose and intent of the statute is directly the other way.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Illinois, I will say that practical illustrations to the common mind are worth a great deal of theoretical exegesis of the working of a law, and I want to say to him that at the very last general election in my own town I think about sixty State election officers were arrested at the instance of Federal supervisors, taken from the place at which they were performing their duties under the State law, and held in $3,000 bail, answerable to the district court as to whether they should be indicted under the provisions of this law.

Mr. CHANDLER. For doing what, will the Senator be kind enough to state? For what were they held?

Mr. GRAY. I think it would be pretty difficult to convince those honest men—they were poor men, workingmen, to be sure, who had not studied the statutes with the learning and equipment of the Senator from New Hampshire—they were honest workingmen, who had been brought up to believe in the power of the people of the States to conduct their own affairs and their own elections, and they had a very wondering look, a very bewildered look when they were brought, not before a State officer, but before a United States officer and held in bail which it would not be possible for many of them to obtain—$3,000 bail—to answer to the United States court for what the supervisors had charged them with doing.

Mr. BATE. Will the Senator from Delaware kindly state where that occurred?

Mr. GRAY. It occurred at the last election in my own town.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator had stated the case as fully and as fairly as he usually does——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PALMER. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire for the purposes of the occasion.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Delaware had stated the facts as fully and as fairly as he usually does, he would have stated that those election officers were arrested for preventing the supervisors from performing their duty under the law. The law undoubtedly in the next sections, 2019 and 2020, provides that the supervisors shall not be interfered with when they are watching the State officers, and if they are interfered with by any private person or by an election officer, that is a crime under the United States statute; but the Senator has stated nothing which shows that the supervisors performed any act whatever in reference to the conduct of the election except to watch the State officers.

Mr. GRAY. If that is not a pretty important act, affecting the liberty of the citizen of the State, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. PALMER. If I may be allowed to resume, it is undoubtedly true that a small number of citizens may put into operation an election machinery which is superior in authority to that of the State. To that extent it is intrusive and subversive, because to create an authority superior to another is to supersede the inferior authority, and this law, which is so earnestly defended and upon such nice grounds by the Senator from New Hampshire, in section 2019 says:

> The better to enable the supervisors of election to discharge their duties, they are authorized and directed, in their respective election districts or voting precincts, on the day of registration, on the day when registered voters may be marked to be challenged, and on the day of election, to take, occupy, and remain in such position, from time to time, whether before or behind the ballot boxes, as will, in their judgment, best enable them to see each person offering himself for registration or offering to vote, and as will best conduce to their scrutinizing the manner in which the registration or voting is being conducted; and at the closing of the polls for the reception of votes, they are required to place themselves in such position, in relation to the ballot boxes, for the purpose of engaging in the work of canvassing the ballots, as will enable them to fully perform the duties in respect to such canvass provided herein, and shall there remain until every duty in respect to such canvass, certificates, returns, and statements has been wholly completed.

Why was this law passed? In the first place, why should such power be granted on the request of any two or ten or fifty citizens, at their own sovereign will and pleasure, without any reason, without any fact being stated?

If the Senator objects to my position that they usurp or supersede the State authorities, I suppose he will admit that they may create authorities superior to those of the States, because whatever the State officers may do in the discharge of their office these persons have an imperative, conclusive right to be present when such acts are done; they are present to watch, and these officers are under the supervision of men created at the will of ten or twenty or fifty irresponsible inhabitants of a particular district. Why is that? Why shall the free people of this country be subjected to such supervision?

With respect to the sentimental question, I have already said that the sentiment of manly self-respect is essential to the maintenance of popular liberty. The citizen must not only be secure in his rights, but his rights must be respected, and I maintain that when fifty men—I assume the highest number—obtrude upon me and upon my neighbors, men who are appointed by an irresponsible authority, it is a humiliation, a disgrace, and it leads me to undervalue my manhood and my liberty. That is sentimental. Mr. President, liberty is a sentiment, and without that manly love of liberty, which is a sentiment—a noble, grand sentiment—and which can never be insulted or degraded with impunity, liberty would be worthless.

The idea of a freeman wholly unconscious of respect for his own rights and for his own liberties, a freeman who is subjected to the will of a master! The master may be benevolent, he may be kind, he may never strike a blow, he may never humiliate the slave by any positive act of outrage, but there he stands a menace, and the freeman is conscious that he is the inferior of the master, and the American freeman at the polls is conscious that there is an irresponsible authority watching over him, watching over his officers. He may be honest, but he is a master nevertheless, and that of itself degrades popular elections.

Mr. President, it is remarkable that since this law was passed there has been more corruption and more in the spirit of resistance to this despotic legislation than there ever was before. I know that it is believed by many that the American people in some sense or other need continual nursing and continual watching, and there is an idea somewhere that some person, somebody, may be intrusted with the guardianship of popular liberty, while the essential truth of our American idea is that liberty must be maintained by the people themselves, and the only apology for a despotism or for despotic legislation is that the people can no longer be trusted.

Mr. President, I have already said that the particular objection to me in the election law is that it places the government and control of the elections in the hands of a few men who may put the machinery of the law into operation. In point of fact, is it not true that the election laws in the district in which I live are whatever fifty men may determine they shall be? If any fifty men anywhere conclude that my fellow-citizens, in a district which casts many thousand votes, are incapable of acting honestly or of protecting themselves, those fifty persons have but to create the machinery by which every elector in that election district is placed under the control of those irresponsible public officers.

We speak again of State rights. Mr. President, the term State rights has been abused perhaps more than any other, unless it is the term religion or Christianity. They are both holy things. Each properly understood expresses an idea of magnificent conception, but gentlemen who represent a certain class of sentiments, or perhaps two classes, believe that State rights signify disintegration. The better and the wiser, the Jeffersonian idea, the Democratic idea as I construe Democracy, is that our system of government is based upon the clearest conception of the possibility of harmonizing local self-government with the National Government, and I had supposed there was no conflict between the system of State governments and that of the United States; I had supposed that those who claim that States may secede are better friends to liberty than those who claim that popular rights are under central supervision. I believe to-day if I had my choice I would take my chances in a government controlled by the people, however small, rather than I would in a despotism, however magnificent in its boundaries, however magnificent in population and wealth.

I believe, therefore, that those who insist upon the constant supervision and watchfulness of the people are the enemies of popular liberty. They must be aware of the fact that popular liberty depends upon the people themselves, and they must be aware that this exercise of extraneous force is degrading and demoralizing, and to demoralize the citizen is to destroy that high self-respect which should characterize an American freeman.

I go back now to the point I had in view at the start. This law authorizes a limited number of persons to create the officers whom the Senator from New Hampshire defends. These officers go to an election, an election ordered by State law. They take their seats in the presence of officers created under the State law. Do I attach any significance to the fact that these laws are enacted by the States? Not in the slightest. To me their value consists in the circumstance that these laws were enacted by the people, and that the State is the mere agent of the people, the efficient means by which popular will takes the form of law. I care nothing about the source of law, and if the Federal system should be so modified as that the people themselves under the operation of Federal laws should control their own elections, the fact that the law was Federal rather than State would be no objection to me. The system exists. The one is national; it is despotic.

It is remarkable that all the officers of the Federal Government hold their offices at the will of a geographically distant authority. The marshal, the judges, the supervisors of election are appointed by the United States judges. The people are not consulted; they have no voice in the matter. Masters are named for them, and to those masters they must submit without the right of appeal, without the right of protest.

Such is the election law which I am condemning and denouncing. If the Federal election law allowed free action of the popular will, the objection would simply be that it interfered with the harmony of a system which has existed for more than a hundred years, and which I trust will be perpetual. So it is in all the arguments which are based upon any preference between Federal and State authority.

I say again that these are mere agencies for the convenient distribution of power, and the reason I prefer the State agencies is because they are popular agencies.

They are controlled by the people; and the true underlying philosophy of that control is that their interests are largely local; and this machine we call the State government lives in the popular will and it moves under the impulse of popular thought and popular preference, while this great system, which overshadows all, is despotic in its nature; the powers of the officers are discretionary largely; and what is to me more, the officers are not subject to the popular control by means of popular elections. If the Federal Government shall ever be so reformed as that Senators here shall be elected by the people, that this horde of officers who perform the service of the Federal Government shall be chosen by the freemen, then much of the difficulty which we perceive would be obviated.

Mr. President, I had intended merely to introduce this discussion. I go back again to my original proposition. I believe the mistake of those who support this law is predicated upon a belief that some changes have taken place in the popular mind, in the popular morals, which make new and more stringent regulations necessary to maintain the purity of elections.

I notice that the war has bred these new ideas. I have alluded to the fact that our people became fond of the swift and decisive rule of the bayonet; and the poison is not there alone. We have fallen in love with arbitrary, forceful methods; we distrust ourselves; we invoke force to govern us, to control us, and we look in vain to some distant and external authority, or some authority external to ourselves, that we may find repose in its superior force and wisdom. That is the prevailing vice of the times.

My belief is that if these laws are repealed and elections are again left in the hands of the people, there will be much less ground for complaint; for, mark you, the Senator from New Hampshire himself is eloquent in his denunciation of the corruptions of elections in the large cities. These corruptions exist and have not been cured by Federal election laws. If it could be shown to me that these laws had, on the whole, been favorable to the purity of elections, they would be more tolerable in my judgment; but, according to the complaint we hear, the elections are still corrupt in the great cities, notwithstanding the law exists, and the State officers are overshadowed by those of the United States. I used the term "State officers." I desire to avoid and disclaim it at the outset. It is the people's officers who are overridden; and notwithstanding this swarm of officers and the thousands of dollars that are expended in the large cities, the same complaint exists.

The Senator from New Hampshire in one chapter of his report speaks of the recent corruptions in New York, where John I. Davenport himself lords it over the election, and yet the Senator complains that in that great city this corruption still exists. According to his theory the law ought to remain, although the corruptions and evils are not removed by its existence.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to correct the Senator again.

Mr. PALMER. I yield with great pleasure.

Mr. CHANDLER. The recent frauds, of which I speak in the report, were in the odd years when there were no supervisors of election. The supervisors are at the Congressional elections. The national laws do not keep down frauds then, but when the odd years come, then there is a perfect carnival of fraud in New York City and in Jersey City.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to make a statement, which I should like to know if anybody questions?

Mr. PALMER. With pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. I was told by a very eminent New York Democrat, whose name would be received with respect if I were at liberty to give it, this fact, that since the passage of the election law of 1871 or 1872 there had not been a single election contest in the State of New York, either in regard to the choice of a member of the House of Representatives of the United States or of an assemblyman or a member of the New York senate, embraced in a certain district, who had been voted for at the time when an election had taken place under this law. Before that the contests and the charges of fraud were frequent.

I do not myself know anything about this matter. I have not investigated that statement; I have made it on that authority, and have never heard it contradicted. I should like to know what the Senator from Illinois knows about that.

Mr. PALMER. I know that the State of New York has its own election laws, which are as fair as those of Illinois or any other State.

Mr. HOAR. I want to see if we can not get at that fact as a fact to start with.

Mr. PALMER. I know the Senator asserts the fact, either by inference or intimation, that these good results have been in consequence of the election laws.

Mr. HOAR. That is a good deal of a fact.

Mr. PALMER. That fact is one which remains to be established, and when established it will have merit.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator another question. I ask if he is in a position to controvert the statement which I have made on the authority I have mentioned? I am told—indeed I have read the document—that a committee of the House of Representatives, the House then being Democratic, I think—but I will not be so sure about that—at any rate, a committee of the House of Representatives was appointed to investigate elections. They had heard these accusations, which they characterized as pretty wild, talked about; but on full investigation they reported—Mr. Cox, Gen. Slocum, then a member of Congress at large from the State of New York, and one or two other Democratic members of the House of Representatives being members of the committee—that the charges against these laws were unfounded; that they were excellent laws, and that they hoped they would remain and that their beneficent operation might be extended to the rest of the country. Among the witnesses whom they called to testify in a way which justified that report, was the late Secretary Whitney, then the Democratic corporation counsel of New York City. Does the Senator know about that? Can he state whether that report was correct or not?

Mr. PALMER. I will be perfectly delighted to read the report.

Mr. HOAR. I shall show it to the Senator.

Mr. GRAY. I would say, as the Senator from Illinois was not a member of the Senate at the time, that in the debate on what was called the force bill, the whole matter of that report of the House committee, to which the Senator from Massachusetts alludes, was very thoroughly ventilated. I think it was during that debate that something was said on both sides of the question regarding that report. I am not disputing what the Senator from Massachusetts says.

Mr. HOAR. I want to get at the fact. I think it is quite important.

Mr. GRAY. There were some comments made upon the report then and some explanations made in relation to it. They can be revived now.

Mr. HOAR. Then, in regard to what we were speaking of, the malpractices going on in cities in spite of the law of 1871, I do not understand that either the Senator from Illinois or the Senator from Delaware, who has charge of this repeal bill, are in any condition to deny—whatever the value may be we shall settle afterwards, but we will get at the facts—will deny, first, that where there had been constant election contests before this law was put in operation—for in 1868 sixty thousand fraudulent naturalization papers were issued in one court in two or three days—when this law went into operation the election contests stopped, both State and national, for some elections afterwards; nor will either of those Senators deny that the men who were chosen by the House of Representatives as a Democratic election committee asserted that these laws were excellent, that the charges against them were mistaken, and they hoped that they would be extended to the rest of the country. As to whether that is valuable or not we may differ, but I want to get at the fact. I do not understand that anbody contradicts this statement.

Mr. MILLS. The Senator means the Federal election law.

Mr. HOAR. I mean the national law. I do not call it Federal, I call it national.

Mr. MILLS. "A rose, by any other name would smell as sweet."

Mr. HOAR. It depends upon the nostrils, if I may be permitted by the Senator from Illinois——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that. I was asking the Senator from Illinois if I might be permitted to answer the Senator from Texas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. PALMER. I have yielded to the interruption of the Senator from Massachusetts beyond question.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, with the leave of the Chair, I desire to observe to the Senator from Texas that whether the word "national" or "Federal" smells as sweet in certain nostrils depends upon the nostrils, and that there have been times when the word "national" did not smell very sweet in Democratic nostrils.

Mr. MILLS. It is sometimes the case. That occurred, too, with the people from whom the Senator comes. There was a time when they were about as rebellious against this Government as were the people whom I represent on this floor.

Mr. PALMER. I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts why, if the election laws operate so wholesomely, they have not been applied to all the Congressional districts in the United States?

Mr. HOAR. I will answer. Because of a very unreasonable and very persistent clamor made by the Democratic party in the Congress preceding the last.

Mr. PALMER. If the Republican party had the power to pass this bill, they had the power to pass such a bill as the party thought judicious and advisable. Why should the party which had the power to pass this bill make its operation depend upon the will of two or ten citizens of any particular locality?

Mr. HOAR. That also is very easily answered, if the Senator desires an answer now, as I suppose he does.

Mr. PALMER. I am exceedingly anxious to get an answer.

Mr. HOAR. It was very thoroughly discussed at the time. The reason which satisfied my mind then and does now is that there were a very large number of districts in the Union where there was no difficulty. I never heard from any Democratic quarter a suggestion of any interference with free and fair elections in nearly all the Congressional districts in Massachusetts. I suppose the same is true of Vermont and New Hampshire.

Mr. PALMER. Now, will the Senator——

Mr. HOAR. I have not finished my answer.

Mr. PALMER. I beg pardon.

Mr. HOAR. It seemed to me when that bill was reported it was hardly worth while, when nobody wanted such mechanism and nobody wanted the cost and trouble of appointing these officers, that they should be appointed; and therefore a certain number was required. I have forgotten what the number was under the bill proposed in the Congress before the last; I think it was fifty.

Mr. PALMER. Not so many.

Mr. HOAR. I may be wrong in my memory. I am speaking of the bill called the force bill.

Mr. PALMER. Ten.

Mr. HOAR. Whatever may have been the number, it was in the nature of a unanimous consent where the petition was not made. There are a hundred things done in the Senate which, if any one or two members of the Senate object, would not be done. General consent is the whole of it.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator tell me why this law, which has produced such advantageous results in its operation, is made to depend in its effect and operation upon the will of two or ten citizens in any district?

Mr. HOAR. I have answered that question, I think.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator tell me upon what theory he justifies the lodging of this power in the marshal upon the application of two inhabitants? I read from the statute:

Whenever an election at which Representatives or Delegates in Congress are to be chosen is held in any city or town of 20,000 inhabitants or upward, the marshal for the district in which the city or town is situated shall, on the application, in writing, of at least two citizens residing in such city or town, appoint special deputy marshals, whose duty it shall be, when required thereto, to aid and assist the supervisors of election in the verification of any list of persons who may have registered or voted; to attend in each election district or voting precinct at the times and places fixed for the registration of voters, and at all times and places when and where the registration may by law be scrutinized, and the names of registered voters be marked for challenge; and also to attend, at all times for holding elections, the polls in such district or precinct.

There is the marvelous provision that two citizens, with or without character, may set the law in operation.

Mr. HOAR. They have the character of citizens.

Mr. PALMER. But two citizens. The act is very carefully guarded. The number shall not be less than two, and these two citizens may, upon application to the marshal, procure the appointment of numerous officers who shall attend the polls, with the right of arresting citizens and enforcing the orders of the supervis rs.

This law, which authorizes two citizens to invoke all the authority of the United States Government and appoint officers for the control of the people, is defended as a wholesome law and as one in harmony with sound political principles.

Mr. President, I have not so understood Republicanism at one time in its history. Republicanism in its early history was willing to take arms for the defense of human rights. Republicanism was willing to summon armies to battle for human rights and human liberty. Republicans to-day are willing to subject the people of the United States to the domination of any two citizens who may call out or create officers for the control of the people without allowing them the slightest voice in creating, selecting, or appointing the officers.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator whether I understand him correctly, to indicate a very strong preference to having this matter settled by a fight and by military process rather th n by process of law? That seems to be what he is urging at present.

Mr. PALMER. I feel no hesitation in answering the Senator. I would rather be governed by a master who would assert his authority and give me the opportunity of defending myself than by a master who would summon and invoke all the powers of this great Government to control me. I prefer the right of resistance to giving to two citizens the power to create officers to govern me.

Mr. HOAR. All I have to say is that I differ with the honorable Senator. I would rather have the Government.

Mr. PALMER. The Senator says he would prefer the Government. The Senator has a right to select his own mode of being governed; I mine.

Mr. VOORHEES. May I ask the Senator from Illinois a question?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Illinois has been the governor of a great State, and I ask him whether from his knowledge these two men might not have been in the penitentiary for criminal conduct and been restored to citizenship by pardon or by the expiration of their sentence?

Mr. PALMER. A certificate of good conduct would entitle them to the restoration of all their rights.

Mr. VOORHEES. And all the powers of the Government, which the Senator so well points out, might be invoked by men who had served in the penitentiary for their crimes if the question of citizenship alone determines the matter.

Mr. PALMER. That is all. The two men, as I have said, may, under one section of the law, set the powers of the Federal courts in motion. Under section 2021 of the Revised Statutes two citizens may apply to the marshal, and the marshal upon their application shall appoint deputy marshals. And by section 2022 it is provided that—

The marshal and his general deputies, and such special deputies, shall keep the peace and support and protect the supervisors of election in the discharge of their duties, preserve order at such places of registration and at such polls, prevent fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting thereat, or fraudulent conduct on the part of any officer of election, and immediately, either at the place of registration or polling place, or elsewhere, and either before or after registering or voting, to arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits, or attempts or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited herein, or who commits any offense against the laws of the United States.

Mr. President, two citizens with the mere right to vote may create and put in motion this enormous force. I understand it is not limited by the law. The people of Illinois and Massachusetts find themselves confronted with a class of public officers with power to supervise their conduct and arrest them on view without any responsibility to the people themselves, and perhaps with no pecuniary responsibility, so as to answer in damages for a violation of the rights of the citizen.

I speak of this source of authority. I insist that this is subversive of all true ideas of popular government, and that such laws ought to be condemned and repealed, because the corruption implied in such a mode of electing officers is more odious and detestable than is possible under the general election laws.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator now allow me to answer, as he introduced what he said by an appeal to me?

Mr. PALMER. With great pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. The power which is lodged in the marshals or deputy mashals is the ordinary power of a peace officer. It is the power which every constable bears with him all the ye ar round at common law and under the laws of all the States where they have constables, to keep the peace, to arrest persons who are breaking the peace in their presence, and so on. I submit, with great respect for the experience and ability of the Senator, that he is sticking in the bark in his dealing with this subject. He is making an apparent and not a real objection.

The substance of the law is that to protect national elections against disorder and fraud of the kind of which unhappily we have had such experience, there should be national officers appointed by the marshals, as a matter of course. Then, somebody raises the question: Out of the three hundred and fifty or four hundred Representative districts in this country, and out of the fifty or one hundred cities of more than 20,000 inhabitants there will be a great many districts and a great many cities where, as a matter of course, the elections are orderly, lawful, peaceful, and where there is no need of any public officer. So, instead of providing that in every case this force of marshals should be appointed the law said simply they shall be appointed if any citizens desire. It said there shall not be less than two, in order to have at least two persons. In other words, it said in substance, they shall be appointed unless there is a unanimous assent to the contrary. That, in substance, is what it means.

Now, as to the criticisms made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], suppose these men to be men who had been pardoned from the penitentiary; suppose it was Mr. Mullens, who was convicted of fraudulent voting, and whom Mr. Cleveland pardoned as one of the first acts of his last Administration; the answer is that a man who has had his citizenship restored is a man, and you can not say in theory of law that one citizen is any less entitled to the rights of citizenship than another. Therefore, in ascertaining whether there is unanimous consent that there shall be no marshals appointed, it is the substance of this provision that if any two citizens say it ought to be done the law shall take its course.

Whether that is wise or not; whether, after all, upon the question which is raised here so often by our friends on the other side, the old practice of letting the State authority secure national elections is one that ought to be continued, is a great question of constitutional law and of public policy, so far as it is not settled by the decisions. But in the minds of those persons who thought with Gouveneur Morris and, as I think, the framers of the Constitution, that the elections of members of the national House of Representatives should be secured by national sanction, and that the State sanction had in fact failed, experience having shown it, having come to that conclusion, rightly or wrongly, it was the attempt of the framers of this statute and of the proposed statute of four years ago to provide a method by which, if nobody wanted a marshal, and the thing was absolutely peaceful, he would not be appointed.

If all citizens were like the Senator from Illinois they would not need any State law or any election law. They would gather together and vote as a matter of course, and would conduct themselves as if the Senator had some guests in his own parlor. Unfortunately, there are people who are not like the Senator from Illinois and who disturb elections. Therefore, if it is the power and the duty of Congress to protect our national elections by national law, I say it is wise to provide that it shall be done in any community, except where there is unanimous consent to the contrary. The only way to ascertain whether there is unanimous consent to the contrary is not to go around with a paper and get everybody to sign a declaration that he does not want it, but simply to say that it is to be done if anybody signs a declaration that he wants it. That is the whole of it.

Mr. PALMER. But the provision simply is that it shall be done if you can get two citizens to ask for it. I have listened with great pleasure to the answer of the Senator from Massachusetts, but I must confess that he has answered almost every difficulty except the one I pointed out to him. He tells me that these officers have only the powers of ordinary peace officers. That I may grant or deny as seems proper; but that does not meet the point. Is it consistent with sound principles of government, that upon the application of two citizens, peace officers, the most important officers of the country, may be created without limit as to number, who are to exercise control and jurisdiction over the people of a district, or a local municipality, or a ward? I care nothing about whether they have been pardoned, as Mr. Cleveland pardoned the man to whom the Senator from Massachusetts alludes. But they may be timid men, men who are full of fear; they may be party men; they may disregard popular rights; and if two men make the application, the marshal must appoint supervisors. The Senator asks, what, after all, is the effect of the appointment; that it is only to multiply peace officers.

Mr. GRAY. May I interrupt the Senator right there? I call the attention of the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that a section of the statute provides that the marshals so appointed may arrest with or without warrant anyone engaged in violating the election laws, thus making the marshal a judge as well as the executive officer—a judge as to whether the law is violated, and clothing him with the power to arrest.

Mr. HOAR. May I inquire of the Senator from Delaware whether every constable in Delaware has not that power now?

Mr. GRAY. I am thankful to say no.

Mr. HOAR. He has in Massachusetts.

Mr. GRAY. I am thankful to say that in that respect we do not imitate Massachusetts, although I confess in a great many respects we might imitate Massachusetts to our advantage.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps that is the reason why there are charges from Republicans as to the manner of the execution of the election laws in Delaware, and no charges from Democrats that the elections in Massachusetts are not fair.

Mr. GRAY. We have never had any complaint about it.

Mr. PALMER. I have no disposition to press this branch of of the discussion further, because the Senator from Massachusetts concedes that two persons may at their own discretion, without giving any reason, create or provide for the creation of a number of officers who possess the enormous power of conservators of the peace, with the special powers conferred upon them by the statute. Would the Senator in his own town in Massachusetts tolerate a law that allowed an indefinite increase in the number of constables upon the application of any two citizens who might think them necessary, upon an affidavit or complaint or petition to the town council or the city marshal, and that the town council or the city marshal should be compelled upon such suggestion or application to increase the number of deputy marshals or deputy constables with the powers conferred upon them by the act I have read? He would not do it. Why? Because the Senator knows it is contrary to sound principles of government that any citizen should be permitted to determine the number of officers in any community.

This is an objection which it seems to me is insuperable. But the Senator says the law operated well in New York in one period of its history, and he referred me to the reports made by one committee which he mentioned. There has been a later report as to elections in New York which points out the horrible abuses which have been practiced upon the free people of New York under the law which it is proposed to repeal.

Mr. GRAY. That report was made to the House of Representatives.

Mr. PALMER. It was made to the House of Representatives. But such a law can not operate well. There is an old maxim that I heard quoted years ago, and I have not yet lost my faith in its truth. It is that error must in its nature be harmful. Wrong must produce wrong results. Right must be right and must produce right results. Here is a radical departure from the principles of republican government, and it can not be defended.

The Senator says there are districts in this country where the law is not needed. Is he willing that any two citizens shall determine that question for any district in Massachusetts, and that if there should be a time when his party in Massachusetts should be in the minority some two men shall fill the district with swarms of executive officers, with power to arrest and with the large powers conferred by the existing law? Would that be tolerated for a day in Massachusetts? I apprehend not.

Mr. HOAR. It would be welcomed.

Mr. PALMER. Then Massachusetts now is not the Massachusetts of Charles Sumner.

Mr. HOAR. If there was any human being who was in favor of the law of 1871 it was Charles Sumner.

Mr. PALMER. Charles Sumner may have been in favor of that law under passionate impulses. In his earnest desire to protect the poor people South, he may have gone far; too far, perhaps.

Mr. HOAR. I dislike to be interrupting my honorable friend so, but he appeals to me, and I should like to be permitted to say a few words.

Mr. PALMER. I do not complain of the interruption.

Mr. HOAR. In the first place, the law was framed chiefly for New York, and not for the South. The Republicans had possession of nearly every State in the South when the law was passed.

Mr. PALMER. They had possession of a good many of them.

Mr. HOAR. There were three or four exceptions, old States which had gone into the rebellion, but we had possession of the others. It was a law passed for the North. Now, when my friend appeals to me whether, if the Republicans in Massachusetts were in the minority they would like that provision, I say it would be welcomed in Massachusetts. It has been invoked again and again by Democrats in Boston. He says: "Oh, if that be true it is not the Massachusetts of Charles Sumner," to which I reply that Mr. Sumner was one of the most strenuous supporters of the law. Then my honorable friend says Mr. Sumner was very much excited.

Mr. PALMER. I beg pardon; it was not that the Senator said he would welcome. He said he would welcome the increase of peace officers. I asked the Senator whether he would accept that condition for his own State. He said it would be welcomed. I say such was not the Republicanism of Charles Sumner, because no man was more devoted to individual liberty nor more distrustful of the powers employed to invade individual rights.

Mr. President, this branch of the law can not be defended. Now, one other view of this case and I am done. My experience is that men only love liberty when they are denied the exercise of the rights that pertain to liberty. I have seen this great patriotic Republic when men lost faith apparently in civil means and civil agencies, when the musket was invoked and military power was resorted to and looked to as the only sure means for the defense of popular rights. I have seen step after step these perversions of law, and I have struggled year after year against the bad influences forced upon the popular estimate of popular rights.

I said in the beginning that I commanded the Department of Kentucky for more than a year and possessed powers that belonged to a commander of a department under martial law. Before I left the Department of Kentucky I addressed a letter to the man whose name is now often mentioned in terms of bitterness, but he, I think, was the giant of his day and generation, the great war minister who organized and controlled and directed the affairs of this great Republic, Stanton. I addressed him an elaborate statement of my views of the condition in that State, and which I believe was not only true then, but it contained what I conceive to be truths applicable to all conditions of the nation. I said to him, "This department has been too long governed by military force. The people have ceased to trust themselves; they have lost confidence in civil agencies; they look to force as a protection against wrongs when they ought to defend themselves by the employment of the agencies created by the civil law."

I said to him, "It will require a quarter of a century" (and I regret to say that even that quarter of a century did not accomplish it) "to convince these people that all their interests are safe under the protection of civil law enacted by themselves and enforced by themselves." Some time ago a friend of mine from Illinois came and met the President, as the story goes. He is a very witty man. He stammers very much. Said he, "Mr. President, I had determined never to come back to Washington until there was a Democratic Administration, and I do not know but that I have come too soon now." [Laughter.] I thought twenty-five years would enable the country to recover its tone and would inspire the people with a confidence in themselves and a supreme love of liberty, and would enable them to turn their faces upon power, and that they would govern themselves, which after all is the only means by which government can be maintained.

The slightest exhibition of power, lawful power or unlawful power, is to me a subject of alarm. I have seen the tramp of these deputy marshals. I never felt their power. In the small city in which I live I saw probably a hundred of them. They were to us, however, the most harmless fellows in the world, because they were our neighbors, but every one of them was himself a living embodiment of a lawless force, a force imposed upon the people in a manner not in consonance with the true principles of republican government. I am fearful that the twenty-five years have not accomplished it, but I trust to see this proposed law passed, and with improved laws of the States the people trust themselves and discharge their own duties. The people being trusted they will respect themselves. The people being trusted they will maintain their liberties; and they will conduct their elections properly because they will feel that the responsibility is upon themselves. Wisdom comes with responsibility.

I have seen fanatics. I recollect in early life when there were men in this country known as fanatics. Those men in the progress of time became leaders in the dominant party, and when responsibility was thrust upon them, they became wise and profound and conservative as men regard conservatism. Place the responsibility upon the people; let them take the consequences of bad government themselves, and we need no security after that for popular liberty.

I trust that these statutes with all that remains of these signs of ancient feuds and strifes and all this mass of force, this sword in a gloved hand, may be stricken from the statute books, and that the people of the country may be held responsible for the purity and fairness of their own elections; and I promise them that all will be well.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I had hoped that before the Senator from Illinois finished he would explain to us a little more clearly the precise point of time when the Republican party went wrong. He began by what I thought was or would be a very warm eulogy of these laws. Indeed it seemed to me that the tenor of his discourse was somewhat disappointing to the Senator from Delaware, who has the bill in charge. In the first place, the Senator from Illinois eulogized the Republican party and said it was the party of liberty; that it was a party that had done great deeds for the Republic; that it was the party that took up the sword in behalf of liberty and the nation—the same sword which as he closes his speech he deprecates the use of. So the Senator went on, even stating that the laws were constitutional in his judgment, although he stands with a majority of the committee uniting in a report which says that the laws are not constitutional. Am I mistaken in supposing the Senator said he thought the laws were constitutional?

Mr. PALMER. I have not denied the constitutionality of the provisions which I have criticised.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator is a member of the majority of the committee which have put themselves on record as declaring that it is unconstitutional for Congress to pass any laws regulating the election of Representatives in Congress. They have adopted the report in the other House made by an able and cogent Representative in that body, who is now here upon the floor. The majority themselves made no report; they adopted that report. It is the report of the majority, to which the Senator from Illinois is supposed to have subscribed; and, after eulogizing the Republican party, he tells us that Congress has, unquestionably, the constitutional power to pass laws regulating the election of Representatives in Congress.

Up to this point, therefore, I say I had some hope—I think the Senator from Delaware had some fear—that the Senator would conclude on the whole that the laws had better remain upon the statute book.

Mr. GRAY. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will speak for himself and allow me to speak for myself.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly. If I did not correctly interpret the countenance of the Senator from Delaware, then I will withdraw that interpretation. It may be that the Senator looked gloomy because he was reflecting upon some other past events, and it was not in connection with the speech of the Senator from Illinois.

Precisely at this point the Senator from Illinois diverged. Up to a certain time he says the Republican party was the party of liberty, the party that drew the sword in favor of liberty, and that it had done noble deeds which ought to go down in history. Then suddenly down the Senator drooped, and the Republican party got into a bad way at the very point of time when the Senator left it. On a previous occasion I endeavored to get the Senator from Illinois to define more clearly and distinctly why it was that the noble Republican party which he had then and has now so strongly eulogized, ceased to be entitled to the confidence of the people.

Mr. President, in connection with this discussion I am prepared to the best of my feeble ability to defend the great acts of the Republican party, beginning with its opposition to the Missouri compromise down to and including the national election laws. I want the privilege of maintaining the essential wisdom and integrity of the Republican party and its patriotism down to the time of the enactment of the election laws, and down to this hour; and I do not defend it merely down to the time when the Senator from Illinois, who had been a Republican governor of Illinois, left the Republican party. He now comes here to pronounce it a party of patriotism as long as he belonged to it, but a party which suddenly turned around upon liberty, suddenly turned around upon everything that was good, and from that time down to this hour has been nothing but the party of evil.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CHANDLER. I will conclude in a moment; if the Senator will let me ask him a question I will then hear the Senator's reply; I shall be through in a moment.

Mr. PALMER. Oh, certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. In defending the Republican party on this floor, if it is possible to defend it, I want to know exactly where it needs defense in the judgment of the Senator from Illinois. Down to a certain period it is a noble and a patriotic party. Suddenly it went down in his opinion. Now, he has given us no specification except that it passed the national election law. If a party debate is to be forced by the majority of the Senate in demanding the repeal of these wise and beneficent laws it is important that we should know exactly the whole indictment against us.

The Senator from Illinois ought to tell us when and where he thinks the Republican party first went wrong. I submit in all fairness he ought to give us some other reason why the Republican party was a noble and patriotic party up to 1868 and is now a party to be condemned when his only specification is that it has passed these laws and kept them upon the statute book. I wish the Senator would open his whole mind and give us the whole case, so that we may reply to it all at once.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like consent to call up Senate joint resolution No. 8. The election bill will probably go over for to-day.

Mr. GRAY. I suppose the debate this afternoon is about exhausted on the unfinished business of the Senate, and I ask that it may be temporarily laid aside, in order to allow the Senator from Nebraska to call up the measure he has indicated.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be laid aside informally.

Mr. GRAY. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may go over until to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

GOLD COIN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before submitting the request of the Senator from Delaware the Chair will lay before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, which will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury in response to the resolution of the 12th instant, directing him to inform the Senate from what source or sources the gold coin in the country outside of the Treasury of the United States was increased.

Mr. ALLEN. I suggest that the letter be printed and referred without being read further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska that the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance?

Mr. HOAR. As a large part of the letter has been read and will be printed in the RECORD, the rest of it ought to go in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is also asked that the letter be printed in the RECORD in full.

Mr. GORMAN. And printed in document form also.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska, as amended by the suggestions of the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Maryland? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., January 15, 1894.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the following resolution, adopted by the Senate on January 12, 1894:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate from what source or sources the gold coin in this country outside of the Treasury of the United States was increased to the amount stated in his recent report for the year 1893; and if derived from different sources, give the sources, respectively, from which derived and amount thereof."

In answer to the above resolution, I respectfully submit the following statement:

The amount of United States gold coin in the United States on November 1, 1892, was estimated to be		$577,387,444
Of this sum there were in the Treasury	$166,135,247
Outside of the Treasury	411,252,197
Total	577,387,444
Coinage of gold by the mints from November 1, 1892, to November 1, 1893		40,699,588
Making a total of		618,087,032
The exports and imports during the same period were as follows:
Exports	$83,002,720
Imports	34,903,280
Excess of exports	48,099,440
Add to this United States gold coin melted for recoinage during the same period	1,749,014
Amount of gold coin estimated to have been used in the arts during the same period	3,500,000
Total loss		53,348,454
Estimated stock of gold coin November 1, 1893		564,738,578
Of which amount there were in the Treasury	$66,616,899
Outside the Treasury	498,121,679
Total	564,738,578
The estimated amount of United States gold coin in the United States on November 1, 1892, was		577,387,444
Amount in the United States on November 1, 1893		564,738,578
Showing a loss of United States gold coin during this period of		12,648,866
Which is accounted for as follows:
Excess of exports over imports	$48,099,440
Amount estimated as used in the arts	3,500,000
Amount melted for recoinage	1,749,014
Total loss		53,348,454
Deduct from this gold coined from November 1, 1892, to November 1, 1893		40,699,588
Showing a net loss, as above, of		12,648,866
Amount of gold coin in Treasury November 1, 1892	$166,135,247
Amount of gold coin in Treasury November 1, 1893	66,616,899
Showing a net loss to the Treasury of		$99,518,348
From this deduct amount of loss accounted for as above		12,648,866
Making the gain of United States gold coin outside of Treasury		86,869,482
The amount stated in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, page 13, outside of the Treasury, November 1, 1892, was	$411,252,197
On November 1, 1893	498,121,679
Making a net gain of gold coin outside of the Treasury of		86,869,482
The exports and imports of gold for the fiscal year (from July 1, 1892, to June 30, 1893) were as follows:
Exports	$108,966,655
Imports	22,069,380
Excess of exports over imports as stated on page 10 of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.		86,897,275

Respectfully, yours,

J. G. CARLISLE, Secretary.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

SPECIAL AGENTS MOORE AND WOODSON.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside that the Senator from Nebraska may call up a Senate joint resolution. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask the Senate to consider the joint resolution (S.R. 8) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to cause the settlement of the accounts of Special Agents Moore and Woodson, under the treaty of 1854, with the Delaware Indians, and so forth.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to cause administrative action to be taken upon the accounts of said Moore and Woodson, and to allow to the said Moore the sum of $3,658, and to the said Woodson the sum of $3,697.84, in full settlement and satisfaction of their respective claims for services under the treaties aforesaid, and pass the said accounts to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury for final settlement: and the acceptance of the said sums by said claimants, or their legal representatives, shall be taken as a full and complete relinquishment and satisfaction of their claims for services under the treaties aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I think either the report ought to be read or the substance of the joint resolution stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that there is no written report accompanying the joint resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. There is no written report accompanying the joint resolution. However, this measure has been before the Senate on one or two occasions and has passed. The substance of it is found in a case entitled The United States vs. Brindle, in 110 United States Supreme Court Reports. Brindle was a colleague of these parties. The question came up whether he was entitled to 1 per cent upon the sale of certain Indian lands of the Wea and other Indian tribes in Kansas. It was held that he was entitled to that commission.

That was taken as a test case. The joint resolution simply proposes to put these parties or their heirs (if I recollect aright at least one of them is dead) upon identically the same grounds that the Brindle case was decided on, affording them the same compensation, 1 per cent commission for the sale of the lands, as was declared by the Supreme Court in that case to be correct. No interest or anything of that kind is allowed.

Mr. HOAR. From what committee was the joint resolution reported?

Mr. ALLEN. From the Committee on Indian Affairs. The report is unanimous. The case was thoroughly investigated by the committee. The joint resolution allows simply the principal sum without interest.

Mr. ALLISON. Were these Indian lands?

Mr. ALLEN. They were Indian lands.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment of the committee to the preamble.

Mr. GORMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that the preamble be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed to the preamble.

The SECRETARY. The committee report to strike out the preamble and insert:

Whereas the accounts of Ely Moore, deceased, a special register and superintendent, and of Daniel Woodson, a special receiver and superintendent, for the expenses of the sale of the Iowa, and of the eastern and western portions of the Delaware, and of the Wea, etc., Indian trust lands in Kansas, under the several treaties of May, 1854, with said Indians, require further adjustment and final settlement: Therefore,

Mr. ALLEN. Let the preamble be stricken out. I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the preamble be stricken out.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN subsequently said: I find in striking out the preamble of the joint resolution just passed that it makes the measure read very awkwardly, and I ask a reconsideration of the vote by which it was stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the vote striking out the preamble of the joint resolution be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion to reconsider is agreed to. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, to strike out the preamble and insert the substitute which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

PORT OF BONNERS FERRY, IDAHO.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask the courtesy of the Senate to call up the bill (S. 1306) to establish a port of delivery at Bonners Ferry, Idaho.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 17, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 16, 1894.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of appropriation submitted by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for completing a sewer to run from the Potomac River near Easbys Point to Fifteenth and E streets northwest, and for repairs to piers of Aqueduct bridge; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were severally referred as follows:

A bill (S. 1126) granting the De Moines Rapids Power Company the right to erect, construct, operate, and maintain a wing dam, canal, and power station in the Mississippi River in Hancock County, Ill.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

A bill (S. 757) to provide for the erection of a first-class fog signal at or near the present position of the Cape Arago life station—to the Committee on Commerce.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees for reports.

The Clerk proceeded to call the committees.

JURISDICTION OF UNITED STATES COURTS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. OATES, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with a favorable recommendation a bill (H. R. 4666) to regulate the jurisdiction of the United States district judges and the courts over which they preside in the State of Alabama; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SUSPENSION OF MINING LAWS.

Mr. KRIBBS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. 3459) to suspend the provisions of the mining laws of the United States, requiring assessment work on quartz-lode mining claims for the year 1893; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of committees for reports.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege, and I ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation. In the press reports——

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, is this in order? Does the gentleman rise to a question of privilege?

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to make a correction of certain reports published in some of the Western papers, attributing to me remarks which were really made by the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. DOLLIVER, a misrepresentation which makes it very unpleasant for me, and doubtless for him also. I shall occupy but a moment.

Mr. DINGLEY. I suggest that the gentleman wait until the gentleman from Iowa is present, as some question may arise.

Mr. SPRINGER. It does not affect him in any way.

Mr. DINGLEY. If that is so, all right.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman desire to correct a report appearing in the newspapers or in the RECORD?

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to make a correction of remarks attributed to me in some of the Western papers.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, if that is the gentleman's purpose, I do not think we can fool away our time in making corrections of misrepresentations that the newspapers may publish.

Mr. SPRINGER. This relates to the pending bill, and puts into my mouth a denunciation of this bill which was really made by the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. DOLLIVER, and I want to correct the misrepresentation.

Mr. REED. Perhaps he was only anticipating you by a year or two. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. That is possible, but I would like to give him the benefit of his statement now.

Mr. REED. If that is all that is wrong, I would not mind that. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to make this personal explanation.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Clerk to read the paragraph which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

He [Mr. SPRINGER] pictured the condition of affairs in 1856, when the low tariff was threatened, comparing it with to-day, when 3,000,000 people are idle. The saddest sight he ever witnessed, he said, was the Philadelphia delegation of manly young men in the Ways and Means Committee room a few months ago, pleading not for their employers, but their employment. [Applause.] They represented 200,000—one-fifth of the population of the greatest manufacturing city of the country. He spoke of the Mills bill, and said it was a measure which in comparison with the pending bill seemed like the work of a statesman.

Mr. SPRINGER. The report published in the Illinois State Register contained only the latter clause of that paragaaph. I desire to state that the remarks there attributed to me were really made by the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. DOLLIVER; that I made no comparison whatever between this bill and the Mills bill; that I commended this bill very highly, and that I did not make the remark in regard to the laborers who had come before the Ways and Means Committee which is there attributed to me. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, what will be the condition of my mind a year or two from this time, but I am willing to say now that if the predictions of the gentleman from Iowa shall prove to be true I shall be quite ready to correct myself at that time, and I trust that the gentlemen on the other side will be equally willing to correct the misimpression which they are now trying to give the country when they find that this bill produces prosperity instead of calamity.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 156) for the establishment of a light and fog-signal station near Butler Flats, New Bedford, Mass.; and,

A bill (H. R. 4340) to amend section 407 of the Revised Statutes so as to require original receipts for deposits of postmasters to be sent to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 299) to extend the time for the construction of the railway of the Choctaw Coal and Railway Company;

A bill (H. R. 340) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a dam or dams across the Kansas River within Shawnee County in the State of Kansas;

A bill (H. R. 3627) granting certain lands to the Territory of Arizona; and

A bill (S. 1378) to amend an act of Congress approved May 12, 1890, granting to the Aransas Pass Company the right to improve Aransas Pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order the House will now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to further consider the bill the title of which the Clerk will report. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] will take the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

TARIFF.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for further consideration of the bill the title of which has just been read.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Page 58, paragraph 339, line 12, strike out "twenty" and insert "fifteen." Line 15, strike out "twenty" and insert "fifteen." Line 18, after the words "action leather," insert "25 per centum ad valorem."

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. The effect of this amendment is to reduce the rate on leather generally from 20 to 15 per cent, and to increase the rate on "piano-forte action" leather from 20 to 25 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this amendment will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I send to the desk another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. In order to facilitate the understanding of the amendments as read, the Chair has directed that the Clerk, after reading the page designated in any amendment, pause long enough for members to turn to that page of the bill. The amendment sent to the desk by the gentleman from West Virginia will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 56, in paragraph 327, line 22, strike out the word "twenty" and insert "ten."

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. REED. What is the ground of the amendment?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. It reduces from 20 per cent to 10 per cent the duty on "furs dressed on the skin, but not made up into articles, and furs not on the skin."

Mr. DINGLEY. Will this apply to anything except seal skins?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. It applies to all furs.

Mr. DINGLEY. But do we, as a matter of fact, import furs dressed, other than seal skins—of course not made up into garments, but dressed and colored seal skins, except, of course, hatters' furs.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. It simply applies to furs dressed on the skin, but not made up into articles——

Mr. DINGLEY. And it reduces the duty to 10 per cent?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman whether any information was given before his committee as to whether we are successfully dressing and coloring seal skins in this country.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I remember none.

Mr. DINGLEY. I have the impression—perhaps the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] may confirm it—that evidence was presented to the committee in 1890 that there was an establishment in Albany that was very successfully dressing and coloring seal skins.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. In any event the judgment of those who concur in offering the amendment is that 10 per cent will be a sufficient rate.

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose the amendment is really in the direction of relieving the minds of workers who are employed in making hats; is it not? In other words, the object is to get around putting a protective duty on hats by these little "sops" to the workmen in that branch of industry.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. The amendment is in the direction of giving the workmen free material to work with.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment as read will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 68, in paragraph 408, line 20, strike out the words "and not rebound within twenty years from said date" and insert the words "and all hydrographic charts."

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this amendment will be regarded as agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. I ask that the amendment be read again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to ask the chairman of the committee whether the words "and not rebound within twenty years from said date" appear for the first time in the free list in this proposed bill?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. I will state to the gentleman that the form in which the clause is here printed is not the form in which it was intended to be printed.

Mr. PAYNE. Does not this clause appear for the first time in this bill?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. It does.

Mr. PAYNE. And you say it has crept in through mistake.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Our attention has been called to a meaning which might be put upon the language and which we did not at first detect. We did not intend to abridge the importation of old prints. The language we adopt now corresponds with what has heretofore been the law; and we think by this amendment the language of the bill will be improved.

Mr. PAYNE. How in the world was the committee imposed on in such a way as that?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. The language in the bill is simply an unintentional form of expression, such as happens very often to the gentleman himself.

Mr. PAYNE. It is a blunder, then?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. A blunder; that is it; and we now correct it.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. O'NEIL. I object.

The question being put, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I send to the desk another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 30, in paragraph 195, line 16, amend by striking out the word "and," and inserting "2 cents per pound."

Mr. DINGLEY. How will the paragraph then read?

The paragraph as proposed to be amended was read, as follows:

Milk, preserved or condensed, 2 cents per pound; sugar of milk, 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MARVIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I desire to amend the amendment by proposing to insert "8 cents per pound" instead of "2 cents per pound."

The CHAIRMAN. The question will be first on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. Before that, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask some member of the committee why this discrimination is made between condensed milk and sugar of milk? I understand that sugar of milk is a higher product of manufacture, which is put at an ad valorem rate of 20 per cent, whereas you propose now to put condensed milk at 2 cents a pound. If you are going to change from ad valorem to specific rates why not change the whole paragraph, and have sugar of milk come in at a specific duty just as the condensed milk?

If one class of these manufactures is to be protected and benefited, it seems to me that there is no reason why both should not be. Of course I want to vote in favor of the protective duty, and if you are going to put a protective duty of 2 cents per pound on one class of milk, I hope there will be no objection to adopting the same course with reference to the other; they being somewhat similar. I would like information, therefore, from some gentleman on the other side as to the reason for this proposed discrimination.

Of course I must seek the information elsewhere because, in the way that these amendments are brought up, we have no knowledge in advance of what they are and no opportunity to look into the matter; so that we must depend upon the gentleman who proposes the amendment to give some reason for its support.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. I will answer the gentleman from New York by saying that I do not think there is a very strong reason either the one way or the other. For myself I have no objection to putting both on the same basis if the gentleman can show any particular reason for doing so. But because we give a specific duty in one case there is no reason why we should in another when we are disposed to be reluctant to give it in either case.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. What is the ad valorem equivalent of the proposed amendment?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. I will say perhaps a little over 60 per cent at the present rate; that is to say, the ad valorem rate as applicable to sugar of milk, which would be about that.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. But what is the ad valorem equivalent on the proposed amendment?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Well, a little over 22 per cent, I should think. The gentleman can readily make the calculation. It is about 34 per cent now, and the duty is 3 cents a pound and we leave it at 2 cents, which would make the ad valorem about 23 or 24 cents.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. What objection would there be, since you are going to make a change and put the duty on condensed milk specific instead of ad valorem, to make it specific on sugar of milk?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. None, as far as I am aware, if the gentleman can submit an argument in favor of the proposition. But it is a small question in all of its parts.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Would not the same argument that induced the committee to put a specific rate on condensed milk apply equally well to the sugar of milk? And if the committee are now changing, as to a part of the bill, it seems to me it would be wise instead of fixing the rate at 2 cents, as proposed here, to insert a specific rate for both products.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit me, perhaps he does not see the objections that might arise in this case.

Condensed milk is dutiable under the present law at 3 cents a pound, which is equivalent to about 34 per cent ad valorem. Of course, at 2 cents a pound, the ad valorem rate would be at 22 or 23 per cent. Sugar of milk, on the other hand, is dutiable at 8 cents a pound, or about 65 per cent ad valorem, being a higher grade of manufacture than the other. I understand we make all that we consume in this country. Of course we have plenty of cows, and milk, and opportunity, and all that we want is to make up the difference in the cost of the product and the cost of the wages. I see no reason why that should not be done in this case. Sugar of milk should pay a duty on the basis proposed here of at least 4 or 5 cents a pound in order to preserve the relation between the two articles.

Mr. DINGLEY. Or 6 cents a pound.

Mr. PAYNE. Yes, or 6 cents a pound perhaps; and if the gentleman from New York will allow an amendment to his amendment I will move as a substitute that milk preserved or condensed, including the weight of the packages, be fixed at 3 cents a pound, and sugar of milk at 8 cents a pound in the same paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] please reduce his amendment to writing?

Mr. PAYNE. The Clerk will find it in paragraph 239 of the present law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] now offers a substitute for the pending amendment and the proposed amendment to that amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. A substitute for the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. A substitute for the paragraph.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to offer any observations upon the first section of this paragraph, relating to milk preserved or condensed; but on the second, "sugar of milk, 20 per cent ad valorem," I desire to offer some observations, and will repeat in part what I stated to the House in addressing it last week. Sugar of milk was upon the free list previous to the passage of the McKinley bill. At the time the McKinley bill went into effect, which put a specific duty of 8 cents a pound upon sugar of milk, the trade in sugar of milk was controlled by a few importers in New York, and the product sold at wholesale for 28 and 30 cents a pound. In 1886 the Secretary of State addressed a communication to the President, with Consular Reports, which he transmitted to the House April 21, 1886, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, House Executive Document No. 188, relating to the manufacture of sugar of milk in Switzerland. The Secretary advised that the information collected by our consuls be sent to the country. Previous to that time one factory had been started in New Jersey, but had failed to conduct successfully the business.

Since the McKinley bill protected this product by a specific duty several factories have been started, one large one in St. Lawrence County, in which I live; another one in Jefferson, N. Y. There are others in New York, one factory in New Jersey, and one in Vermont, as well as several in the Western States. These factories produce about two million pounds of sugar of milk per annum. The result of establishing these factories has been to reduce the price of sugar of milk from 28 to 30 cents a pound, for which it was sold previous to October 6, 1890, to 14 cents a pound for the first half of the last year, and since July it has been sold on our markets at 11 cents a pound. That is about its cost to the American producer. Wages in this country are quite double what they are in Switzerland. I have a communication written in Switzerland on the 21st of October last, offering to sell the secret process by which this product is made in that country. It states the cost to be from 5 to 6.4 cents per pound. If the duty is levied as proposed in the pending bill, the foreign product will be brought into the United States at from 6 to 7½ cents per pound, duty paid, and the result will be to close the sugar-of-milk factories in the United States, and we may expect to pay after the enactment of this bill the high rate at which it was sold when there was no local competition.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Chairman, I have in my district one of the large factories engaged in the manufacture of sugar of milk. I know the individuals, most of them, who are connected with this industry. I can verify the statements made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS]. I know the situation of affairs. In the factory in my district they use the milk of a large number of cows. It is an industry which is quite extensive now, and I am informed by those engaged in it that if the bill becomes a law the result will be to immediately close their factory.

Now, I am also informed that 2 cents a pound upon condensed milk is fairly protective of the industry of this country. If so, then that is probably all we ought to claim; but I see no good reason why we should discriminate in favor of condensed milk and exclude sugar of milk. If we undertake to protect the industries of condensing and manufacturing of milk in any form, why not protect all the branches of that industry? Now, I believe the statements of my constituents when they say that they will be forced to immediately close their factories engaged in the production of sugar of milk if 20 per cent ad valorem, which is equivalent to about 2.2 cents per pound, is the only duty imposed. They will be forced to lose whatever they have put into the industry.

This will lessen the consumption of milk, and interfere with and endanger the interests of a large number of citizens. If we undertake to protect condensed milk, I would be glad to know if there is any earthly reason why we should not in the same degree protect sugar of milk. There can be no doubt about the fact that since our factories have started in this country the price of sugar of milk has been reduced from somewhere about 20 cents a pound to 11 cents a pound.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Still it is not as low as in foreign countries?

Mr. NORTHWAY. No, sir.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. I think I can give the gentleman very good reasons for not going any further than the committee have gone in this direction. The gentleman of course knows that sugar of milk was on the free list until the passage of the McKinley bill in 1890.

Mr. NORTHWAY. May I ask the gentleman where we were manufacturing any at that time?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. I do not hear the gentleman.

Mr. NORTHWAY. May I ask the gentleman where we were manufacturing any at that time?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. We were manufacturing it then.

Mr. NORTHWAY and others. Where?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. In New Jersey. I remember when we were considering the Mills bill we received some very handsome samples of sugar of milk.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will you name the manufacturers?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. I can not recall the name out of memory at this time, but I do state that there was such a factory.

Mr. NORTHWAY. My constituents sent me the names of every factory and the date of the organization, and have informed me, giving me the date in each case——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. If the gentleman will kindly allow me to finish my statement he can contradict it as much as he chooses. The gentleman will find in the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee when the Mills bill was being framed statements were made giving in detail——

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Chairman, I can not hear the gentleman, and I desire to hear him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair again requests members if they desire to converse to retire to the cloak rooms. It is impossible to transact public business where there is so much conversation.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. I say, that if the gentleman will turn to the hearings had before the Committee on Ways and Means when we were formulating the Mills bill, he will find what I distinctly recollect, that there were representations made to the committee in regard to sugar of milk. I remember distinctly that very handsome samples were sent to the committee by the proprietors of the factories of this country, at least by one factory. I kept the sample I received for some years, as it was quite a handsome affair to look at. They complained that they needed some duty. They never had any duty prior to that, and we did not give them any duty; but this fact remains, that they did reasonably well without any duty. And while we do not leave the duty at sixty-odd per cent, where it was placed in the act of 1890, yet I submit that when we leave it at 20 per cent, when they have demonstrated that they can get along very well without, they are in a perfectly safe condition, and I know, while the convictions of the gentleman's constituents may be to the contrary, however honest, they are undoubtedly erroneous.

Now, in regard to making a specific duty upon condensed milk. I stated to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that if he knew of any good reason why it should be extended, that I would be glad to hear it. Instead of giving a reason, he replied giving his opinion, and evidently he knows of no good reason or he would have given one. But condensed milk stands to some degree upon a different footing. We have still left a considerable specific duty on tin plate which is used as a covering for condensed milk, and while that is perhaps a small part of the cost on the article, still it is a shadow of some claim for making the duty specific. Now, there is no very strong reason in any direction, and it is one of those small matters where you are controlled more by the tendencies of things than by any strong footing that they may stand upon.

Mr. NORTHWAY. The gentleman from Arkansas has correctly interpreted my position when he states that probably I do not know the facts. I confess to him that I did not know anything about the manufacture of sugar of milk and the figures connected with its manufacture until I was informed by my constituents, and I do not know that that is anything against a Representative.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Not at all; I meant what I said in no sense of reproach.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I said in my opening remarks that I knew nothing about it except what I had been told by those who were engaged in the business, and that I believed them. They are intelligent gentlemen, and they have told me it was not being manufactured in this country, or to any extent, when the McKinley bill was passed. I did not know that myself, and hence I asked the gentleman to name the places where it was manufactured. The gentleman does not pretend to deny that at the time the McKinley bill was passed sugar of milk was being sold, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] said, at 28 to 30 cents a pound, and that it is now down to 11 cents. He does not pretend to deny the figures given by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS], that it can be manufactured in Switzerland and other countries at from 5 to 6 cents a pound.

I believe my constituents when they tell me that they can not manufacture this article at all with a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem, and that they will be obliged to close up. They have sent out a circular challenging, I presume, the attention of each member here, and is there anybody prepared to contradict their statement of fact? If not, I take it for granted that it is true, and I believe their statement that the passage of this bill will ruin the industry in this country, and that in one year we shall be compelled to pay from 15 to 20 cents a pound for sugar of milk.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. I will state that I hold in my hand the hearings of the Ways and Means Committee in 1890, containing some information about the then existing manufacture of sugar of milk, and, without wearying the House to read it, I tender it to the gentleman from Ohio. He will find it on page 921.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Speaker, in a communication forwarded to this House on the 20th of April, 1886, President Cleveland stated, on the authority of the Secretary of State, Mr. Bayard, that this was not an industry conducted to any extent in this country at that time. I have a communication on this subject, and I have had an interview with one of the largest dealers in the country, in which I have been informed that there was no manufacture of this article in this country when the McKinley act went into effect, and that the sugar of milk that was used in this country was the product of the manufacturers of Switzerland. I think my friend from Arkansas will discover that the article to which he referred was the crystal, and not the perfected article. Was the article to which the gentleman referred powdered and in condition ready for use, or was it the crystal?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. It was the crystal.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Well, that is very far from the completely manufactured article. I have here a sample of the finished product, manufactured at the Potsdam factory, in my district. It is as fine as flour, a fine granular substance. There was no manufactory producing this article, as I am told by a well-informed gentleman, at the time the McKinley bill went into effect, and the gentleman from Arkansas is under a misapprehension when he says that it was produced here before that time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I have before me the hearings of 1890, and I recollect very well that we had some information of efforts to manufacture sugar of milk in this country, but the parties engaged in it found that they could not carry on the business without some protection, and accordingly a protective duty was put upon this article by the tariff act of 1890. Now, without any further knowledge upon this subject, the committee propose to cut down that duty to about one-third. Under the existing law we have developed an industry which supplied all our wants, though the consumption of this article has greatly increased. It is used in preparing food for infants, and the committee propose by this amendment to compel our American infants to be brought up on foreign milk, foreign sugar of milk. [Laughter.] Now, I am so much of an American that even were I a free trader in everything else I would insist in having our infants brought up on the American product. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, I rose not so much on this question as to protest against this way of going through this bill, making it even more ragged than it was at its inception. We had an amendment sprung upon the House a few moments ago to reduce the duty on foreign furs prepared for hatters' use from 20 to 10 per cent. A number of persons made communications and statements to the committee in relation to that subject. One was the firm of W. A. & A. M. White, who seemed to present the matter very clearly, and whose statement was indorsed by others familiar with the subject, and I will ask the Clerk to read what they said, showing the mistake this committee has made this morning in reducing the duty from 20 to 10 per cent without referring to the information that we spent two or three weeks in obtaining.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Hatters' furs" were dutiable at 25 per cent ad valorem in the tariff of 1842, 10 per cent in 1846, 8 per cent in 1857, 10 per cent in 1861, 20 per cent in 1862, and 20 per cent in every tariff enacted since 1862. When the tariff act of 1870 placed on the free list the raw material from which hatters' furs are prepared, namely, "Fur skins not dressed in any manner," or its briefer equivalent, "undressed furs," a portion of the business of manufacturing "hatters' furs" was transferred from England, France, and Germany to this country. During twenty-three years the present tariff has proved protective without being prohibitory. Although having a large factory in Connecticut in which we produce the article in question, we are not able, with the present protection to the industry, to manufacture over one-half of all the hatters' fur we sell, importing, at 20 per cent duty, all the medium and lower grades.

The present tariff thus secures to the consumer the benefit of a free and continuous competition between the American and foreign manufacturers to sell in this market.

The American manufacturer would be driven out of the business, as they were prior to 1870, by any serious changes in the schedules.

In every revision of the tariff from 1870 to 1890 the subjects received a full share of consideration, and in every case the final decision of the committee has been to continue the classification and duties as already quoted. We respectfully ask that no change be made now.

Very respectfully, yours,

W. A. & A. M. WHITE.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I move to strike out the last word. The argument so far on this bill for a "tariff for revenue only" has been conducted on the line of finding out how much protection each article needs. It has been shown by people who understand this question that if this amendment goes into the bill the industry which has been built up under the promise of this Government will be destroyed.

Mr. WALKER. That is the intention of the bill.

Mr. BOWERS of California. That will be the effect. Now, I want to call the attention of the committee to another case. The State of California is, I believe, the only State in this Union that produces raisins. She shipped this year nearly 3,000 carloads, and 99 pounds out of every 100 of those raisins are produced in the district that I have the honor to represent, or, at least, try to represent on this floor. The present duty is 2½ cents. This bill proposes to reduce it to 1½ cents. The raisin-growers have received 3¾ to 4½ cents a pound, and it costs 3½ cents per pound to produce those raisins. Now, if you reduce that duty 1 cent a pound, you put it in the power of the foreign growers to get control of the American market.

Mr. WALKER. Does not the gentleman know that California is a Republican State, and that therefore one of the objects of this bill is to strike at her industries?

Mr. BOWERS of California. Yes, my friend; but California went by a small majority for Cleveland.

Mr. WALKER. But they have no further hope there.

Mr. BOWERS of California No; we will never do it again. [Laughter.] Every raisin vineyard in California will be at the mercy of the foreign growers if you pass this bill in this form. I have here some of this American product grown in my own county. Unlike the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON], who showed his Herculean strength the other day by tearing to pieces an old coat in trying to make a point against American manufactures, though he did not know whether it was American or of foreign manufacture, I come in here with an article that I do know to be the product of our own country. These are American raisins [exhibiting them].

I know where these raisins grew; they grew in the El Cajon Valley, in San Diego County, Cal., near the farm that I worked for years. They are a straight American product. There is no "shoddy" about them. Old Spain never produced any superior, if equal. Those raisins are sold where they are produced at 3½ cents a pound. For the same raisins you pay in this town from 20 cents to 25 and 30 cents a pound. I want gentlemen to look at these raisins; they are a straight American product—they are the product of an industry which by this bill you propose to destroy.

A MEMBER. Pass them around.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Yes; I want to have them passed around. And I want some of them passed over to the other side of the House. I want gentlemen there to realize what kind of an industry it is they propose to destroy. For if this bill passes in its present form the foreign growers can destroy this industry and the raisin-growers must plow up their vineyards and turn them to other uses.

Mr. ENLOE. I rise to a point of order. My point is that members are destroying the gentleman's argument. [Referring to the fact that members were eating the raisins which Mr. BOWERS had exhibited.]

Mr. BOWERS of California. That is right. I want the gentlemen to eat these raisins. They may inoculate gentlemen on the other side with a little knowledge and a little Americanism. They may catch something of the American spirit by eating American raisins. I think gentlemen on the other side ought to eat a pound or two of them; they will do them good.

Mr. ENLOE. Well, we will swallow the argument.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I move pro forma to strike out the last word. I would like to have the gentleman in charge of this particular amendment give to the House the reason why condensed milk under the proposed amendment should come in at a specific duty while sugar of milk bears an ad valorem duty. The law of 1890 imposed on condensed milk an import duty of 3 cents a pound and on sugar of milk 8 cents a pound.

Now, as this bill was originally prepared by the committee who had it in charge and when it was presented to the Republican members of the committee, an ad valorem duty was imposed upon both condensed milk and sugar of milk, but for some reason, which has not been communicated to the Republican members of the committee, the gentleman now in charge of the bill proposes to change this item so as to impose, as I have said, a specific duty on condensed milk while the ad valorem duty is retained on sugar of milk.

Now, sir, sugar of milk is a higher finished product than condensed milk, and there is no question that under the operation of the duty imposed by the law of 1890 this industry has vastly increased and multiplied in this country. Not only that, but the statistics which I have before me and which I propose, by permission of the House, to incorporate in my remarks, show that since the imposition of a duty of 8 cents a pound on sugar of milk the price of that product in this country has decreased 17 cents or more a pound. With such a showing it seems to me that there ought not to be the discrimination now proposed. If the results of the duty imposed by the McKinley bill had not been such as it was claimed at the time of the enactment of the law would result I could see some reason for modifying this provision of the law, but when even the enemies of that great measure come into this House and admit, as they do, that most beneficial results have followed from the imposition of a specific duty of 8 cents a pound on this article, I can see no reason for changing it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. What is the price at this time of sugar of milk?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The price at this time is 11 cents a pound.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. How much reduction does the gentleman say that is in the price?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I say that when the law of 1890 imposed a duty of 8 cents a pound, the price was from 28 to 30 cents; and it can now be bought in the market for 11 cents, showing a reduction of 17 to 19 cents.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Then I understand the gentleman to say that in 1890 the price of this article was 26 cents a pound.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. From 28 to 30 cents.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. And since that time, according to the gentleman's statement, the price has come down to 11 cents a pound.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. I simply wanted a fair understanding of the gentleman's statement of fact.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. But the point to which I wish attention more particularly is the question why the committee proposes to lay a specific duty in the one case and an ad valorem duty in the other. If any reason has appeared for changing the duty on condensed milk from an ad valorem to a specific duty it would seem that the same reasoning would require a similar change in the duty on sugar of milk. Upon that point I would like to hear from the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, in 1890 a witness before the Ways and Means Committee—William M. Van Syckle, I believe was his name—stated, speaking of the condition of things at that time:

> In the United States there are five factories, located respectively at Lansing, Mich., Oxford, N. Y., Burlington, Vt., Unionville, N. Y., and the factory at Hamburg, N. J.

The latter is doubtless the factory to which I alluded in my first remarks. He also stated that in 1889, sugar of milk was worth not 28 or 30 cen s a pound, but 14 and 16 cents a pound.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois is entirely wrong in his assertion that the price of this commodity has been reduced from 28 and 30 cents a pound in 1890 to the present rate. It could not have been reduced beyond the price paid for it, which is shown by this testimony to be from 14 to 16 cents a pound.

These gentlemen also tell us that this industry was started in this country six years prior to the passage of the McKinley act, on page 917 of the testimony taken before the Committee on Ways and Means, and it will be seen that these facts are substantially confirmed by the testimony of others to be found in the same volume.

This witness states also, on page 920, after having previously stated the difficulties the industry met with in its early and experimental condition, as is the case with all industries, and after stating that it was a new industry throughout the world, having been prosecuted nowhere longer than for about twenty years, that during the last three years of the industry it had been successfully conducted in this country. Therefore you are brought to this conclusion, that all your witnesses show that you have gone through the experimental stages of the industry, that for the three years prior to 1890 it was more or less in a state of prosperity in this country—I will not attempt to speak accurately as to the condition of all of these establishments—but during the last three years of the six of which I speak it was successfully conducted without any duty.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we leave a duty of 20 per cent on this article, and I submit that by all reasonable construction nobody has a right to complain. For my own part, I believe it ought to have been placed on the free list. But I can not understand by what process of reasoning, in the face of facts like those I have cited, that gentlemen can conclude that free trade, or a 5 per cent duty, or a 10 per cent duty, or a 20 per cent duty, the duty proposed, is not adequate even from their own standpoint.

As to the other point of inquiry, as I said before, so far as I know there is no great or strong reason one way or the other. I preferred an ad valorem duty on both. But if there is any strong reason why there should be a specific duty on condensed milk, for my own part I say candidly that I do not see it. If the gentleman knows any real reason for the change I should be very glad to have him state it.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in response to the gentleman from Arkansas, I desire to say that I have with me here a statement prepared as to the sugar of milk industry at Amsterdam, in New York, showing the prices that prevailed prior to the adoption of the McKinley law in 1890, and establishing the fact that the rate then paid in this country was from 28 to 30 cents a pound. But for the purpose of this argument I am willing to take the figures given by the gentleman from Arkansas himself, and say that the price was only from 14 to 16 cents a pound. Now, the record shows that since the adoption of the McKinley bill the price has been reduced from the figures he gives to 11 cents a pound; which shows an enormous reduction in the price of the product to the consumer under the existing law.

Now, I do know from personal knowledge that many industries have been started and are on a fair way to success in this country under the stimulus of protection given by the law of 1890. One of the largest and most successful of these was started in my own county since the act of 1890, in the city of Elgin, Ill. They started under a belief that the specific duty of 8 cents a pound was to be maintained. They invested largely in machinery, in the construction of buildings, and the purchase of ground and all that was necessary to give the finished and complete product to the people of this country, and it is doing them great injustice now to change the law, especially to make it an ad valorem duty and bring them in direct competition with the Swiss manufacturers.

The gentleman from Arkansas says that there is no special reason for this. If there is no objection against a specific duty on this article, then I contend that sugar of milk should be treated precisely as condensed milk is treated in this bill. Every person admits that it is a more highly finished product than condensed milk; and yet, according to the statement of the gentleman himself, they propose to put a specific duty upon condensed milk, which is a larger ad valorem equivalent than the ad valorem duty put upon condensed milk. There is no reason, there is no sense, Mr. Chairman, if I may be indulged in that statement, in making the change that is proposed by this committee. If an ad valorem duty is what these gentlemen contend for, then I see no reason why they should not put it upon both products. But if they desire to protect these industries as they should, under the showing that is presented here, then from the statements of the gentleman himself, it seems to me that a specific duty should be adopted upon both articles.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] quoted from the testimony given before the Committee on Ways and Means by Mr. Van Syckle to show the number of factories in the United States engaged in the sugar of milk industry, and he very properly named the five existing factories, but omitted, however, to read the next paragraph following the recital of the number of factories in the United States:

Owing to the prevailing low prices—

This same witness says—

at which the foreign article is unloaded on the American market, the companies operating at Lansing, Oxford, and Burlington have been forced to shut down business.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. The gentleman will remember that I stated that I did not pretend to say that they were all then in a prosperous condition.

Mr. BURROWS (reading):

The company at Hamburg was the first industry of the kind established in this country. This was about six years ago. At that time sugar of milk wholesaled in the New York houses at prices averaging nearly 40 cents a pound.

Here to-day we see the benefit of protection in bringing the price down to 15 or 16 cents a pound.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Eleven cents a pound.

Mr. BURROWS. Eleven cents a pound to-day. This same witness [Mr. Van Syckle] further says something which the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] omitted to read:

As stated above, the wholesale price in the American market in a few years has gone from 40 cents a pound to 15 cents. Foreign competition has done this. This great reduction in price has not benefited either the consumer or the retail purchaser.

* * * * * * *

It is understood to be the policy of our Government, regardless of party or condition, to foster all infant industries; and this should be doubly true in regard to the industry of sugar of milk, a business benefiting especially the agricultural classes.

It is a fact that milk sugar can be manufactured much cheaper in Switzerland than in the United States. Labor in that country costs scarcely nothing. The wages there are not more than 25 to 40 cents a day. For $1,000 a whole town can be employed. Fuel also costs but very little, and much of the wood used in the making of milk sugar is stolen from the mountain sides.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. The gentleman, I believe, stated that the price had been reduced from 40 cents to 26 cents a pound, did he not, at the time that statement was made?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. It has been reduced now to 11 cents.

Mr. BURROWS. The witness stated here 15 cents.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. But that the price had been 40 cents.

Mr. BURROWS. I have but five minutes, and the gentleman will please excuse me. The gentleman also called the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTHWAY] to page 921 of the statement of the American Milk Sugar Company, and I desire to read a passage or two from the statement:

In the year 1884, a few gentlemen of this city who were interested in developing improved dairy processes employed an expert chemist to assist them. While engaged upon the line of work they were interested in, the chemist's attention was called to the fact that a large amount of sugar of milk was being lost, by reason of its crude material, whey, being thrown away as of little value, at many of the cheese factories in the dairy sections of the country. This led him to investigate and experiment along the line of the manufacture of this article.

After a long series of experiments he developed a process by which the article can be made to advantage. He submitted the matter to the gentlemen who are now interested in this company, and after investigation they concluded to form a company for the special purpose of the manufacture of sugar of milk, although investigation showed them the attempt to make it had been several times made, but had always failed, often disastrously.

Owing to various unexpected hindrances, no sugar of our manufacture was offered in the market until late in the year 1886. The quality was very superior, and it was preferred by the leading consumers to the best of the foreign importation. We have continued the manufacture of it from that time until the present, but, we regret to say, without ever getting our company on a paying financial basis. We have invested a good deal of money in plant and in experiments, but so far have been unable to make a dividend, while the stockholders have had to submit to several assessments to furnish means to continue the business, else by giving it up they would have lost what had been invested in the plant.

* * * * * * *

If it were not for foreign competition, there is no question but that we should be able to supply all the milk sugar required in this country.

Then Mr. Bayard, Secretary of State under President Cleveland, made a report, submitted as Executive Document No. 188, to the House of Representatives, a report from our foreign consuls——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Does the gentleman read that as Mr. Bayard's language?

Mr. BURROWS. I am reading what is in the book.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. The gentleman must know that that is not the language of Mr. Bayard, but the language of the consuls.

Mr. BURROWS. I was surprised to see that the book quoted it as the language of the Secretary of State.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Clearly the gentleman who quotes it is in error.

Mr. BURROWS. Then the book is in error.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. He is quoting the statement of the consul.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask my friend not to take up my time. There can be no controversy about it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. There ought to be.

Mr. BURROWS. I will read this, and if this testimony given before the committee, or this statement misrepresents Secretary Bayard, it is not my fault. I supposed it to be his language. If the gentleman knows to the contrary, why, that is all right.

We beg to call your attention to a pamphlet containing a series of reports from the consular officers of the United States in Switzerland relative to the manufacture of the article in that country.

This was stated before the committee.

This pamphlet is Executive Document No. 188 of the House of Representatives of the Forty-ninth Congress, and was transmitted by President Cleveland to the House on April 21, 1886.

In this report Hon. T. F. Bayard, then Secretary of State, said:

Now, that would lead me to form the impression that he said it.

In this report Hon. T. F. Bayard, then Secretary of State, said:

"The manufacturing of this product is not at present pursued to any extent in the United States, though the large and valuable dairy interests would seem to offer an opening for its introduction, an end which may be attained by these reports describing so minutely the details of the process."

He refers to these reports. It looks as if Secretary Bayard was talking.

In thus directing public attention to this industry of the—

Seems to be speaking for somebody—

the Government will be performing a function legitimately belonging to it, seeking to extend and promote the industries of the United States without offering, directly or indirectly, to maintain this new manufacture to the profit of one part of the community and at the expense of the other part.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURROWS. I call attention to that, that we might see that the Secretary of State recommended this very industry to governmental consideration.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Of course the gentleman knows that I dispute the correctness of the citation, and I will produce it to show.

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman does not suggest that I did not read it correctly?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Not at all. I hastily read it myself.

Mr. GROUT. If the gentleman will allow me to hand this book back to him he will see the same thing.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. I know. It is an extract from a consul's report, not Secretary Bayard's statement, as I now take it; and in the reports of Secretary Bayard you will never find any remarks of the kind that seems to be.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I want to ask the gentleman from Arkansas, in view of the facts developed in this running debate, would the gentleman have any objection to restoring the duty on condensed milk and sugar of milk as it now stands under the existing law?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. I believe, in view of the facts that have developed in this debate, that sugar of milk ought to be put on the free list.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia, and the amendment to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARVIN].

The amendment and the amendment to the amendment were reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 62, noes 99.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment offered by Mr. WILSON of West Virginia was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], which will again be reported.

The substitute was again reported.

The question was taken on the adoption of the proposed substitute, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CHICKERING. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 68, noes 115.

So the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the other amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 34, paragraph 231, line 24——

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, before the question is put on that amendment, I would like to ask if an amendment could be offered to paragraph 193, the section just amended?

The CHAIRMAN. Amendments to this section would be in order later, after the Chair has recognized the committee to offer its amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. I think the amendment would be apropos now.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment would not be in order now, but would be later. The fact that this paragraph has been amended will not preclude the offering of amendments to it at a later period.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 34, paragraph 231, line 24, insert the word "gum" at the beginning of the line; so as to read: "gum, 1 cent per pound."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection this amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 139, section 53, line 22, after the word "cigarettes," insert the words "wrapped in paper."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia states that he desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. BURROWS. But I believe I addressed the Chair first.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman in charge of the bill, after which he will recognize other gentlemen.

Mr. BURROWS. I would inquire whether the gentleman offered the amendment as presented by the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from West Virginia to be presenting committee amendments.

Mr. BURROWS. Do I understand the gentleman from West Virginia to be offering his amendments as amendments from the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I am offering amendments of the majority of the committee, but not from the committee as a whole.

Mr. BURROWS. But not from the committee. Now, Mr. Chairman, although we had this question thoroughly debated yesterday——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman if he has any additional authorities.

Mr. BURROWS (continuing). I think I can throw some little light on this, in view of some of the statements that were made on the other side. I have examined the matter since I raised the point yesterday, and since it was argued on the other side, that in the consideration of the tariff bill of 1890 the same course was adopted, and I find that the statements made are misleading, to say the least.

The consideration of that bill was entered upon under the five-minute rule on the 12th of May, 1890, and from the 12th to the 15th of May a large number of amendments were offered, and only five were offered by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. The very first amendment offered was by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKENRIDGE], in Committee of the Whole.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] offered a large number of amendments, and, as I said, Mr. McKinley, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, offered only five or six. On Thursday, after a hundred and ten paragraphs had been considered, during which time members were recognized without regard to the fact whether they were on the Committee on Ways and Means or not, no one claiming that the exclusive right to recognition was with the chairman of that committee and he himself not claiming it, then a special order was adopted providing that the balance of the bill should be read through and should be open to amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman permit the Chair to interrupt him to ask a question for information? The proceedings that the gentleman has been referring to up to this point were while the bill was being considered under the five-minute rule?

Mr. BURROWS. I distinctly so stated. Gentlemen were recognized on both sides without regard to whether they were on the Committee on Ways and Means or not. Then a special order was passed, providing for the reading of the balance of the bill and opening the bill to amendment all the way through. It is then stated in the RECORD that under that order the presiding officer in the Committee of the Whole recognized the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. McKinley, as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, to offer hisamendments in the first instance, and it has been stated here that something over eighty amendments were offered by him.

Now, I want to say that the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. McKinley) in charge of that bill either asked unanimous consent to offer his amendments or else offered them as the amendments of the Committee on Ways and Means and so stated. Whether the Journal or record of the proceedings of the Committee on Ways and Means bears out that statement or not I do not know, but it was stated on the floor that they were offered as amendments of the Committee on Ways and Means, and for that reason the gentleman from Ohio was recognized to offer them. But, to show what coloring is given to this matter, after this special order was adopted, on the very next day, forty amendments were offered by Mr. McKinley. It has been stated here that he offered in all some eighty amendments; but the gentlemen making that statement, unintentionally, of course, omitted to state that forty of them were offered in one amendment, and that those forty constituted a portion of the eighty and were offered not as a matter of right by the gentleman from Ohio as the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, but by unanimous consent. He used this language:

Mr. Chairman, I ask consent of the committee to make a few verbal amendments in the bill, amendments which do not change rates, and so on.

He then offered a schedule embracing forty amendments, and by unanimous consent they were made; yet, as I have stated, these forty amendments are cited as a part of the eighty and odd which Mr. McKinley is said to have offered by reason of his being chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, though in reality, as I have shown, he asked and obtained unanimous consent to offer them.

Further on Mr. McKinley offered a number of amendments, embracing two or three pages, and practically they were offered by unanimous consent. In every single instance, I believe, so far as I have been able to examine the RECORD, he offered the amendments as amendments from the Committee on Ways and Means.

I simply make this statement for the purpose of putting this point in its proper light before this Committee of the Whole, and in order that the present ruling may not be drawn into a precedent.

Now, it is stated in the Digest that the chairman of the committee reporting a measure has a right to present to the Committee of the Whole the committee amendments first. Nobody disputes that, and if these amendments were offered by the gentleman from West Virginia as the amendments of the Committee on Ways and Means there is no question but that the Chair, following the practice of the House, should recognize the gentleman as chairman of that committee. But when the gentleman rises in his individual capacity and presents amendments, I say that under the practice and under the very precedents cited and under the rules of the House, he has no more right to recognition than any other member of this House.

I remember, in reading over the debate, that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] took strong ground against the Chair recognizing the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. McKinley, for those amendments, although no formal point was made; and I remember that the gentleman made the very same argument that has been made here, that the chairman of the committee, under pretense of offering amendments of the committee, might consume the whole time and cut off the other members from the exercise of their right. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] made the same objection, and asked that all the amendments of Mr. McKinley might be read and acted upon at once, so that other members of the committee might have an opportunity to offer amendments.

The reason Mr. McKinley was recognized was that he asked unanimous consent to offer forty amendments at once, and his other amendments were offered as coming from the Committee on Ways and Means; and the reason there were no more amendments offered by the minority was because their course was ob structive from the beginning to the end; and a further reason, as will be remembered, was that we had a high trial here during that period, in which a member was arraigned at the bar of the House, and in fact more than half the time was consumed in debating matters outside of the bill merely for delay.

I present these facts simply for the purpose of insisting on my right and on the right of every member here to be recognized on an equality with the gentleman from West Virginia when he stands in his place and asks to be recognized for amendment after amendment day after day, not amendments from the Ways and Means Committee, but simply in his own individual right, and receives such recognition from the Chair simply because, forsooth, he happens to be chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. I understand that that is not sound parliamentary law; and it ought not to be the practice in this committee. Therefore I ask to have my amendment read.

Mr. MCMILLIN rose.

Mr. REED. As I understand from the gentleman from Michigan, there was no instance whatever where recognition to offer amendments was given to Maj. McKinley——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] is recognized.

Mr. REED. Except as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BURROWS. Not once. He was recognized as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means to offer "committee amendments."

Mr. REED. And when the Chair enumerated yesterday eighty-eight times that Maj. McKinley had been recognized, he included forty amendments which were offered by unanimous consent.

Mr. BURROWS. He included forty amendments which were offered in one bunch by unanimous consent.

Mr. REED. I am sorry the Chair did not tell us that yesterday. The question would have been better understood by the House.

[The Chairman rapped for order.]

Mr. REED. The chairman can not drown that fact by any amount of hammering.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine is not in order.

Mr. REED. That is very true.

Mr. MCMILLIN. In reply to what the gentleman from Michigan has said, it is only necessary to take a comprehensive view of what went on and how it was transacted to see that all he has stated, which is borne out by the record, is consistent with the position we took yesterday. He said that Mr. McKinley asked consent to offer forty amendments. What did that consent mean? It meant that Maj. McKinley wanted the consent of the House to offer forty amendments at once, whereas under the rules there could be pending at one time only one amendment and an ameadment to that amendment. It is not pretended, it can not be pretended with the record before us, that Maj. McKinley ever asked consent, or ever obtained consent, to get precedence over other members of the House, because he assumed from the beginning, and the House acted upon the assumption, that he had that precedence.

Now, there is an inconsistency in the position taken by the gentleman from Michigan. He says it is presumable that all these amendments were offered by consent, and yet he discloses the fact that I, as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, resisted the action taken by the committee in the first instance on the ground that it would give this priority which Mr. McKinley assumed and which the chairman of the committee is exercising now. I said then that if that rule were adopted it would, under the practices of the House, make it possible for the chairman of the committee to hold the attention of the House indefinitely for purposes of amendment, to consume in this way the time of the House, and not give the other side a chance to offer any or all their amendments.

I gave that as a reason why the proposed rule should not be adopted, the time limited for the consideration of amendments being so short. There was not given in that instance, as there is in this, twelve days for the amendment of the bill; there was not given then, as now, nineteen or twenty days for the full consideration of the measure. But when we had considered only sixteen pages of the bill a limitation of time was adopted, allowing thereafter only five days, with one hundred and fifty-six pages of it untouched.

The gentleman from Michigan is right in saying that I resisted at that time, but that resistance was based on the adoption of the rule limiting the consideration of the bill to so short a time. Yet he goes on the presumption that I was sitting here with the rest of the members and consenting to the jurisdiction assumed by the chairman of the committee in offering those amendments.

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman, I suppose, does not dispute my statement that the forty amendments alluded to, which created so much enthusiasm on the other side, were offered by unanimous consent and in gross.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The chairman stated that there were forty amendments which were merely clerical in their nature.

Mr. BURROWS. Yes.

Mr. MCMILLIN. We knew that the quicker we got through with those amendments, in which there was no substance, the quicker we would get to the merits of the bill. Hence consent was given that forty amendments might be offered at once, instead of forty amendments being offered under forty different recognitions, and ten minutes being allowed upon each amendment. That was all.

Mr. BURROWS. Does the gentleman think it was entirely frank to say that Maj. McKinley was recognized forty times on amendments when he presented them all at once?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not say that.

Mr. BURROWS. The Chair stated that there were some eighty amendments in all, and these forty were included among them.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The Chair stated that Maj. McKinley had been recognized for the introduction of eighty amendments, which is borne out by the record.

Mr. BURROWS. Yes, sir; and in those eighty were included forty which were offered by unanimous consent.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Forty amendments at one time instead of forty times. But, if that gives you comfort, let us come——

Mr. BURROWS. Do you think that entirely fair?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let us come to the other forty for which no consent was given, and which, as the gentleman from Michigan has himself disclosed, I was opposing.

Mr. BURROWS. Let me call the attention of my friend right there to the fact that in those cases Maj. McKinley offered the amendments as committee amendments, and so stated.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And that is the point wherein the records of this House do not bear out the statement of the gentleman from Michigan; it is that point to which I was coming.

There never was an authorization of the committee to the offering of the amendments then submitted. They were brought in by the majority of the committee, as the amendments proposed by the gentleman from West Virginia have been, and Maj. McKinley acted in that case for the majority just as the gentleman from West Virginia acts in this case. And the record, as read by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], shows that there never was a meeting of the committee at which these amendments could have been adopted. We had an efficient clerk of the committee, one of the most elegant, painstaking, and able gentlemen ever connected with the committee in a clerical capacity or in any other way, Maj. Carson, known to everybody as a man of the highest character, integrity, and ability, and there is not a scratch of a pen by him showing that the members of the committee, assembled in committee, ever authorized the offering of these amendments. They were offered by the gentleman from Ohio in his capacity as chairman of the committee and as representing the majority side of the House alone.

Mr. BURROWS. I beg pardon of the gentleman, but he does not mean to say that I have misrepresented what the RECORD shows?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Oh, no; not at all. I was referring to the record of the Ways and Means Committee to show that there was no order made by the committee, as such, for the offering of these amendments. The chairman of this Committee of the Whole has acted as his predecessor did then. This, Mr. Chairman, is all I wish to say.

Mr. BURROWS. But let me say that Maj. McKinley—and I read from one single paragraph here—several times called the attention of the House to this matter and indicated in express terms that he offered these amendments from the committee. He said, for instance:

> I ask attention for a moment, and would like very much to proceed with and conclude the committee amendments to-night.

Several times he refers to the fact that they were committee amendments which he was offering.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. They were treated just as these amendments were treated on yesterday and to-day, which were offered by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BURROWS. There was no objection raised on the part of anybody on the ground that they were not committee amendments.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, the difficulty about the argument made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] is that he is endeavoring to substitute for the record of the House the record of the Committee on Ways and Means.

He will admit on reflection at once, as every one will admit who considers the matter, that the only thing that governed the question and the statement made in the House by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and recognized by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, was that committee amendments were being presented. Whether Maj. McKinley was authorized or not to offer such amendments was a question that should have been raised then and there; but their passing undisputed, whatever may be the facts so far as the Committee of the Whole was concerned, gave them the force of committee amendments; and as such had their standing for consideration, not because Maj. McKinley was chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, but because he was the organ of a body appointed by the House to investigate the proposed amendments.

Now, we have gone far in this House in the matter of recognitions of individuals under similar circumstances, because they had been put in charge of the pending bill; but nobody was ever recognized as against any other member to offer a series of amendments upon the ground that he was the chairman of the committee when that committee had never authorized him to act in such capacity. The chairman of this committee was not authorized to act in offering these amendments. He is not the organ of the House. The committee were authorized to act, and they are the declared organ of the House, and as such have the right to present amendments.

I submit, in addition, whether it was perfectly ingenuous on the part of the chairman to make a comparison in the statement he made on yesterday between the amendments offered on either side, and say that Maj. McKinley was recognized for eighty-eight amendments, when, as a matter of fact, he was recognized for forty-four of them at one time, to ask unanimous consent for their consideration.

What did the chairman mean in his own mind? For I take it for granted that he must have been misled about this thing. What was in his mind when he said that? He was talking about recognition, and he said Maj. McKinley was "recognized." He was talking about recognition as chairman of the committee. Now, he was recognized as an individual, and asked unanimous consent. That was in no sense a recognition of his right as chairman of the committee, or as the organ of the committee; and when he came forward and said that he offered a committee amendment, what did that mean? That meant that he claimed the floor as representing an organ of the House, and if nobody challenged him, whatever might be the fact, that was the attitude which he had in the Committee of the Whole and that was the ground on which it was done.

Now, this thing is not only not supported by the examples which have been cited, but it is contrary to the whole principles which govern the five-minute debate in this House; and if this system which was so much reprobated by gentlemen on the other side, but which it seems has been greedily adopted by them—if this thing is to prevail in the future, it is of the utmost importance that as much of the liberty of the individual member should be retained as possible; and the right of the individual member who happens to be chairman of the committee should be strictly confined to what he does as representing the committee and its action, and there is no pretense here that the committee have authorized any such amendment, because the chairman has frankly admitted that such was not the fact. And if Maj. McKinley stated the thing as being a committee amendment, he must have done it through inadvertence if it was not. But whether he did it or not, the House accepted it, and gentlemen on the other side accepted it. It was going on under his right as the representative of the committee, and I hope the committee will not permit itself to swerve from the doctrine of the equality of the members upon this floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to remind gentlemen upon the other side of the House that the matter of recognition rests in the sound discretion of the Chair.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman look at his book of rules?

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman has any point, he can state what it is.

Mr. REED. The rules of the House provide that when two members rise at the same time——

Mr. SPRINGER. The question of recognition, as I said before, rests in the sound discretion of the Chair, and it frequently happens that the Chair recognizes a gentleman who has not spoken, while some other gentleman has spoken, and no one in my recollection here has ever questioned the right of the Chair. It is simply playing upon words to intimate that the Chair misrepresented the fact in regard to the proceedings in the Committee of the Whole in recognizing Mr. McKinley. Whether Mr. McKinley was recognized to offer amendments from the committee or to ask unanimous consent to offer amendments, he was recognized all the same. It was simply a question of recognition, and after the Chair had recognized him he had the floor to make any parliamentary motion he might desire to submit.

Now, so far as the rules of this House are concerned—and the rules of the House govern the Committee of the Whole House—no member by reason of the fact that he is chairman of a committee has any more right than anybody else. The Chair does not recognize the right of any chairman of any committee, or any member under the rules, as being superior to those of another.

Mr. REED. The Chairman says he does.

Mr. SPRINGER. On this floor we are all equal, and all have equal rights; but under the precedents which have prevailed, and which are now being followed strictly by the Chair, the gentleman who has introduced a bill, whether he represents himself or a majority of the committee reporting the bill, has at all times, so far as I can remember, been recognized to propose such amendments as would perfect the bill before the Chair recognized other members of the House.

This is simply a custom. The Chair need not recognize this custom under the rules unless he sees fit to do so; but it is a custom that in its observance has become equal to the law of the House itself, and whether the gentleman who is chairman of this committee desires to be recognized to offer an amendment proposed by himself, or by a majority of the members of that committee, or by the Committee of the Whole House, his rights are the same, and no different under either case. The chairman of the committee reporting the bill, therefore, no matter in what capacity he rises, whether to ask unanimous consent or to insist upon an amendment that may not be favored by the committee, has the right to that recognition until that measure has received the complete sanction of the gentleman reporting it, and until it is fixed up in such a way as he desires it to be considered by the House or the committee. That is for the purpose of facilitating business——

Mr. BURROWS. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield——

Mr. SPRINGER. Otherwise we might be discussing matters that the committee desired to amend. So by this means the Chair is facilitating the business of the House in bringing forward, first, amendments which seek to perfect the bill, and then we may contend about other matters afterwards. I will now yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BURROWS. I would like to have the gentleman explain, if he will, what is meant by the statement in the Digest that amendments reported from the committee have precedence over other amendments, and when reported with the bill are considered and treated as pending amendments.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is where the committee reports the bill at the time to the House, and has reference to a bill reported back to the House with amendments.

Mr. BURROWS. Oh, no.

Mr. SPRINGER. I submit that it is in order to dispose of the amendments authorized by the committee.

Mr. BURROWS. Amendments reported by the committee have precedence.

Mr. SPRINGER. Those reported back with the bill have precedence.

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the bill had been recommitted to the Committee on Ways and Means and reported back with amendments those amendments would be considered by the ruling of the Chair and not by any rule or by the custom of the House.

Mr. BURROWS. It makes no difference whether the bill was reported with amendments or whether they are recommended by the committee: they are committee amendments.

Mr. SPRINGER. To this extent we agree.

Mr. BURROWS. Very well.

Mr. SPRINGER (continuing). That if they had been reported with this bill they would be in order to be considered first?

Mr. BURROWS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. The precedents and practice of this House in time past have been that the Chair recognize the gentleman that reported the bill to the House to offer such amendments as he desired. He was first recognized to offer such amendments as would perfect his bill, and this side did not object when Mr. McKinley reported amendments and, after disposing of his amendments, the Chair recognized other gentlemen to offer them. Mr. McKinley offered the amendments of the majority.

Mr. REED. That is just the point. He did not represent the majority; he represented the committee. That was what he said.

Mr. SPRINGER. He represented the majority in one instance and himself in another.

Mr. REED. The record of the House shows that he said he represented the committee, whether he meant to say so or not.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the records of the committee do not show that he did.

Mr. REED. But the records of the House show that he did.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the records of the committee are just as much the records of the House as the record of the House is.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the chairman of this committee should report an amendment that would be voted down by the House, or an amendment should be voted upon and not agreed to, the other side would have been regarded as having the right to offer an amendment to the bill, so that we are now proceeding in an orderly way to perfect this bill, and it will facilitate business to pursue the practice which the Chair has pointed out. It makes no difference whether the amendments offered by Mr. McKinley were authorized or whether the amendments he offered were forty or eighty. He stated that he desired to offer the amendments, and nobody objected, and I hope no further objection will be made.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ENLOE. I yield to the gentleman for a moment.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I simply call attention to the fact that, in addition to the forty amendments offered by unanimous consent at once, a large number of other amendments were offered upon the statement of Maj. McKinley, as follows: "I ask unanimous consent to offer the following amendment." "I ask unanimous consent to offer another amendment;" and in no single instance did Maj. McKinley take the floor and claim the right, as an individual member, to be first recognized to offer amendments.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me now to state——

Mr. BURROWS. In not a single instance did he do it.

Mr. SPRINGER. He did not ask unanimous consent to be recognized. He was recognized, just as the Chair has recognized the gentleman from West Virginia to offer amendments. He asked unanimous consent to offer amendments, and there were no objections.

Mr. BURROWS. That is too small a difference to take notice of.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is what we are talking about—recognition.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, I am rather inclined to the view that has been taken by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] in regard to this question, considered from a technical standpoint. I believe he is technically correct. The chairman of the committee, speaking in behalf of the majority, in substance represents the committee, yet unless the committee as a whole has passed upon these amendments and authorized them to be offered, I do not believe that he can as chairman claim recognition as a matter of right.

I believe, however, Mr. Chairman, that this difficulty may be settled upon a different basis and without departing from correct parliamentary practice. I would like to preserve the individual rights of members as far as possible against the rights of committees, for I have seen the individual member suppressed in this House by the committee and by the Chair in a manner that I do not care to see again, and I do not know into whose hands the next House of Representatives may fall. [Laughter.]

A Republican MEMBER. We know over here.

Mr. ENLOE. No, you do not. You thought you knew before, but were mistaken. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Chairman, it does rest within the sound discretion of the Chair to recognize any member. The rule, I admit, states that the Chair shall recognize the member who first rises and addresses the Chair; but every member of the House knows that there is no practical force in that rule, that it has been overridden by the practice of the House, until the custom has become stronger than the law. I stated yesterday, and I repeat to-day, and I do not think I exaggerate when I say that a hundred times I have seen the Chair recognize a gentleman who was in his seat while there were a dozen other members standing upon the floor clamoring for recognition.

That often arises in this way: An arrangement has been made privately with the Chair by the member for recognition at a certain time; the time arrives and the member, not being attentive, does not rise and claim the floor; but the Chair keeps his promise and calls the name of the member, who thereupon rises and takes the floor. I think that under that discretion and under the practice of the House, the Chairman has the perfect right to recognize the gentleman from West Virginia for the purpose of offering his amendments to this bill, and I think it is proper that the Chair should recognize him because he is, in substance, in this instance the representative of the Committee of Ways and Means. He represents the majority in offering these amendments, and it is the right of the majority to perfect their bill before other amendments are considered. Upon that ground I hope the Chair will continue to recognize the gentleman from West Virginia until the amendments proposed by the majority shall have been acted upon, and there will still be abundant time left for recognition of other members.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule upon this question. The first point to which the Chair will address himself is the suggestion made by some gentlemen here that the Chair was not frank and ingenuous in quoting the precedents in Committee of the Whole when the bill known as the McKinley bill was under consideration. The Chair stated that he had counted the amendments during the Christmas vacation or prior to this meeting of the House, and what he said yesterday was this, quoting from to-day's RECORD:

> The Chair found by actual count, unless he is mistaken in that count, that the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. McKinley, in charge of that bill, after the House had passed the special rule, similar to the rule under which we are now proceeding, which took that bill out of the usual course of its consideration in committee—that is, by items and paragraphs, and had determined to throw open the remainder of the bill for amendment at any point—the Chair finds by actual count that the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. McKinley, was recognized by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to offer eighty-eight amendments.

The Chair, it will be seen, did not state that the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. McKinley, had been recognized eighty-eight times. The question was as to the number of amendments that he had offered, and the Chair stated that, according to his count, the number was eighty-eight. The Chair did not say that forty-two of them were offered at once, as the gentleman from Michigan now states; but that does not change the effect of what the Chair did say, which was that eighty-eight amendments had been offered by the gentleman from Ohio. They were distinct amendments, and if the Chair's statement was in any degree misleading, or led the committee into supposing that the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. McKinley, had had eighty-eight separate recognitions, still the fact is not controverted that the gentleman from Ohio had forty-six separate recognitions to offer amendments, that being the difference between forty-two and eighty-eight. Now, forty-six recognitions of the gentleman from Ohio would establish the point that the Chair was attempting to establish quite as well as eighty-eight.

Mr. BURROWS. Perhaps the Chair would have made the case clearer if he had said that the gentleman from Ohio was recognized once to offer forty-two amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; but after offering forty-two amendments, the gentleman from Ohio offered forty-six amendments upon separate recognitions. Now, it is insisted on the part of some gentlemen that Mr. McKinley offered those amendments on behalf of the Committee on Ways and Means, but that is a point in controversy. The gentleman from Ohio, Mr. McKinley, did not make that claim when he offered several of his amendments.

It will be found from the RECORD that after he had offered the forty-two amendments at one time he yielded the floor. Then the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Candler, offered an amendment, the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. HENDERSON, offered an amendment, and other gentlemen offered amendments. Then the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. McKinley, offered quite a number of amendments. Then the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. TUCKER, offered an amendment, and the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. FUNSTON, offered an amendment, and so on. Again Mr. McKinley took the floor and offered a number of amendments. The point is, that as long as the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. McKinley, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, had amendments to offer he was recognized to offer them and they were acted upon by the Committee of the Whole.

The Chair made reference from recollection yesterday to a proceeding which was had in the House. I have that before me now. It appears on page 5077 of the RECORD of that Congress. The gentleman from Ohio, Mr. McKinley, offered an amendment in these words: "I offer the following amendment;" and the Clerk read the amendment. Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas said: "Let the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee explain." Mr. McKinley said: "I yield to the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. GEAR." Mr. GEAR: "That is a defect in the bill," and so on.

Then Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky rose and said:

> Mr. Chairman, I rise to ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means how many amendments are in the widow's cruise of oil that never seems to give out, that he seems to have in his desk.

Mr. McKinley said:

> If my good friend will patiently wait he will learn.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky: I am very patient; but my friend from Ohio said to us on Saturday that was the last amendment that the committee had; and we put that in the RECORD until Monday morning; and now it is Tuesday evening; and the gentleman seems to have an unlimited supply of amendments; and I would like to know how many more there are.

Mr. MCKINLEY: That statement was quite correct at that time.

What statement? The statement that that was all the amendments that the Committee on Ways and Means then had. And now the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. MCMILLIN, states that there was no meeting of the Committee on Ways and Means (and the minutes of the committee utterly fail to disclose any such meeting) in the meantime, or that there were any amendments agreed to in the meantime by the committee. Yet on Tuesday evening Mr. McKinley was offering quite a number of amendments.

Now, what the Chair wants to say is this: It has always been conceded that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means when a tariff bill is pending has the floor until he offers the amendments which he sends up in behalf of the majority of the committee. That was not controverted during the pendency of the discussion on the McKinley bill. As long as Mr. McKinley offered amendments they were considered. If he offered them all at one time they were considered; if he let in other amendments in the meatime and then desired to recur to his own amendments the Committee of the Whole permitted him to do so until he was through with the amendments which he desired to offer.

Now, passing away from the question that has just been considered by the Chair and referred to in debate, the question of recognition is absolutely in the discretion of the Chair, as all gentlemen concede. The Chair wants to be fair in exercising this discretion. Shall the Chair stop, before this bill is perfected by the gentlemen who have it in charge, and permit a number of amendments to be offered and possibly adopted to different sections, and then have the Committee on Ways and Means afterward calling up those different sections for further amendment? The Chair thinks that such a course ought not to be pursued.

The Chair will be pardoned for saying that the question of recognition referred to in the rule which has been quoted is largely recognition for debate; but the question of recognition before the Committee of the Whole now is recognition to offer amendments; and if the discretion is given the Chair to recognize in debate absolutely that discretion, it would seem to the present occupant of the chair is much more strongly vested in the Chair to give recognition on amendments.

The Chair begs leave further to say that he wants to follow precedents when they are right. There are precedents for the course he has pursued in recognizing the gentleman from West Virginia, who has charge of this bill, to offer amendments until he shall have concluded the offering of such amendments in behalf of the committee. This is the course pursued by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole while the McKinley bill was pending.

Mr. CRAIN. I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. In a moment the Chair will have concluded his statement. In the Fifty-first Congress, when a bill was under consideration—and the Chair asks attention to this matter because it involves a ruling of the gentleman from Maine who is now bringing into issue the ruling of the present occupant of the chair—the gentleman from Maine was presiding as Speaker of the House of Representatives. There was pending a bill providing for the issuance of Treasury notes upon silver. A special rule was adopted in the House under which that bill was considered, and an hour was fixed when that bill should be voted upon.

While that bill was pending the gentleman from Maine recognized a Republican member to offer an amendment to it; he then recognized a Republican member to offer an amendment to that amendment; he then recognized a Republican member to offer a substitute; and then he recognized a Republican member to offer an amendment to that substitute; and then when the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. BLAND, demanded recognition the Chair quietly informed him that all the recognition within the power of the Chair had been given and that no further amendments were in order.

Mr. BLAND. I wish to state in that connection that I was on my feet demanding recognition from first to last, and was wholly ignored.

The CHAIRMAN. That is unquestionably true. The gentleman from Maine as Speaker exercised a discretion and power which he then had to make four recognitions for four different amendments, all that could be offered to the pending measure, all on the Republican side of the House, and did not permit any amendments to be offered by the minority. The Chair refers to page 5813 of the RECORD, Fifty-first Congress, which shows this proceeding.

Mr. REED. It would have been rather a surprising circumstance if the gentleman from Missouri had been the only member on his feet demanding recognition at that time. [Laughter.] My impression is that there were so many gentlemen on their feet demanding recognition at that moment that I should not like to be called on to identify any one of them.

Mr. BLAND. I was the only one on my feet on this side of the House.

Mr. REED. I can hardly credit that. Unless the gentleman from Missouri asseverates from his personal recollection that such was the fact, I can hardly think it possible.

Mr. BLAND. My recollection is clear; for I had charge of the bill on this side of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was going to make that statement. The minority conceded to the gentleman from Missouri the right to offer one amendment in behalf of the minority; and he pressed for recognition upon it, and was the only member of the minority demanding or asking recognition.

The Chair simply refers to this matter as a precedent in the line of action which the Chair is now taking. The Chair thought yesterday, and still thinks, that the gentleman from West Virginia, representing the majority of the committee, has the right to offer these amendments, and the Chair recognizes him. The Clerk will report the amendment which has been sent to the desk.

Mr. CRAIN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRAIN. I wish to ask if the Chair uses the term "discretion of the Chair" in a parliamentary or an arbitrary sense in regard to the recognition of other members of the committee for the purpose of offering amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to be perfectly impartial in recognizing gentlemen on both sides of this question.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 27, paragraph 177, amend by inserting at the end of the paragraph: "Chair cane or reeds, wrought or manufactured from rattans or reeds, 7 per cent ad valorem; and strike out 684 from the free list."

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. The effect of this amendment is to take from the proposed free list in the bill the articles mentioned there, and restore them to the dutiable list at 7 per cent. Under the present law the duty is 10 per cent.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago I read the testimony taken before the Committee on Ways and Means, or submitted to the committee what purported to be a declaration of Secretary Bayard touching a certain industry in this country, and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] criticised me and asserted that no such language had been used.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. It was an error on both sides, as I think I can explain to the gentleman.

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman from Arkansas challenged the correctness of the statement I made as to the language of Secretary Bayard.

I hold in my hand "Miscellaneous Documents and Messages from the President of the United States" for 1885–'86, and I find on the 20th day of April, 1886, the following:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State on the manufacture of milk sugar in Switzerland.

(Signed) GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 20, 1886.

The report uses the following language:

I have the honor to transmit a series of reports from consular officers of the United States in Switzerland, relative to the manufacture of milk sugar in that country. The manufacture of this product is not at present pursued to any extent in the United States, though the large and valuable dairy interest would seem to offer an opening for its introduction, an end which may be attained by these reports describing so minutely the details of the process.

Then following to the end of this report what I read:

Respectfully submitted.

T. F. BAYARD.

So the statement I made is exactly confirmed by the language of the Secretary himself, and the gentleman from Arkansas had apparently overlooked the fact that such a communication had been submitted by the Secretary of State.

Let me state that my attention was called to this matter by the gentleman from New York [Gen. CURTIS], who had intended to use the report himself in the debate.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, it was my purpose, as soon as we resumed debate on amendments, to call attention to an error into which I think the gentleman from Michigan as well as myself has fallen.

In hastily looking at the quotation made by the Committee on Ways and Means I read the deductions made by the witness:

It is evident—

Said the witness—

that the honorable Secretary saw in this an opportunity to foster and build up an industry as yet undeveloped in this country.

And the witness went on to state—

That it was a case in which the application of the American principle of protection to new industries in their beginning was greatly needed.

I think it is a fair construction of language to say that the witness states that the Secretary saw it was a case where protection could properly be applied, and upon observing that, upon a hasty examination, I was under the impression that the quotation professedly from the Secretary of State was a statement of that doctrine. Looking at it hastily and seeing the use to which the gentleman from Michigan was putting the quotation, I was rather confirmed in that impression.

Now, no one who knows our distinguished representative at the Court of St. James believes for an instant that any utterance of his advocating the doctrine of protection has ever been found over his signature or correctly quoted from his mouth.

When I came to a more careful examination of the quotation I find it states exactly the reverse of what I thought it stated. It states exactly the reverse of anything that would support protection; nor can the gentleman from Michigan justly quote it in that connection. While the witness was correct when he attributed the language to Mr. Bayard, he is incorrect when he made the deductions he did from the language.

What did Mr. Bayard say? I wish to emphasize it. He said:

In thus directing public attention to this industry the Government will be performing a function legitimately belonging to it—

That was the encouragement he proposed to give it, simply to furnish information. And that was to benefit it how?—

seeking to extend and promote the industries of the United States without offering directly or indirectly to maintain this new manufacture to the profit of one part of the community and at the expense of the other part.

I had overlooked that language. I did not question the integrity of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] in his quotation. I was simply questioning the integrity of the text. I had mistaken the true contents of the text. Yes, the witness quoted from Mr. Bayard; that is true. The gentleman from Michigan read from the testimony of the witness in a correct manner. Whether he read it all or not I am not now prepared to say. Mr. Bayard did seek to encourage the industry by publishing information, but not by protecting it; and he laid down the good old Democratic doctrine that it must not be encouraged at the expense of any part or class of the people of this country, and that is true; and if we had followed Mr. Bayard we would have left the article where it was when he made that publication—upon the free list.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the chairman of the committee [Mr. WILSON of West Virginia] that he is getting fresh light upon this subject all the time and is inclined to put a protective duty upon additional articles in this bill. These articles, when they are manufactured for chair-makers' use, were on the dutiable list in 1883. Some other articles of similar manufacture, used for hat-makers, were put on the free list by the law of 1890, but, for a reason which was then thought to be sufficient, those used for chairs or manufactured for chair-makers' use were left on the dutiable list at 10 per cent.

In the hearings before the present Committee on Ways and Means only one firm appeared in reference to this particular class of goods, Messrs. Foppes & Partisch, importers, of New York, whose statement appears at page 501 of the hearings. They desired to have these articles put upon the dutiable list, and although they simply expressed their desire, and, as they said, the desire of some manufacturers who used them and some importers, the committee seem to have jumped at the conclusion that it ought to be done without any further examination, and they have put them on the free list, and so reported their bill. They will be found in paragraph 684. But it seems the committee is getting new light every day.

Now, if there was less haste on the part of the committee, if they only would examine more into the industries of the country and the relation of these duties to the industries of the country, I am convinced that they would not stop at these rattans to be used by chair-makers, but that they would go through the whole bill and every schedule and every paragraph of the bill, and give "incidental protection" to all the manufacturers under it.

I am in favor of this amendment. I do not see why they stop at 7 per cent and why they do not give us 10 per cent, which is a very low duty and would not raise your ad valorem in any appreciable degree on the whole bill. Why do they not give 10 per cent for the benefit of the workingmen engaged in this class of industry in the United States?

Of course those opposed to the general theory announced by my colleague yesterday and those who believe that the more you reduce the duties and the more free trade, the wider market you have—the more extended market you have and the greater wages for the workingmen—if you were honest in that yesterday and if you really believe that free trade all along the line would increase the industries of the country and would increase the price of the laboring man's wages, you should not put this amendment on this bill; but if you believe, with this side of the House, that to protect our industries builds up our manufactures, increases our home market, and gives greater wages to the American workingmen, of course this amendment is right. But do not stop at these little things. Go along the whole line and make the bill a protective bill and suit the majority of the interests of the country.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I ask for a vote.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I desire to amend the amendment by inserting the present law, which is 10 per cent ad valorem.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to amend the amendment by striking out the work "seven" and inserting the word "ten."

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment, offered by Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois, the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois) there were—ayes 65, noes 98.

Accordingly, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 683, page 89, by striking out all after the word "provided,' and insert—

"That any of the articles mentioned in paragraphs 672 and 683 inclusive, when imported from any country which lays an export duty on the same or any of them, shall be subject to the duties existing prior to the passage of this act."

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Just read the first part of that again.

The amendment was again reported.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 686, page 90, by inserting at the conclusion of the paragraph, "Provided, that this section shall take effect on and after the 1st day of August, 1894."

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, this is a proposition, I understand, that the committee had under consideration last night. They propose, so the papers report, to still further postpone any benefit to the American people from free wool. They will follow this with a proposition to postpone the date on which the lower duties on woolen goods shall take effect. Do you not think that the Democratic party has been slow enough in giving the people the benefit of free wool? If they have to pay high prices this winter why should they have to pay them next winter? I want to make it perfectly clear to my Democratic colleagues that this is a proposition to postpone the benefits of free wool and lower duties on woolen goods, and that therefore the committee's amendment should be voted down.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who want our people in the country to get the benefit of free wool just as quickly as possible. If that schedule could go into effect on the 1st day of February it would be best for the whole country, for the manufacturer as well as for the consumer of woolen goods. If it were possible to put it into effect the 1st day of March, I think that that would be a good time, although there might be some minor inconveniences.

But the whole business of the manufacture of woolen goods is divided according to seasons, in periods of six months. If it is a possible thing for us to do it, to pass this bill, to put this tariff into operation on the 1st day of February, let us have free wool on the 1st day of February. If it is possible for us to have free wool on the 1st day of March let us have it; but if it is not possible to have free wool in time to include the calculations for the opening of the pending season of manufacture to be made upon that basis—if it is impossible for us to have free wool in time to give woolen goods more cheaply to our people for next winter's wear, then, sir, we ought to arrange to have free wool go into effect for the next season of wool manufacturing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. Do you not think the manufacturers have been taxing us long enough to divide a little?

Mr. WARNER. My dear sir, if I could get anything out of the woolen manufacturers I would be glad to do so; I would be delighted to do it. I want to cut them down to 25 per cent as a maximum.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. That is another proposition.

Mr. WARNER. But the question here is whether or not we shall break into the middle of a season and thus leave no chance for the American manufacturers and no market for American wool for six months to come, and until after we have had that season of wreck and disaster.

Mr. PICKLER. But you say that that will give us better prices.

Mr. WARNER. If we had free wool to-day we would get better prices than we will by keeping it open until the 1st day of August, but if we can not get it on the 1st day of February or the 1st day of March, then the only chance for a market for the wool of the American farmer for the next season is to have the present season of manufacture undisturbed.

Mr. BOWERS of California. But you give 40 per cent duty to the mill-owner.

Mr. WARNER. I have already proposed to cut it down to 25 per cent as the maximum, and I am willing to go farther if necessary—indeed, I hope we may soon succeed in cutting it off altogether.

Mr. PAYNE. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment, to strike out the date proposed in the original amendment and insert instead thereof the 1st day of October, 1898.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I propose that for two or three reasons. I understand the present amendment is in the interest of the manufacturer, and is in the interest of the importer. It is put in this shape in order that these two classes of individuals may shape their business and shape their matters to provide for this radical change in this schedule; to enable them to get rid of their present stock, and to know what to manufacture in the future, and what to import in the future, and to know when to take their goods out of bond and put them on the American market.

I am in sympathy with that idea if you are going to change the rate. I think the workingman engaged in the woolen mills ought to be protected in this respect not only, but for all time. But I want to raise my voice in favor of that class of the people of this country who very often in debate, where words cost nothing, find a great deal of favor on the other side of the House. I want to raise my voice in behalf of the American farmer and the American sheep-owner. Give him plenty of time to prepare and adjust his crop and his production to the radical change which you propose in this bill. Woolen goods can be made in a few months, but it takes a number of years to raise a flock of sheep to produce wool. The change in the American farmer's product should not be made suddenly. You gentlemen should have a little consideration for him, and the same reasons which would impel you to put off the date when this bill should go into effect in order to accommodate the manufacturer and the importer, ought to impel you to put off the date for the purpose of accommodating the American farmer and sheep-raiser.

Then there is another reason. There will be an election in 1896, an election of a President and of a Congress. Let this matter go before the people. Let them understand what you propose to do with the sheep industry of this country, and with the wool industry. Go before them with that issue, and it will then be a clean-cut issue. No demagogues from your party can come into my State and tell the farmers that we have got to raise a hundred and seventy-five million dollars of revenue by tariff taxation, and that any tariff bill that provides for such an amount of revenue as that will necessarily at the same time afford sufficient protection to every class of labor and manufacture in this country. You can not deceive the people in that way in 1896, because they will have before them your naked proposition to put all wool on the free list. Nay, they will know that it will be on the free list on the 1st day of October, 1898, unless they vote to change the programme. So, for all these reasons it seems to me entirely proper and reasonable to put off this evil day until the time I have named in my amendment. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to put off until the 1st day of October, 1898, the time when this provision of the bill now under consideration putting wool upon the free list shall take effect. I am in favor of having this provision of the bill take effect at once, because it is the provision that furnishes free materials to our manufacturers. Last year the wool imported into this country, the wool covered by this clause of the bill and now to be put upon the free list, was valued in Europe at $18,416,000, and in addition to that the importers had to pay $8,159,000 of duty upon it. Twenty-six million dollars were, therefore, paid by the manufacturers of woolen goods in the United States during that one year for the foreign wool that they were compelled to use in their manufactures. Now, it seems to me that no greater boon could be given to the manufacturers of this country than free wool, in view of the fact that they had to pay upon their importations of last year a tariff tax of $8,000,000.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Is free wool in the interest of the manufacturers, or in the interest of the consumers of clothing?

Mr. SPRINGER. It is in the interest of both. I am for it because it is in the interest of the consumers, but at the same time I do not begrudge the manufacturer the advantages which it gives him. You can not cheapen the production of woolen goods in this country unless you let the manufacturer bring in his foreign wools free. And, Mr. Chairman, this will not interfere with the price of the domestic article. Goods are made by mixing foreign with native wools, and the demand for native wool for that purpose will be largely increased if you admit foreign wools free of duty, because there will be a larger production of woolen goods and a larger demand for them.

The woolen manufacturers will not be required to pay $8,000,000 a year more for their foreign wool than its actual price, by reason of our tariff legislation; they will get the benefit of saving that $8,000,000, and therefore they can afford to pay more for the native wool which they will require to mix with their foreign wools, and I believe they will pay higher prices for native wool, because there will be a largely increased demand for their goods. Hence the policy which we should pursue is to put wool upon the free list at once upon the passage of this bill, in order to enable our manufacturers to complete their stocks out of free wool before their rivals, who also have the benefit of free wool, can come into this market to compete with them.

I would put the manufacturers' schedule off until the date fixed in this bill and even to a later date, say the 1st of October next. It seems to me only just to the manufacturers of our country that they should be permitted to get into our markets with their stocks made out of free wool at least as early as, if not earlier, than their foreign rivals, who have the same advantage of free wool. I would leave an interval at least of six months.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARNER] differ very radically in their ideas about this matter, although they are both on the same side of the question. The gentleman from New York says if we can not pass this bill so manufacturers can get free wool at once why should we strike down the wool-grower by putting his wool on the free list now? But the gentleman from Illinois says we shall get just as good a price for wool if it is upon the free list as we get when it is dutiable. Now, which gentleman is right?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Neither of them.

Mr. PICKLER. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, every wool-raiser in the country knows that on the fear of this reduction of the tariff mutton and wool are only worth half as much as they were last year. That is our experience, and so far as my own constituents are concerned, the placing of wool, on the free list is ruinous to them. It will hurt us worse, in my opinion, than any other provision in the bill. Our farmers and our wool-raisers know that since this tariff has been in operation we have had a better price for wool and a better price for mutton than previous. We have in our region of the Union a country devoted to sheep-raising, and our farmers desire to assist in raising the 60,000,000 sheep that are yet necessary for consumption in this country. Yet we are stricken down by this bill.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMPSON. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the price of wool had gone down within the last year or two years?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, sir; I did.

Mr. SIMPSON. Since the passage of the McKinley bill?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, sir; in last year.

Mr. SIMPSON. Then, in spite of the protection put on wool, the price has gone down?

Mr. PICKLER. It was up before this Administration came into power.

Mr. SIMPSON. The gentleman admits the price of wool has gone down under the high protective tariff put on it by the McKinley bill.

Mr. PICKLER. I admit no such thing.

Mr. BOWERS of California. It has gone down under the apprehension created by Democratic efforts to put it on the free list.

Mr. PICKLER. The price went down a few cents after the passage of the McKinley bill; and it went down in the markets of the world three times as much as it did in this country. It was only by virtue of the McKinley bill that it stayed where it was.

Mr. BURROWS. That is the point.

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman from New York confesses the very point of this matter when he says that if the woolen manufacturers can not have free wool this season then we ought not to ruin the wool-raisers during the present season. In that remark he confesses the whole case, the great reduction of price of wool. Still you propose to strike down this important industry of our region of country.

Why is it—I have asked the question before on this floor, and

I put it now to the gentleman in charge of this bill—why is it that you compel the wool-raisers of the United States to raise wool in competition with the wool-raisers of the world, and yet you protect the woolen manufacturers? Why is not that question answered? Why did you not distribute this burden? Why did you not give the wool-raiser some protection and the wool manufacturer some protection? Why cast the whole burden upon the wool-raiser? I suppose this has been done for the same reason that the price of every article that the farmer is interested in selling is reduced by this bill. I defy the leaders on the other side to name a single farm article in respect to which this bill does not leave the farmers in a worse condition than it found them.

Mr. WALKER. Southern rice.

Mr. PICKLER. Well, I grant that. I do not envy the Southern farmers the fact that they have a little help on rice and cotton ties. I am thankful that farmers in some part of the country have some little show in this bill. But in the West and the North they are stricken down on everything; there is not an exception. The very party that has been claiming all these years to be protecting the interests of the farmer, to be caring for agricultural productions, comes in here now and strikes down the farmer at every possible point, while still protecting the manufacturer.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, is there pending an amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. There is.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. Then I offer an amendment as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. That is in order. The Clerk will read the proposed substitute of the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 90, in paragraph 686, insert:

"Provided, That this paragraph shall take effect immediately upon the passage of this act."

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, the contention seems to be that under this bill, as it stands, we do not give the woolen manufacturers time enough; that this reduction will take effect in the midst of a season. Now, I am willing to oblige the woolen manufacturers by having the provision take effect as early as possible; and the earliest date at which it can go into operation is the day of the passage of the bill. I am willing that in this respect the free wool schedule should be made to suit them. This amendment will carry out our promises to the people as nearly as possible. We can not satisfy them any sooner. I therefore propose that the placing of wool upon the free list shall take effect not on the 1st of June as proposed in the bill, nor on the 1st of August as proposed by the amendment of the committee, but on the day of the passage of this act.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am in sympathy with the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] which would postpone until 1898 the operation of this measure so far as wool is concerned. If that can not be adopted, I am not in sympathy with the proposition of the Ways and Means Committee, that the placing of wool on the free list shall be postponed until the 1st day of August; and for this reason: If there was any one thing that was certainly in the minds of everybody when the Democratic party came into power, it was that they were to place wool on the free list.

That was their specialty; it was talked at every crossroads. The result was that, without reference to the duty upon foreign wool, the dealers in wool and the manufacturers of wool all over this country at once discounted the effect of placing wool on the free list. It was so in Illinois to my personal knowledge. I apprehend that every man within the sound of my voice who has any personal knowledge of the matter knows that the wool crop of last year was bought at the same price as foreign wools of like quality.

This the manufacturer did on the practical business plea that he had to sell his goods substantially a year in advance, and as wool had to go on the free list before his product was delivered he would not use the wool except at a price that it would be when his goods were delivered. Now, when you postpone the time for the taking effect of that law until August 1, if it is to go on the free list at all, you do not benefit the farmer, whom you strike at and whose finished product you strike at, but you only benefit the importer and the manufacturer, who has practically already had his wool as if it had been on the free list, though he may, as to the product that he and they place on the market before the 1st day of August, get the extra price up to that time without helping any wool-raiser or any farmer one cent. And when the Ways and Means Committee come in here and posture before the country by postponing until August 1 the date that wool shall go on the free list, if it goes there at all, they are either in my judgment not informed or not sincere. I want to place the date, as the gentleman from New York has suggested, up to 1898; but if it is to go on the free list at all in the next twelve months, then the sooner you put it there the better.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, this is a matter of very great importance and one to which the majority members of the committee have given as much anxious investigation as to any question connected with the whole tariff bill, and I shall endeavor to state frankly to the committee why we seem to be resistlessly driven to the conclusion we have been driven to, by the offering of these amendments, namely, to adopt the 1st day of August as the date for putting wool upon the free list, and the 1st day of December for making the corresponding reduction in the schedule of woolen manufactures.

I confess I sympathize with the feeling of my friend from Ohio [Mr. JOHNSON]. He is not more eager than I am myself—he can be no more eager, to relieve the American people from what I consider to be a blot on our civilization in the high duties maintained in this woolen schedule; and when I was probably in the same stage of investigation that the gentleman from Ohio now is, my opinions in regard to the matter were exactly those that the gentleman has uttered here upon the floor.

When this bill was first prepared we had fixed the date of the passage of the bill as the 1st day of March, hoping it would become a law by as early a date as that time. Free wool, then, would have taken effect upon the 1st day of March, according to the provisions of the original proposal, and the reductions in the woolen schedule would have gone into effect on the 1st day of December. Nobody now can say that the bill can become a law by March 1, or at least nobody can definitely state or accurately prophesy on what particular date it will be enacted into law. We have got to take into consideration existing business conditions in the country, and the regular courses of trade; we have got to take into consideration the present condition of the woolen manufacturing industries, and as stated by the gentleman from New York, there are two great seasons for manufacturing woolen goods in the United States.

Ordinarily, were there no uncertainty as to the law, the manufacturers of woolen goods would be to-day receiving their large orders from the jobbing houses for the woolen goods to be consumed by the American people next fall. As long as doubt remains as to the date when these changes will go into effect, the jobbers are withholding their orders. They will not give them to the American manufacturers for goods for next fall, if there is a prospect that they can in a few months order the same goods from foreign manufacturers, made upon a free-wool basis, and with the taxes on the finished product graduated according to a free-wool basis. We must, therefore, take into consideration that condition of affairs. We must take into consideration the course of trade and manufacturing in the woolen industry.

It is simply a question as to whether our own manufacturers shall remain idle during these winter months, and whether the employés in the woolen mills shall be out of employment in these winter months, because of the uncertainty, or whether this House shall definitely say and say now, "You can go on with your winter manufacturing and we will fix these dates far enough ahead to prevent the destruction of your spring business." Now, Mr. Chairman, as I have learned the course of the trade in woolen manufactures, orders are taken from this time until late in the spring by the American manufacturers, for goods to be used next fall.

[The time of Mr. WILSON of West Virginia having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.]

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. The jobbers and the woolen trade generally, the wholesale clothing-makers and the retail storekeepers are all to-day uncertain as to what they should do. If they will not give their orders to the manufacturers the mills can not start. If the mills can not start there is no market for the American farmer. He must be allowed to work off his spring clip, which he can do before the 1st of August, and then, with the bars thrown down, with the invitation to the wool of all the world to come here to help clothe the American people at reasonable prices, the woolen mills can start up again; and, with the duties taken off of woolen goods, by the 1st of December the American consumer can get his choice between imported goods at the new rates of duty, and home-made goods made of untaxed wool at the new rates of duty.

It was for this reason that reluctantly and slowly—as reluctantly as I ever consented to anything in my life, but yielding to what seemed to me to be the resistless logic of the situation—I moved from the view occupied by the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], and with my colleagues of the majority of the committee determined to report these as the proper dates for the going into effect of the woolen schedule.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Does not the gentleman know or believe that the spring clip which he speaks of would sell as if on the free list, to be manufactured into a fabric that is to go into the fall and winter trade; and does not the gentleman also know that the clip of the present year has been selling as if it was on the free list already?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. That is not the fault of the present bill.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am speaking of the existing condition. I am not talking politics now, but I am talking business.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. As to the gentleman's first question, to which I wish to give as intelligent an answer as I can, I will say the amendment which I have presented fixes the 1st day of August for free wool, and I shall follow that up with another amendment fixing the 1st day of December for reductions in the woolen schedules. That gives the farmer time to work off his spring clip under existing conditions, to be made up into fabrics to be sold under existing conditions.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Does the gentleman think the farmer will get any more for his spring clip of wool than if it went upon the free list immediately on the passage of this bill?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Of course if the American mills get the orders from the jobbers as usual, and start up in the manufacturing of woolen fabrics, there will be a market for the farmer which ought to maintain the price of his wool.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Will that enable him to get a larger price for his wool?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. A better price than he would have received if the mills remained idle. That is just the point.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The question is, Would he get a better price than he would if wool went on the free list immediately upon the passage of the law?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] has expired.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], to have this clause take effect as to free wool on the 1st day of January, 1898. I do not propose, however, to enter into any extensive argument in support of it. I will simply say that it would be a fair proposition to let the American people pass deliberately upon the question of free wool.

Mr. SPRINGER. They have done that already.

Mr. GROUT. I reply to the gentleman from Illinois, no, not yet. This course would, together with the further amendment in line with this proposition, suggested by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], have the duties on manufactured goods take effect six months later, and thus present the whole question, which could in that way be submitted fairly to the people for their decision.

The gentleman from Illinois says it has been submitted already. No; not in any intelligible form, nor has it been passed upon by the American people understandingly. There was an election a year ago last fall. There was another this fall. Now I undertake to say that the voice of this last election is even more to be heeded than that of a year ago. It is more recent and more emphatic, and prudent Democrats can not but be notified that the people are not in favor of this bill.

The election of last fall ought, at least, to raise a doubt as to whether they have rightly construed the verdict of 1892. This amendment would remit to the people for their approval or disapproval the proposition to put wool on the free list. This would be perfectly fair and would result in a decision in which all would acquiesce.

I rose, however, not to make a speech or argument, because I see that such is of no avail, and that this Democratic procession moves on just the same, however reasonable the protests may be against the passage of this bill which is neither for revenue, protection, nor free trade, but is unjust and unequal in every feature. Now, to inform the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] concerning the fall in wool, I will read him something right straight from a farmer in his own handwriting up in my State. It is from a gentleman who writes very intelligently as to the effect of the proposed bill upon the business of the farmer, and after speaking concerning also the misfortunes which came in with the present Administration because of its menace to our industrial system, he says:

Last year wool sold at this time for 22 to 25 cents per pound; to-day farmers are offering it for less than half. Sheep one year ago sold on the average for $4.28. George Phillips, the drover in this town, is now buying them for 65 to 80 cents per head.

Now, this shows when wool fell to its present ruinously low price—practically a free-trade price; for the passage of this bill is already discounted by the American people, and by no class more promptly and intelligently than by the American farmer. But this writer says further:

The farmers do not beg for justice, but demand it. If the bill passes as it is, so sure will the farmer rise in his righteous indignation at the polls next fall and leave nothing but a "grease spot" of the Democratic party; but he can not wipe out its past infamy.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. Chairman, I did not expect to address the committee, but when we have so many friends talking for the the American farmers, as one of that class I desire to return my thanks for their anxious solicitude.

There are some things that some of us would like to have explained. They tell us that the farmer gets back the amount which he pays as tariff in the increased price of products. It was sought to be incorporated in the RECORD yesterday by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], assuming to represent words used by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], that the tax that is placed upon the American farmer is placed by him upon the consumer of American products, and, therefore, the farmer does not pay it.

Please explain how we get our share of this protection money. If we get it at all, we get it in the price of our cotton, wheat, and other staples. These prices are made in Europe, where we sell the bulk of our cotton and the surplus of our grain and meat. Were it not for the European demand for it, cotton would not bring 3 cents per pound. Under normal conditions the price is made for each day at Liverpool, where the sun rises three hours earlier, before the New York brokers get out of their beds. What authority is there in England to compel the spinners to pay us more than they pay for Indian and Egyptian cotton?

We sell in competition with the cheapest labor in the world. How are we reimbursed when we must come back and pay a tariff tax of more than 40 per cent out of the free-trade price we got for our products? How with the wheat-grower? He ships his surplus to Liverpool. The price is made over there, because when they do not pay more it is thrown back upon the market here, which puts the price down. How does the consumer of wheat bread pay the tax upon binding-twine, when the market is made in Liverpool, where there is no tax? I trust the gentlemen who talk so much about our interests will answer these questions and show us how we are protected.

Now, a word, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], who rushed into this debate so dramatically while the gentleman from South Dakota was speaking. Mr. PICKLER asked in what interest was this bill drawn, and the gentleman from Massachusetts rushed in to exclaim, "Southern rights."

I say to him that I had proposed to sit here without opening my mouth during this debate and vote for this bill; this bill which gives to Massachusetts alone, his own State, more money in the shape of protection than it does to the entire cotton States of the South. And yet he comes in here crying about "Southern rights." We know what that means.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman said "Southern rice," not "Southern rights." [Laughter.]

Mr. MOSES. Then I beg the gentleman's pardon, as he objects only to Southern rice. Why use the word "Southern"? Does that make the term odious? But the gentleman objects to a tariff upon anything the benefit of which goes to the South, and this bill has been denounced by other gentlemen as a Southern measure. They charge that we maintain the duty upon rice. The Wilson bill reduces that duty 25 per cent, while the next article—rye, "Northern rye" if you wish, is increased 300 per cent. Now I say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that if Georgia had received the protection accorded to Massachusetts, if Georgia had received the enormous pension sums which we poured into your lap, if she had been able to save the interest which since the war we have had to pay your people made rich upon the spoils of war; if you had let her alone and kept your hands out of her people's pockets, the world to-day would see in her borders a degree of prosperity in comparison with which your rocky New England would be a howling wilderness. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARTMAN. Why did you not furnish the soldiers and then you would have the pension money?

Mr. MOSES. Have you no respect for the man who lived in Georgia and answered the call of his State? Our fathers loved the Union, but they loved Georgia more. Many of them followed her call with tearful misgivings, and after she had gone down in blood and disaster, dearer even then was she to them than she was in the day of her pride and power. I have no respect for the man who lived in your State and did not respond to the call of his State and join the Union Army, and I have still less respect for the man, and you have no respect for the man, who lived in Georgia and claimed to be loyal to the Union. My friend will not say that I misrepresent him.

Mr. MERCER. What wages do you pay on your plantation?

Mr. MOSES. I am glad that the gentleman asked me that question.

The land-owners furnish all the capital; feed and clothe the cropper and his family during the year; at the end of the year the profits, if any, are divided equally; if there are losses the landlord must assume the entire loss. Do you give that much? In addition to this he sends the cropper's children to school five months in the year, and in the case of the colored tenants, who are in the great majority, pays for the tuition.

Georgia gives out of the pockets of her white citizens a half million dollars annually to the education of colored youth. What has your party done for the colored people? I defy you to point to a single law enacted by you which has been of benefit to them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Chairman, the question before the committee is whether the woolen manufacturers and the market for wool in this country shall both remain paralyzed for another year.

If this amendment can be adopted there will be an immediate market for such wool as is in possession of the American farmer and there will be a coming market for the spring clip. The business of woolen manufacture, in which the district I represent is engaged perhaps as largely as any other in the country, is almost absolutely paralyzed.

At least one half of the mills in my district are silent and most of the others have reduced production and discharged labor to a great extent, so that, as a business, it is practically dead to-day in my district and in this country, and it will remain so until the new conditions which we expect, if this bill passes, are settled, unless we can ascertain now in the preliminary stage of this tariff legislation what is likely to be the condition during the period required for another season's manufacture of raw material into the finished product and its disposition upon the market. If this amendment be adopted, orders will be given at once and the manufacturers will purchase wool; it being understood that there will be no market for foreign wool or woolen goods in this country for another season, or until another stock of goods can be disposed of upon the market.

If that can be settled, no matter whether this bill passes or fails to pass in the end, business will revive immediately to a certain extent, because the American manufacturer, whether manufacturing native or foreign wool, will see that he can hold the market for this season's finished product, and, for a brief period at least, he will be comparatively indifferent as to what becomes of this bill. Now, people all over the country are starving and freezing, and there is more distress in New England, though she says very little about it, than I have heard demonstrated upon this floor to exist throughout the entire West, either as a result of our silver legislation or from other causes; so that this amendment proposed by the chairman of the committee is, as I conceive, an amendment that ought not to be trifled with, but that ought to be supported by members on both sides of the House.

It is in the interest of an immediate revival of business, and that, even for a brief period, will help us through this cold, bad winter until we can forecast the future. I will vote for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]—possibly it may do some good; but the essential question is whether the amendment proposed by the chairman of the committee be agreed to. Knowing what is threatened in this bill, there being no employment, and there being the necessity for existence, the manufacturer will say to his help now out of work, freezing, starving: "Here, you see that we can manufacture for a time to compete with the pauper labor of Europe upon a basis that will give you existence. The goods must be sold in a depreciated market, for prices must be upon the foreign basis even before the bill becomes a law. Are you ready to work and resume business on the same basis as if the Wilson bill is to become a law?" And, for the sake of existence, they will agree to that, so that business will revive and the present and impending distress in this industry will be relieved.

Mr. DE ARMOND. It is with much regret, Mr. Chairman, that I find myself unable to follow the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means upon the pending amendment. I think the amendment is wrong in principle; and looking at it as a citizen, looking at it as a Democrat, I think it would be bad in its effect. Mr. Chairman, we are right or we are wrong in regard to this tariff matter. The Democratic philosophy, as I understand it, is that no tariff duties should be imposed except for the purpose of raising needed revenue. This proposed postponement is in the nature of a decree that manufacturers may manufacture for a year more under the McKinley tariff, and that consumers for a year more shall be compelled to purchase under the McKinley tariff. If this be a necessity, to that necessity we must bow. If it be not a necessity, we ought not to submit to it.

I concede, Mr. Chairman, that the committee have given long and careful consideration to this subject, and to all kindred topics involved in this tariff inquiry; and I appreciate fully that one whose knowledge of the subject-matter is only casual and rudimentary is at a great disadvantage in discussing such propositions. But I think propositions like this resolve themselves into original principles, and that they depend fundamentally for their decision upon the correctness of the Democratic or the Republican theory of tariff taxation. Now, if this postponement takes place, it is in order that manufacturers may now be invited to proceed to manufacture, with the assurance that they can sell the product of that manufacture at McKinley prices.

I am more concerned, Mr. Chairman, for the welfare of the thousands and hundreds of thousands—aye, the millions—the real distressed people who buy the products of these factories—I am more concerned for the effect upon the prices which they shall pay than I am about this other question, whether the mills shall start up this week or next, this month or next, the coming spring or next summer or next fall. By the adoption or rejection of this amendment we shall determine whether we will invite the American people to a contemplation of another year beset with hardship, dark with disaster pending and disaster threatened—whether we shall invite them to another year of the policy, the wages, the prices, the principles which we have denounced over and over again.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I would like a few moments more, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I thank the committee for its courtesy, and will endeavor not to abuse it.

The question pending before us is whether we will follow the principles of Democracy, letting the manufacturer take care of himself, or drop back to the principles of Republicanism and take care of him. Are we proposing to say to him, "My good friend, proceed further under the McKinley law, and our word for it, we will protect you in the advantages which it gives you." To the consumer we shall be saying, if we adopt an amendment to postpone the day of the people's relief, "Suffer through another season, with blight and disaster about you, with darkness everywhere; suffer the rigors of another winter; submit to the hardships which we have denounced, and which you have voted shall be lifted from you. Endure them for a while longer, and in the sweet by and by the relief often promised, often delayed, often denied, shall come." For the adoption of the committee amendment now pending, if it be adopted, will insure the adoption of the companion amendment, to delay until December the reduction upon woolen goods.

For one, Mr. Chairman, whoever may vote otherwise, I can not vote for that policy. On the other hand, if we leave this bill as it stands in this particular—aye, better still, if we adopt the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOHNSON], and put this particular paragraph into effect just so soon as the bill shall be passed—what will be the effect? Grant, if you please, that mills will be idle, or comparatively idle, until the tariff law is passed. From every corner of the land will come up a cry, louder and stronger and more imperative for prompt action upon this bill. That cry has been raised; that cry is echoed over the land to-day, and it will gain increased force.

Such a provision as that proposed by my friend from Ohio [Mr. JOHNSON] will hasten the passage of this bill. It will be a spur in this House if needed; it will be a spur in the Senate. The country—everybody in it, manufacturer and consumer, high and low, rich and poor, employed and idle, prosperous and suffering—will unite in one mighty voice calling for prompt and speedy action, for almost immediate action upon this measure. And then when the bill is passed, when the people know what law they are to operate under, sell under, buy under, live under, then the spindles will be set whirling, then industry will be stimulated in the right way; then mill-owners will seek mill hands; then there will be work for all who desire to work; and then there will be for the consumer prices upon the Democratic basis of free raw material and a revenue tariff. I think the substitute of the gentleman from Ohio ought to be adopted as a change toward the right.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] putting off the time when this paragraph shall go into effect for five years, and I wish to state my reason. Long before that time the farmers that gentleman on the other side talk so much about will tell you emphatically what they think of legislators that give the big mill-owners of the country six months' protection under the McKinley bill, during which time the small farmer, the small wool-grower, is to furnish these manufacturers free wool with which to carry on their business. It seems to me, gentlemen, that you are in a hurry to knock out the farmer; but it is consistent with the bill from beginning to end. All through it you have selected the big mill-owners, the wealthy classes, to receive your favor. Everywhere that you had the opportunity to do so you have struck the farmer.

You talk here about the beauties of a revenue tariff; you denounce protection. That is the way you talk, but you have got to vote another way; you have got to vote for the most illogical, the meanest, protective tariff bill that ever was launched before this House.

Mr. Chairman, my district in California produces, I believe, more wool than any other district in the United States; and I know something about the business. I know that until the last election was decided, the wool business was all right; but when we knew that Democrats had got into power, and when we recalled the action of that party on the bill of Mr. SPRINGER in the Fifty-second Congress, we knew that the party was committed to free wool, and then prices went down. To-day in the city of San Diego, where my home is located, great warehouses are piled full of wool.

It can not be sold. Why? These rich manufacturers are waiting for their friends on the other side of the House to stand up for them and give them a McKinley protection for their products and the free wool of the farmers; and of course they will not buy their wool until they know the result of your action here. But when wool is put on the free list they can say to the Australian, and to foreigners generally, "Come on, bring in your wool," at the same time saying to the farmers of the United States, "Now you can not help yourselves; you have got to take what we give you for your wool or it will remain unsold." I tell you, Mr. Chairman, that the farmers will speak in tones that you gentlemen will be forced to understand. They will tell you what they think of such business as this. They will give you an opinion of that policy which sacrifices their business to the advantage of the rich and prosperous mill-owners and importers that you can not misunderstand.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS] and the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] have told us what the farmers of this country will do if they ever get another chance at the Democratic party. The farmers of their districts have already told the country what they would do, not in the future, but in the past; and they can not hurt the country any more in the future than they have done in the past as far as the election of Congressmen is concerned. [Laughter.] They can not do any worse in that regard than they have done.

Mr. BOWERS. Well, as far as that goes, I am willing to stand up with the gentleman and try the question of average.

Mr. BRYAN. I do not mean to reflect on the gentleman from California or the gentleman from Vermont, who represent their districts so well. They seem to reflect the opinions of their people, and I have no doubt they do. But these gentlemen forget that there are many districts in the United States that they do not represent, and if the people in their districts understood that the Democratic success in the last election meant free wool and a reduction of the tariff, perhaps the people in all other districts throughout the country understood it equally as well and gave their verdict accordingly. If the election of the Democratic Congress meant—in view of the declarations of the Democratic party—that the people of this country wanted free wool, the gentlemen have no reason to suppose that the great bulk of the people will not in the next election want it just as much as they do now, and will elect to Congress to succeed us Representatives who will see that that policy is faithfully carried out. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman suggests that some of the farmers in Vermont are stirred up about this matter, and that there will not be a "grease spot" left of Democracy if we do not carry out the policy he suggests. Now, Mr. Chairman, if we carried out the policy of Vermont, as suggested by the gentleman and advocated by his farming community, as we are told, there would not only not be a grease spot of Democracy left in Vermont, but there would not be a grease spot of Democracy throughout the nation. [Laughter.] But as a matter of fact we do not adopt our policy upon suggestions from Vermont.

Mr. GROUT. You might do so with propriety.

Mr. BRYAN. We adopt our policy as dictated from a higher source. The people spoke at the last election when they selected a Democratic House and a Democratic Executive. The policy of the Democratic party was well known to the people. The people throughout the country declared in favor of free wool and a reduction of the tariff, and the farmers want free wool because they can not be hoodwinked and deceived any longer, as these gentlemen seem to think. They understand the question better than they give them credit for.

Besides that, gentlemen seem to forget one very important fact. There is not one farmer in ten who raises sheep, and if he should succeed in carrying out his policy and compel the payment of a larger price for his wool, by having a protection upon it, of course the other nine farmers will be obliged to pay more for their wool, and an injustice is done to nine for the benefit of one. But the last election shows that the nine defeated the one farmer in the contest, and the men who wanted cheap woolen goods proved to be more numerous than those who wanted a tariff on wool.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. Then why keep it from them?

Mr. BRYAN. I would like to have it now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. Well, let us have it now.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman can not bring free wool too soon to suit me.

But, Mr. Chairman, we have got to recognize this fact, and this is one of the greatest objections to the protective system, that your industries depend on legislation instead of natural laws; they stand idle until they know what legislation is to be given to them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. Let us start them up now.

Mr. BRYAN. And it is not strange that the woolen industry should be standing still until they know what is to be done. They do not know whether this bill will pass the Senate or not, or what rates we will put on woolen goods, and they must necessarily stand still until they know, because their business depends on an act of legislation and not on natural laws; and, Mr. Chairman, I hope the time will soon come in this country when our industries will stand upon their own feet and not on laws; and when they will not stand in constant dread of legislation which they fear will have disastrous effects upon their business. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But I say, Mr. Chairman, we recognize the existing condition, and we have reported this amendment believing that, as we can not give the reduction at once, we had better state the time when we can give it to them. And, therefore, I reluctantly favor this amendment as the best thing we can do at this time. I regret that it postpones to the people of this country cheaper woolen goods, when they are paying 98 cents duty to-day——

Mr. BOWERS of California. Woolen goods were never so cheap as now.

Mr. BRYAN. When the gentleman talks about the interests of the farmer I wish he would plead more for the nine farmers who are wearing 98 per cent taxed woolen goods and not so much for the one farmer who is raising wool.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Will the gentleman allow me me just one questien?

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN] has expired.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great pleasure to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN], as I always do, and to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], and I have made up my mind to support, in the main, whatever the Committee on Ways and Means recommend to this House, because they have given the matter long, patient, industrious, intelligent, and earnest consideration, though this bill falls far below my expectations.

But, Mr. Speaker, I take inspiration from their own utterances to oppose what the gentleman proposes to this House.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that if the reason of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] is to apply, then it must be against himself, because he says that the reason this postponement should take place is that the mills will not begin until they have their orders in, in order that they may go to work. If, then, they will not begin their operations until their orders are in, there is no necessity to continue for the mills the extension of their protection until December, because their orders will be in upon all the wool they will buy between now and August; and it is a mistaken policy to extend to them until the fall, protection upon those things which they will have sold already before they begin in the spring or in the summer to make them.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I am interested not so much in how many blanket or woolen manufactories will remain at work, but I am much more interested in who will buy their products and what they will pay for them? Say there are 8,000,000 of people in this country interested in the making of them; there are 60,000,000 people interested in the buying of them; and I stand here for the 60,000,000 people against the 8,000,000 people who are interested in the manufacture.

Mr. Chairman, let me say that this law which is now in force is a Republican law; but if the Democrats extend it, they will make it to that extent a Democratic law, and the Democratic party should not give one breath of life to so infamous a system. Let me tell you, sir, that the declaration of the Democratic party has gone forth for free trade. This is but a voice crying in the wilderness——

Mr. REED. That is so. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. HUTCHESON. It tells you to prepare and to repent, and you had better take the warning. It tells you that the day of free trade or fair trade is at hand. We trust it may come without crucifixion. We hope that they will take the salvation we offer them without the necessity of draining the dregs of the cup; but if crucifixion should come, thank God it will be followed by a resurrection as glorious as any since the days of Calvary, and will give to the nations of this world a policy international, extended to Jew and Gentile, and not confined to the Judea of the Eastern manufacturers. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COFFEEN. Mr. Chaieman, I had not expected to speak upon this question of free wool, in the shape in which the amendments have now come, but it is as well to state our position now as at any other time. The discussion seems to take the shape, as usual, going into all the details of prices and times and seasons for the manufacturing interests of this country to make their profits. I want to say now that I verily believe the minds of more than two-thirds of the members of this House are confused as to what to do with the question as to free wool.

I want to say, further, in behalf of the people of Wyoming, whom I have the honor to represent, that it was not understood in that State that the Democratic platform demanded free wool; but, on the other hand, it was understood in that State throughout the campaign that a tariff for revenue was the emphatic and declared and essential element of the Democratic platform. And I want to say to my friends on this side of the House here, that in the case of wool—from which you have been receiving more revenue than from any two products put together—that you propose in this bill to strike from the tariff list and put on the free list, there is no tariff for revenue in that action; and I want, if I can, to help the gentlemen on this side of the House to get their minds clear upon this subject. If it is a tariff for revenue we want, then raise some of the revenue that ought to come to our Treasury upon wool, instead of putting wool on the free list and getting no revenue at all on wool imports. In other words, let us have a due and fair proportion of tariff for revenue purposes based on the wool product.

Now, another fact; it is curious that for some reason or other nearly all the farm products are termed "raw material." The very name you apply to the products of farms and mines is one that puts these industries to a disadvantage. I want to say to you on both sides of the House that I am not sure which side is responsible for the invention, but this term of "raw material" is an invention that misleads many minds. What is the raw material of one man is the finished product of another who produced it, and all of the farmers' products you have practially counted in the raw materials; and now under this misleading term you seek to put the products of the interior on the free list. That is wrong to the farmer, and you of the Democratic party must represent the farmers of the whole United States as well as the manufacturers of the Atlantic seaboard, if you expect to perpetuate yourselves in the favor of American people. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Let not the erring brethren on the Republican side be too prompt in searching for consolation in what I may say to my fellow-Democrats, for the Republican party has built up and fostered every monopoly of modern times as far as I know, and especially the tariff monopolies of the Atlantic seaboard. Therefore, I am in favor not only of a reasonable and proper tariff that is a revenue tariff on the woolen product of the South and West, but upon all their products, including those of the mines as well as the farm. I am surprised that we have not a better organization here in behalf of the interior products of this country than we have. It seems that those in favor of retaining a reasonable tariff on iron in some States, and in other States a reasonable tariff on coal, and in others those who are in favor of tariff for revenue on wool, as I am, with incidental protection to the producers, are without organization, and therefore vote against one another, when, instead of that, we should be in combination for the assistance of one another in looking after the fair treatment we should have toward the so-called raw materials produced in the interior of the country.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COFFEEN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he as a Democrat did not inform the intelligent Democracy of Wyoming that during the Fifty-second Congress the Democratic party well expressed its views upon the wool question by voting unanimously in favor of putting wool on the free list, and hence that must have been fully understood by them?

Mr. COFFEEN. I do not know what the gentleman's estimate of the proper management of a campaign might be, but I say that I held up at all times in contrast with your theories our theory of tariff for revenue: and I say right here and now, that I believe, in common with the Democracy of this country, that you on that side of the House from which this question is asked, have been subverting the very foundation principles of good government when you use the taxing power of the Government to take out of the pockets of one class to put into the pockets of another.

We can not therefore follow the Republican party on this question of protective tariffs as against revenue tariffs. One is to turn the Government into a commercial machine to guaranty profits to its favorites, the wealthy factory and mill owners, that are in such highly organized and associated conditions that they can command their servile tools in the Republican ranks to give them what they want. This is your protective system in its nakedness.

The other and Democratic doctrine, as I understand it, is to maintain the Government as a guaranty that all classes in all parts of the country, the poor, as well as the rich, shall be protected against unjust discriminations and special class legislation so that all may be subject only to such taxation as is necessary for revenue to support the Government for all legitimate purposes. This is freedom secured by just laws. The other borders on the verge of slavery.

Again, to you who would compel the many to pay constant tribute to the tariff monopolies, let me say that, practically, your McKinley tariff on wool, related as it is to your other higher protective and almost prohibitive duties on woolen goods, is either an excuse or a failure.

The very monopolies that you have built up along the seaboard have used their power to press down the price on domestic wool, and have so controlled the wool markets that our wool-growers last year were forced to take less for wool than ever before; that is, for the crop of 1892, before you had any chance to say it was the result of Democratic victories, for the Republican party was in power and McKinley tariffs at their highest point. These are the conditions under which wool fell to the lowest prices known up to that time.

And in 1893, with full knowledge that the McKinley tariffs would reign for another year, wool fell still lower, so that the people of the far West could not get even so much as the tariff duties on their wool, clearly showing that prices were governed by other forces than the rates of duty on imported wools.

Then, since the farmers have had nothing but reverses and falling prices on wool under the rule of the Republican tariffs, we will not be so blind as to look to that party to redeem prices.

I am, therefore, inclined to believe that changing the whole system to a revenue basis, reducing on wool and other interior products in the same proportion as we reduce tariff duties on the manufactured articles, will tend to restore the prices on wool to normal conditions, and I believe that will increase prices.

I am quite sure wool prices will rise if the manufacturers' corners on the markets for wool are broken. The trouble has been that wool-growers have been compelled to accept whatever the tariff-protected combines were willing to give them for several years. My position, therefore, is a fair-play revenue tariff on wool and all other competing products.

Another thing is clear to our people, that if the price on wool should remain as low under either free wool or a revenue tariff as it has fallen under the McKinley scheme, and sheep-raising in Wyoming should become so unprofitable as some would prophesy, that the vast herds of our sheep-owners should actually decrease, still, cattle will quickly take the place of such decrease in sheep and occupy our unfarmed plains and ranges. So that a check to the one industry will almost certainly stimulate the other, and no class of live stock can be more quickly converted than sheep into some other form of investment.

Besides this, there are many, perhaps a majority of the people of our State, who believe that the ranges, for general grazing purposes, are more quickly ruined for general purposes by sheep-herding than by any other means, and especially are there many small owners and settlers who desire to keep a few cattle and horses about them that fear to see too great an increase of sheep around their homes.

Therefore while we favor taking wool off the free list and giving it that incidental protection that would arise from a proper revenue tariff on wool, yet we do not stand as beggars before you for special favors. The people of my State are too proud and too sensible to take such a posture before you, and we will not give the tariff monopolies even the consolation of believing that they could injure us if they would in this question of free wool.

We have a free and enterprising and thrifty people in Wyoming. Our mountains are full of minerals of all kinds. We have oil-bearing strata full of petroleum, and lakes of soda and ledges of coal in greater abundance than almost any other region of like extent in the world.

Our valleys and plains under irrigation produce grains and vegetables that in both quality and quantity surprise all who behold them, and the people of Wyoming on these various products carried away from the World's Fair at Chicago, that greatest exhibit of comparative merits ever organized, a larger proportion of medals and prizes than any other equal number of people in the world.

We have established a constitution of the most progressive character, and uphold the law and the rights of settlers against all invaders from whatever source, and grant to our women absolute justice in the rights of property ownership, and absolute equality in the right of suffrage.

We look upon our beautiful mountains and feel as free and independent as they are.

We are not, therefore, in this Congress as beggars before you for a small favor in the shape of a tariff on wool, but only we demand fair play, which you should be as ready to grant to the sheep-owners of my State as we to ask it.

Does anyone ask me whether we will vote for the Wilson bill if we fail to get our proposed amendment?

We shall answer without the least hesitation that the Wilson bill should be supported whether our special and minor amendments are carried or not.

We shall rejoice to vote for it at an early day, and if the general reductions all along the line were still greater, we should vote for it still more heartily.

What we may lose in Wyoming on account of wool being carried to the free list, if that shall be the final outcome of this debate, we shall gain many times over in the great reductions made in woolen goods alone.

The tariff under the present McKinley law on goods made wholly or in part of wool is reduced from an estimated average of 90 per cent ad valorem to 45 per cent under the pending bill. I have sold goods in Wyoming for the last nine years, and I believe $40 per capita is a fair estimate of the per capita expenditures in our State for all this class of goods under former prices. We use a very much larger proportion of woolen goods in our climate than many other States. We shall save about $10 per capita (or $50 per family of five persons) on an average by the reduced prices on these goods if this bill carries. This will be so great a saving to our 75,000 people that it far outweighs any difference in price that can arise on our wool product as prices now exist. And again these benefits go to the poorest and humblest of our citizens.

If $750,000 is thus saved by the passage of the Wilson bill to our people on the woolen-goods schedule alone, still greater is the saving by tariff reductions and consequent lower prices on all kinds of goods provided for in the bill. And do you ask me again how the deficiency in revenue shall be made good if any shall arise? We answer for our people without any doubt as to their views on this that we would raise it by an income tax.

We do not believe that it will cripple or ruin the rich men of our country whose incomes are yearly over $4,000 if they shall be called upon to pay 2 per cent tax on their incomes above that amount.

We believe men ought to pay taxes according to their abilities and out of their surplus incomes rather than tax the necessities of the people. We are willing that this entire system of tariff monopolies and restricted and unfair trade should hasten to oblivion if you can establish in its place a properly graduated income tax, trusting that by this means the toilers of this land may be relieved from bearing the unjust burdens of taxation that they have too long and too patiently borne thus far. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. HALL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I have said on this floor sometime ago, that so far as the interests of the farmer of the United States are concerned, from the standpoint I take, he is of all men the man who wants a clear field and a fair fight. I believe there is no class of men in the United States who come as near bearing the entire burdens of the protective tariff as the agricultural class. The reason I believe it is on account of that well settled and fairly announced principle laid down first by Adam Smith, where he says, "No one bears the burden of taxation if he can throw it off in what he calls the 'higgle and barter of trade.'"

I believe the farmer is the only one who buys all that he has to buy in a protected market and sells what he has to sell at the price fixed in a free-trade market; therefore I am on principle in favor of cutting it down as rapidly as possible and cutting it down as low as possible. But we must recognize the fact that the Committee on Ways and Means, or the majority members of it, are of the same opinion that we are upon that question. They have dealt with this subject, and we Democratic members ought certainly to sympathize with them, and recognize the fact that they have gone into these questions under great and trying difficulties. They proposed and have brought forth this bill, and after they have labored as hard as these gentlemen have labored we ought to stand by them.

Therefore I insist upon this proposition: While this particular item may appear against the interests of the agriculturists as a single proposition, yet when coupled with the other propositions I intend to vote for this measure, believing it infamous, as I do, because we know it is incomplete, and not as full as the majority members of the committee would desire, yet it is one thing to have a measure which we can vote for at all, and you can not take the duty off all things immediately and at once; and for that reason I think it is the duty of every Democrat on this side to stand by this committee on this matter of wool as well as on all others.

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment proposed to extend the time until the 1st of October, 1898, for two reasons. First, it will permit the people of this country to reverse the verdict which they have entered; that reversal to take place in two elections, one in 1894 and the other in 1896. [Laughter.] Second, it will permit the sheep-growers of this country, in the event it is determined that free wool shall obtain, to dispose of their flocks and herds within a reasonable period, and not force them all into the market at once, thus reducing prices.

It has been asserted that under a free-wool policy the price of wool will be raised, and that under a tariff the price of wool has not been increased in this country. I desire to state a few facts that are worth more to our people than all the theories that can emanate from all the free-trade brains in this House. Take my own State. We are immediately south of and adjacent to Canada. An imaginary line separates the two countries, the one from the other. We have exactly the same kind of soil on the one side of that line as on the other. We produce the same kind of nutritious grasses in Montana that are produced in Canada. The sheep in Montana drink at the same streams as the sheep in Canada; the same sun shines on the sheep in the one country as in the other.

Now, in 1892 the wool-growers of Montana received for their wool, of exactly the same quality as that which was raised by their Canadian brethren on the other side of the line, from 15 to 23 cents a pound, while just across the line the Canadian wool-grower received from 10 to 12 cents a pound. [Applause on the Republican side.] What was the reason for that? Exactly the same conditions of climate, of food, of quality, of market, entered into the problem, yet the wool-grower on the one side of the line received from 15 to 23 cents per pound for his product, and on the other side the farmer received from 10 to 12 cents.

What was the reason of it? The reason was simply this, that the protective tariff compelled the Canadian farmer when he came to our line to put down his good 11 cents a pound for the privilege of coming into our market and selling his wool to our people. That and nothing else was the cause.

Let me go to another point. I recollect distinctly that on the 27th day of last August the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. WILSON of West Virginia] rose in his place upon this floor and told the House and the country that if we would only pass the Wilson bill, repealing the "infamous purchasing clause of the Sherman law," prosperity would again knock at every man's door, the spindles would whirl again in every factory in the land, mines would be unsealed, industry would stalk forth in all its manhood, and labor would receive employment in every part of the land.

I wonder if that prophecy ever comes to disturb the dreams of the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia? I wonder if to-day, when he predicts such beneficial results from the pending bill—this second iniquity of which he is the father—I wonder, I say, if he recollects the prophetic pictures that were so beautifully portrayed by him when he was urging upon this House that very measure? I wonder, after all, whether he is a prophet, or the son of a prophet, or only the mouthpiece of the stuffed prophet of Buzzard's Bay? [Great laughter and applause].

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, speaking to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, the first suggestion that arises is this: Too much on both sides of this Chamber has the amendment proposed by the Ways and Means Committee been treated as a matter of tariff. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] on that side, and two or three gentlemen on this side, have emphasized the real point in the matter, and it is that while it would be better for the farmer if free wool went into operation on the 1st day of February next, yet, in consideration of the woolen business as established by seasons and by customs, unless the tariff can go into operation at the beginning of either one season or another the question becomes one not of tariff but of supply and demand.

Whatever may be the Democratic principle in handling the tariff, I trust that we all upon both sides of the Chamber agree that we should so arrange our legislation as to promote the demand for every American product. In regard to the importance of the effect of this legislation upon the consumer, I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUTCHESON]. But, sir, the situation is this. No one expects that this bill can possibly go into operation before April or May.

Now, under the substitute of the gentleman from Ohio, the result would be that we would have an enforced paralysis of the woolen mills of this country until the date was fixed, paralyzed by uncertainty affecting the question of supply and demand.

As to the consumer, the result upon him would be simply this: We manufacture and consume so large a proportion of the world's woolen goods that if you put the manufactures of this country into paralysis for any considerable number of months, you so reduce the supply of woolen goods in the world that, after you have gotten your free woolen goods, you will have to pay more for them than you did before. The only way in which we can get the full advantage of the reduced rates upon woolen goods is meanwhile to keep our own manufactures in such lively employment that there shall be a sufficient amount of woolen goods to meet the demand when we have free woolen goods.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Does the same thing apply to other branches of manufacture?

Mr. WARNER. It applies to every manufacture that is under similar conditions to those of the wool business; but if the gentleman knows any such I wish he would so state.

Now, the chairman of the committee has suggested that he proposes to follow up this amendment with a proposition fixing an interval of four months before the time when the rate on woolen goods shall go into effect. I agree that if that time were fixed six months later our manufacturers would get a large share of the profits. But every day that we cut off from a six months' interval means that they must either lose a part of their market or else must compete in furnishing Americans with goods as cheaply as they will be able to get them elsewhere a few months later.

I wish the time could be fixed at an earlier date; I wish the tariff were cut down to 25 per cent; but the one thing we must not do is to force a paralysis of business and thereby not merely deny our farmers a market for their wool, but deny to our people the supply of woolen goods which can only come through the maintenance of our manufactures, and upon the abundance of which supply must depend the fulfillment of any hope they have of promptly getting the effect of tariff reductions upon woolen goods.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, the complaint is frequently made on this floor by gentlemen on the other side that the farmer buys the articles that he consumes in a protective market, and sells his products in a free and open market. The gentleman from Missouri who a short time ago took his seat, and who, I understand, is a farmer, as I am, complains of the Republican legislation which compelled him and his compatriots in that business to sell their goods in a free market and buy their supplies in a protected market.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is what is the matter.

Mr. MARSH. I believe I have stated their position correctly on that question. Is that statement correct?

Several MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. MARSH. Now, the policy and the purpose of protective legislation has been to give to the farmers of this country a protected market, and not require them to depend upon a free-trade market. Hence the duty in the McKinley bill upon barley; and the farmer who produces barley has found in this country a protected market. Hence the duties in the McKinley bill upon live stock; and under the protective duties of that bill the American farmer has found a market for his live stock.

Mr. MOSES. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MARSH. And under the protective features of that bill every industry in this country in which the farmer is directly interested has found a protected market at home for its products. Now, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOSES (rising with a book in his hand). You speak about the protection to barley. Did you know that the Wilson bill——

Mr. MARSH. If you are going to read from a pamphlet I will not yield.

Mr. MOSES. Did you know that the Wilson bill——

Mr. MARSH. If you can ask me a question without reading it out of a book, I will answer it.

Mr. MOSES (laying down the book). You speak about the protection to the raisers of barley. Did you know that the Wilson bill gives 4 per cent more protection to the raisers of barley than the McKinley bill?

Mr. MARSH. I know that it does not; and any man who knows how to read, and will read the two bills knows that it does not.

Mr. MOSES. Let the Clerk read the provisions of the two bills.

Mr. MARSH. You can have them read in your own time. I can show you that under the McKinley duty upon barley the importation of barley into this country was largely reduced. From 11,000,000 bushels of importation from Canada it was reduced in 1893 to about 3,000,000 bushels. And the importation of barley malt was reduced under the operation of the McKinley bill from nearly $400,000 worth to 19 cents worth in 1893.

Now, I was going to say, Mr. Chairman, that the design and effect of the McKinley protective tariff bill upon farmers' products was to give a home market for those products. But gentlemen on the other side refer to the operation of the duty on wheat. That duty has not yet inured to the benefit of the American farmer; but wait awhile, Mr. Chairman. Give us the existing law with its protective features operating upon wheat, and in a little while the farmers of this country will raise barley instead of wheat, when you have shut out the fifteen or twenty millions of barley that Canada has been sending into this country.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, when the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means proposed this amendment to-day, accompanied with his explanation of it, I was inclined to give it my support. The chairman of the committee, however, was apparently somewhat reluctant in offering the amendment. He did not offer it, he stated, until after long consideration and careful inquiry into the matter, so that there seems to have been some doubt in the minds of the committee as to the propriety of the action proposed.

Now, sir, it was stated by the chairman of the committee that it was expected this bill would go into operation by the 1st of March, when it was first framed, and hence the bill was reported in its present form. But in view of the fact that we can not at this time fix the date at which it may pass Congress and become a law therefore this change must be made.

I insist, sir, that we are anticipating too much. As a matter of course if the amendment is adopted, no matter if the bill does take effect by the last of March or the 1st of April, we have given the manufacturer the benefit of this amendment. I say I do not believe we are warranted in anticipating that. This bill will pass this House during this month; the Senate will have a month or six weeks, or even two months to consider it, and in time, so far as the manufacturers are concerned; and I do not think we ought to adopt the amendment by extending the date of its going into effect two or three months longer than the time it takes to pass the bill.

Now, sir, wool is cheap at the present time, like every commodity in this country, by reason of causes that I need not now stop to name. We hope and anticipate that the time will come soon after the passage of the bill that prices may begin to rise; when wool and everything else will improve in value. But we can not anticipate that these prices will rise before the wool clip that comes off next May, and before the farmer can put his wool on the market and sell it. This amendment would force him to sell at a lower price.

The tariff on wool—I can not speak from knowledge—but I think it does not exceed probably 30 per cent, and we have given the manufacturers an average of about 40 per cent, if I understand the protection covered by this bill. So that to some extent they are protected by the bill itself against the tariff on wool. And if I had my way with the bill, I would so frame it as to reduce the tariff on woolen goods down to not more than 25 per cent, agreeing with the gentleman from New York in that regard, and I certainly think that they can manufacture at 25 per cent with free wool. They can resume work in the mills at once, even if the tariff on wool remains as it is for a short time, with the assurance of free wool in the future, and especially with cheap wool at home.

Now, I expect to support this bill. It is not such a bill as I would like. I would like to see the tariff duties reduced all along the line lower than it is on manufactured products, and especially on woolen goods. I think the woolen manufacturer has benefits in the bill far beyond the necessities of his case, and when they ask me to postpone the date at least one year when the benefit of cheaper clothing will come to the people, I must decline, and in justice to what I believe to be the best interests of the masses of the people, vote against it.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I must confess that the range the debate has taken has tended to mystify my mind, and no doubt the minds of many others on this floor, but I believe I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from New York, because it comes closest to my views, though I am free to say that I am more in favor of present conditions.

I have watched with considerable interest the scene that has taken place on the other side of the Chamber this afternoon. We have seen first the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOHNSON] planting himself firmly upon the back of the free-trade horse, saying that he wants free trade not in the future, but that he wants it now, and riding him rapidly around the ring with varying success; then rises the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARNER], for the time endeavoring to ride the protection horse, just for a few minutes only, in the interest of his constituents; and then my friend from Wyoming [Mr. COFFEEN] rises in his place and endeavors to perform the same act on the back of the tariff-for-revenue animal. He ought well to have known what the policy of the Democratic party has been for many years on the wool question. If there is any one question in the world upon which there is no doubt as to where the Democrats stand it is upon the question of free wool, and as a citizen of his State he should have informed the people of the true condition, and not have deluded them.

But I am reminded now of the scene that took place in this House near the close of the session yesterday; and it seems to me that the time has arrived when the Democratic party must again call into its midst that gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN]; who so gallantly rushed to the front into the circus ring—I was going to say as the clown, but out of respect for him shall not use the words—but will say assuming the position of ringmaster, planted his feet on the free-trade horse, with the reigns of the tariff-for-revenue horse on one side and the high-protective animal on the other, rode round and round the ring arousing the plaudits of the multitude; faster and faster he rode amid the cheers of the galleries, lightly stepping from one to the other, finally dismounting and handing the reins to one of his chosen suit, he smilingly exclaims, See how easy it is to ride three horses when you have learned and practiced in the proper school. Show me if you can the party, be he Populist, Democrat, or Republican, who can excel me in this direction. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I can add anything to the strong and plain statement in regard to this amendment made by the chairman of the committee [Mr. WILSON of West Virginia]; but I consider this a very important matter, and it has given the Ways and Means Committee, or at least the Democratic members of that committee, a great deal of anxious thought, and it has received at our hands the most careful investigation.

There are two items in the bill about which the question of the date of enactment requires special consideration.

Gentlemen will observe that the duty upon tin plate, for instance, is made to take effect upon the 1st of October. That question, like this question, is purely a business matter, wholly disconnected from any question of rates. Whatever might be our action, whether we levy a rate upon tin plate and a rate upon woolen goods, or whether we were to put them upon the free list, we would still have to consider this particular question of dates in regard to these two items. Now, why did we make the reduction upon tin plate go into effect upon the 1st of October and not upon the date of the enactment of the bill? For this reason: That in the very large fruit and vegetable canning industries of this country they make their cans during the winter and spring.

We were unable to guarantee that the reduced rates on tin would take effect before the period for making these cans had expired. People would not make cans out of high-taxed tin, to be used in competition with those who could can their fruit and vegetables with low-taxed tin. Therefore we would necessarily close until our bill became a law, or until late in the season, every can-manufacturing establishment in the country, whether we put tin at a reduced rate or put it upon the free list, unless we deferred the operation of our proposed legislation until after the canning season, thus securing the consumption of the cans that would be made under the high rate. That is a plain business proposition, and I submit to gentlemen if it is not wiser, in launching the ship which we are launching, to do it in an easy and logical way, instead of trying to break as many timbers as possible.

Now, the question of wool is on all fours with that. I am as anxious as anybody on this floor to give relief to the people, and to give relief to the industries of this country as quickly as possible. There is no gentleman here who looks forward with a warmer hope than I do to the time when we can have not only free wool, but free woolen goods. There is no gentleman in this House who is a more ardent free trader than I am. But we must be considerate when we are changing an existing condition. There is not a rate upon anything, except a few luxuries, in this bill which, if we were at the beginning of the system and called upon to enact legislation, I would not oppose. You would have none of these rates with my vote if we were at the other end of the system. But we are repealing, and we must regard existing conditions.

Now, the woolen business divides itself into two seasons. They begin with the 1st of January to manufacture goods that are to be consumed the following autumn and winter. They should manufacture these goods during the present winter and coming spring. Now, unless the manufacturers are permitted to sell the goods under conditions corresponding with those under which they make them of course they will not manufacture them at all.

[The time of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas having expired, on motion of Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. I thank the gentleman and the committee for this kindness. The manufacturer knows perfectly well that if he is compelled to manufacture out of taxed wool, and then to sell such goods in competition with goods that have been made out of untaxed wool, a very heavy and ruinous loss will fall upon him. What would you do under such circumstances? You would do what I would do, or what any man would do, for the proposition is obvious. As a matter of course the manufacturer would under those circumstances close down his mill. If we could have given free wool on the 1st of January, have promised this reduction on woolen goods to go into effect, say, late in the spring, it would have been an ideal adjustment of the dates.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Is not wool to-day lower than it ever has been in its entire history, and is it not cheap enough for a manufacturer to buy in competition with foreign wool?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. The gentleman must view the question of prices relatively.

Mr. HUTCHESON. I hope the gentleman will answer my question.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. I will answer the question, and I will broaden it a little. Some grades of American wool are, I believe, as cheap if not cheaper than the same grades of wool abroad. Perhaps all grades are, but we do not know that. It is a question of dispute, and, what is more potent, it is a question of doubt. I think our wool, as a whole, will not fall; but there are hundreds of classes of wool, and no one, so far as I know, can speak with confidence of the price of all of them. But we manufacture also a great deal of woolen goods out of imported wool, and that is not as cheap here as it is abroad by the full amount of the tax. Therefore, our manufacturers are forced by existing law, which we are powerless immediately to repeal, to manufacture for next fall under present conditions. If the fall market is not secured for the manufacturers and merchants so as to protect them from these onerous conditions, they will not load up with the goods. If that loss is to be located on them, as a matter of course they will not go into the transaction. They suffer. But they do not suffer except from a temporary stoppage, while the laboring man suffers——

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. And the American wool-grower.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. And the wool-grower also suffers, because you stop the demand for American wool, and when my friend from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] speaks of a hasty policy in regard to this he drives the rowels of his spurs into the flanks of the workingmen, whom we can not save from suffering except in the way the committee proposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. Tell us something about the interest of the consumer; we have not heard that discussed by the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. I will, with a great deal of pleasure. The consumer, if such an amendment as my friend from Ohio proposes should be adopted, would get cheaper goods a few months earlier. But of course the future will be anticipated considerably by dealers, and this benefit is consequently somewhat exaggerated. There is no question about that, but I ask you to consider two things. Would that compensate for the loss to the wool-grower in the demand for his wool in the spring, and would it compensate for the temporary but acute suffering that would be forced thereby on the wage-workers of the woolen mills?

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. Yes, unless free wool is wrong.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. It is not a question of free wool or of free goods. It is a question of how to put free wool and lower rates on woolen goods into operation. It is a question of the adjustment of the dates to the usages and needs of business. That is where gentlemen make a mistake in treating this particular question of dates in this particular industry with its special seasons for work and sales as a question of free wool and considering the merits of the question of the tax on goods and the merits of the tax on wool in this connection. This thing you would have to do if the provision were made for free wool and free goods, because we must preserve the market to the manufacturer until he exhausts those goods that existing law forced him to make of wool that paid a tax, or else he will not make them during that period at all.

Now that we have fought this great fight for tariff reform through all these years, and at last acquired the great power intrusted to us, is it wise, is it right for us to enter upon any part of our great work in a punitive spirit? Should we go at our great work considerately, or like a man who tries to mend a watch with an ax? And I say to our friends that while the Committee on Ways and Means came to this conclusion reluctantly, for we earnestly desire earlier results, yet let it be understood that after the most exhaustive consideration we came to this conclusion firmly; and we ask our friends to stand by us. We want to do what is right, and this is the wise, proper, and right thing to do. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to members of the Committee on Ways and Means on this question, and I do not want any better argument than they furnish for putting wool on the free list at once. They say there is a stagnation in business, and that doubt and uncertainty will keep the factories longer idle. Remove this doubt and uncertainty the first minute you can do so, and that will be the minute when the bill goes into effect. You can not do it any sooner than that, or my amendment would have provided for the earlier date.

The manufacturers want free wool quickly. Why not take advantage of the influence of their lobby, a power that we have felt exerting itself upon our committee in a wrong direction (that is to make the bill worse), by the adoption of the substitute I propose, which makes wool free as soon as the bill is passed? The influence of the lobby then will be in the direction of hurrying up the Senate, which is not noted for acting quickly. This influence will then be in the direction of saving time to the people.

Why does the committee propose December 1 as the date for lowering the duties on woolen goods? The only effect I can see will be to maintain monopoly prices longer. You who are in favor of free wool and lower duties on woolen goods in the interests of the consumers should use every effort to bring both changes about quickly. If the committee have, as I believe, made a great blunder in proposing this amendment and the one to follow, it is the duty of the Democratic members of this House to vote down the amendments. It is more important that we should act courageously than that we should make a display of courtesy to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Chairman, there is little inspiration to an advocate in a case who is informed in advance by the court that a judgment has already been entered against him. Therefore we as protectionists have not much occasion for enthusiasm on this side, when it is known in advance what will be the fate of this measure, though we may present the most conclusive reasoning and the most favorable showing in support of our opposition to it; but, sir, it is at least, limited as it is, some consolation to know that an opportunity is offered us now and here, through this House and to the American people to enter our earnest protest against the injury which is about to be inflicted upon so large a portion of our own people, and upon such an immense proportion of their wealth. There is satisfaction also in another direction, Mr. Chairman, in knowing that at last the veil has been cast aside, and we are to have this issue presented for the first time as an issue should always be presented in its true and real meaning.

In former years we have been deceived by appeals upon this question on the part of the free trader, in his argument to the wool-growing interest of this country, by the statement that placing wool on the free list would be an advantage to him, that as the duty was lowered it would produce a corresponding increase in the price of his wool, and would have a tendency to raise the price of wool in the American market in proportion as foreign wool was reduced in price by reduced duties; also, that it would have another effect, namely, to give the American manufacturer an opportunity to import the foreign wools necessary for the production of many fabrics by admixture with our domestic wools; that all this would increase the manufacturer's market and wool would rise.

This humbug appeal has been exposed. The consumer now hears but one argument—that wool must be free, that the manufacturer may have a better opportunity; that this country can not produce many of the grades required. I hold in my hand the hearings of the Ways and Means Committee of this Congress, where several of the ablest experts of American woolen manufactures appeared and testified that even the last assumption to which I have referred is fallacious; that this country is able and has been able in times past to produce wools of the necessary quality required for admixture with the majority of American wools to produce the finest fabrics worn by civilized mankind, and that it is able to produce and has been able to produce a sufficient quantity of those wools under sufficient protection. Mr. Chairman, now the appeal is addressed to the American people in behalf of the reduction of duty upon the ground that it decreases the price of wearing apparel to the consumer. The whole argument is that by destroying the American wool industry, now embracing 50,000,000 sheep and yielding over $100,000,000 annual income to our own people, we shall have cheaper clothes! They say this will be an immense benefit.

It is obvious, however, that a special fallacy accompanies this argument as to the extent of that reduction. Admitting that there would be a reduction of price in one point of view, what would be its extent? Upon this question I call particular attention to testimony which will be found in the report of the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee. Mr. Justice, of Philadelphia, probably one of the most profound students of the wool industry in this country, on examination before that committee most completely exposed the free trader, and demonstrated the extravagance and real falsity of his statement. Mr. BRECKINRIDGE put to him the free trader's familiar position by saying:

I suppose the farmers in the older States where farms and flocks are small have to pay more protection on the woolen goods purchased for their families than they receive in protection on the wool they sell. The difference in this tariff tax would be a losing business to them, would it not?

Mr. Justice answered:

I do not think so. For instance this suit of clothes—

Pointing to his own suit—contains 3 pounds of wool. If we had free wool, the woolen goods in it would probably cost 90 cents. Under the McKinley law as at first proposed it would cost $1.80. The farmer who wears a suit of clothes like this pays 90 cents more under the McKinley bill than if he had sold his free wool in London.

Mr. Justice further testifies that there is an average among the farmers of Ohio of about 200 sheep per capita, that the sheep will yield about 5 pounds of wool each—that is, about 1,000 pounds for the flock; that in scouring the shrinkage will be one-half, leaving 500 pounds of scoured wool.

Now, if the farmer sells that wool at 60 cents he gets $300 for his scoured wool, but if he sells it in London at the free-trade price he gets only $150. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] put to the witness this interrogatory: "You are not prepared to say whether the farmer makes or loses by the tariff on the wool schedule?" To which the witness made this significant answer: "The wool [for two suits for four in family] in free-trade clothes saves him $7.80 and reduces his income $150." Mr. BRECKINRIDGE said: "That is based on the calculation you have just given." Mr. Justice says: "Because you take the ground that you are not going to reduce the wages of labor." This suit given as a sample was one costing $27 at wholesale, at retail not less than $30, and the wool cost was 90 cents. Now, take a suit costing $13.50 and the wool cost to the consumer would be about 45 cents, and this on a most comfortable wool suit. This is the enormous sacrifice he makes for protection!

I want to call particularly to this point the attention of gentlemen upon the other side who are assuming to be the especial champions of the poor consumer, and who have magnified the cost imposed upon him by protection without at the same time reminding him of the innumerable advantages conferred upon him by the protection policy. And while deceiving the people in this way assurances have been given to the laborers of the country, and to the operatives in the woolen factories of our country, that whatever might be the fate of wool, whether it went up or down, but especially if it went down by reduced duties, there should be no diminution in their wages. I want that particularly to go out to the country, and let the workingmen take the one proposition with the other.

The very most that can be expected in the way of reduction in the price of a superior suit of woolen clothes is 90 cents, and that "All wool and a yard wide." There are, as I have said, many compensating considerations which will far more than outweigh the 90 cents, but my limited time will not permit me to present them to the committee. In conclusion, I desire again to protest in the name of one-half of the population of that far-distant State on the western confines of the Republic, which I have the honor in part to represent, which population is most extensively interested in wool growing, and who see before them a sacrifice of their flocks, now yielding an annual revenue of $4,000,000, and the abandonment of vast acres of pasture lands no longer suitable for other purposes. They have come before us in memorials, in petitions, through chambers of commerce, through boards of trade and through oral appeals they have beseeched the Representatives of the American people in this Chamber to respect not only the important interest of the wool-grower, but also the many other interests which are directly and indirectly connected with that industry.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, I have been inclined to subordinate to some extent my own opinions upon this subject in order to follow the lead of the Committee on Ways and Means. I must confess that in agreeing to vote for the bill I am compelled to concede something of my own opinions because this bill does not go far enough and it does not go fast enough in the direction of free trade. Some of the advocates of protection have been appealing to us to do something to protect the farmer. I answer that appeal, as the representative of an agricultural district, by saying that I want to protect the farmer against protection. That is the only protection the farmer needs. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] insist that this bill ought not to pass because it gives no protection to the farmer. Mr. Chairman, if there is any class in this country which does not want any legislation in its favor to protect it, that class is the farmer class.

Mr. SIMPSON. That is, the farmer ought to be in a condition not to need protection?

Mr. ENLOE. The only protection the farmer needs is protection which would consist in the repeal of the laws which impose unjust and unequal burdens on him. He only wants an equal opportunity in life under the law.

Mr. SIMPSON. That is right.

Mr. ENLOE. And when we give him that, we have done everything that legislation can do for that class of labor. But we have professional farmers here. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], who said this morning that he wanted to raise his voice in behalf of the farmer, is the representative of such farmers as spoke at a meeting in New York which I find reported in the New York Press of Saturday, January 13.

Mr. SIMPSON. Wall street farmers!

Mr. ENLOE. That meeting included in its membership a number of persons who had assembled to protest against the passage of this bill.

Speaking for the hatters of the United States, one of those men, Walter Bates, spoke as follows: "I've been through the South, and I know that you don't see a factory there in a day's ride. Then why on earth do they have Southern Congressmen to legislate for workingmen? Why do they go down and get these goose farmers to make laws for us? They are experts in raising peanuts and cotton. They don't know what a workingman wants." That is the kind of a farmer the gentleman from New York represents. A man who denounces farmers as ignorant geese, because they protest against being picked any longer by the tools and slaves of corporations and monopolies.

No doubt a district which produces more Wall street Bulls and Bears than any other agricultural product entertains the opinion that we do not know what the workingman wants. Those of us who come from agricultural districts can speak for the farmers. We voice their wants and their will. Let the gentleman content himself as a spokesman for the protected industries which he represents.

The term "laboring man" has become a technical term, and the construction placed upon it by the advocates of protection is that no man is a laboring man unless he works somewhere sheltered from the sun.

Mr. Chairman, I speak for a class of laborers in this country who work out in the open sunshine, the noblest, the bravest, the most patriotic class of men in this or any other country. They rise in the morning with the sun, and work until the sun sets. There is no eight-hour law to limit their hours of toil. Yet, certain workingmen in the cities who get a much greater compensation for their labor than farm laborers in this country receive, and who work little more than half the time that the farmers work, have the impudence to say that the "goose" farmers do not know what the laboring men of this country want. These "protected" laborers, who are thrown out of employment under the highest rate of protection this country has ever known, are not competent critics of the intelligence of the farmers, and will not be, so long as they demand that this state of affairs shall continue, and are content to exist by the grace and favor of the lords of trust and monopoly, who rob both producers and consumers in the name of the laboring man. Protection has made labor in the protected industries the poor, destitute, and discontented slave of capital.

Hunger and despair unsettle reason. The slave whose cries for work and bread are heard above the rattle of his chains deserves pity rather than rebuke. The meetings of workingmen to protest against their emancipation from such a bondage are the strongest appeal to the American people to hasten the hour of their deliverance.

Now, let us see what the McKinley bill has done for the farmers of this country. You say it afforded protection to the farmer on corn. I will take for illustration the statistics as to corn, wheat, oats, and meat products as among the principal farm products of this country, exclusive of cotton. Under the former tariff law there was imported in 1889, 2,401 bushels of corn. We then had a duty of 10 cents a bushel on corn. The McKinley bill placed the duty at 15 cents a bushel, and in 1892 we imported 15,290 bushels. In 1889 we imported under a tax of 10 cents a bushel on oats 22,310 bushels of oats. In 1892, under a tax of 15 cents a bushel, we imported 20,208 bushels. In 1889, with a tax of 20 cents a bushel on wheat, we imported 130,649 bushels, and in 1892, under the McKinley tax of 25 cents a bushel, we imported 2,459,602 bushels. So high taxes did not decrease importations. We did not, I believe, import any meat products in either year. Now, let us look at the exports. We exported in 1892, 41,590,460 bushels of corn, yet you say that the man who raises corn needs protection against the foreign producer. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] wanted to protect the corn-raisers of Illinois.

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. ENLOE. I do not want to stir up a cyclone. If the gentleman will be moderate——

Mr. MARSH. The gentleman ought not to refer to me and then not have the manliness to allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. ENLOE. I have the "manliness" to do it, if the gentleman has the politeness to interrupt in a polite way. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARSH. I do ask you in a polite way.

Mr. ENLOE. Well, proceed with the question; what is it?

Mr. MARSH. I have almost forgotten now what it was.

Mr. ENLOE. When the gentleman thinks of it I will yield to him.

Mr. MARSH. I will give it to you now: Will you not state to the committee the number of live stock imported into this country previous to the McKinley bill and the number imported since that time?

Mr. ENLOE. Well, that is a very insignificant item. I could furnish it to the gentleman in a moment, but my time is limited. He knows how to read and can find it for himself.

Mr. MARSH. I want you to put that in alongside of your wheat statistics.

Mr. ENLOE. I know that the shoe pinches the gentleman, because his argument is not tenable.

In the matter of oats, we imported in 1892, 20,208 bushels; and we exported 3,842,559 bushels. Take the article of wheat, which the McKinley bill protected with a duty of 25 cents a bushel, so that the American wheat-grower might not be obliged to compete with the wheat-grower of India. In 1892 we imported of this article 2,459,612 bushels, and we exported 161,000,000 bushels.

Now, do you think that the farmers of this country who raised the 161,000,000 bushels of wheat are suffering from want of protection against the 2,459,612 bushels of seed wheat which we imported into this country last year? Their surplus product was sold in open competition with the wheat-growers of the world.

Another of the principal agricultural products is meat. The beef cattle and the hogs raised by our farmers are slaughtered and the products are exported in the form of beef, pork, bacon, lard, and tallow. We have a duty on those products; yet in 1892 not a pound of meat product was imported into the United States, so far as I have been able to find from the statistics. We exported in 1892, $34,436,169 worth of beef products and $85,116,566 worth of hog products.

Corn, oats, wheat, and meat products constitute the bulk of the agricultural products represented by the gentleman who comes from the great agricultural State of Illinois. They constitute the bulk of agricultural products in the West and the Southwest. I am not astonished that a professional farmer in Vermont should write a letter to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] proposing to punish the Democratic party because the McKinley bill has put the price of wool down, as he admits, from 22 cents to 11 cents a pound. That farmer is about as wise as are the laboring men who protest against the modification of the McKinley bill, which has brought panic and stagnation upon the country and installed the gaunt specters of hunger and want as familiar guests at the firesides of millions of working men and working women throughout the land.

Though this bill is not such a bill as ought to be passed, it is perhaps better in its present shape than the bill we will be able to pass. I think it is the best we can do to stand by the Committee of Ways and Means and speed its passage through this House. When we can not get what we want we must take the best we can get. It is a step in the right direction.

Mr. Chairman, I might make an argument similar to the argument so familiar to us here. I have thought it would be well to illustrate the absurdity of attempting to frame a bill to suit every protected local interest. I might protest against this bill because it puts iron and coal on the free list, I might protest because it puts eggs on the free list. The McKinley bill took eggs off the free list and put a tax of 5 cents a dozen on them. We ought by all means to protect the American hen from competition with foreign hens—the "pauper" hens of Europe. They ought not to be allowed to compete with the mothers of our Democratic roosters. Under the fostering care of the McKinley law our American hens have laid all other hens in the shade. They have brought great distress on the hens of other countries and greatly discouraged all efforts at competition, and it stands to their credit that we produced the largest crop of Democratic roosters in 1892 that was ever known in our history. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, I suppose, notwithstanding these persuasive facts, that a large industry in my district will have to be suspended, I will vote for the bill nevertheless, and trust to the patriotic pride of our hens to sustain their reputation against all comers.

I will say, in conclusion, seriously, Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in the argument of protectionists, who claim to represent the farmer, that this bill discriminates against him, because the statistics show that the McKinley bill afforded him no protection against competition, and the prices of his products have steadily declined since it passage. These facts are indisputably true, and no amount of sophistry and misrepresentation can change them. The farmers understand their interests in this matter and they will not be misled.

The argument that the passage of this bill will destroy our industries and diminish the opportunities of labor for profitable employment is the invention of those who have grown rich on the profits of class legislation. The alleged facts used are made to order, and the arguments based upon them are a tissue of fallacy and deception. I have been ready and anxious to vote on this bill since the day it was reported. What the country wants is action. The sooner we can have it the better for the country and the better for the Democratic party.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee has referred to the imports of corn and of some other farm articles into the United States since the passage of the McKinley law. I notice that he omitted any allusion to the imports of barley, and as he has forgotten it I want to call his attention and the attention of the committee to the facts. In 1884, according to a statement which I hold in my hand, and furnished by a malting company of the city of Milwaukee, we imported 8,593,902 bushels of barley of the value of $5,919,965, and the quantity increased somewhat until 1891, after the McKinley law had taken effect, when we imported only 5,076,471 bushels, of the value of $3,221,189; in 1892 we imported but about 3,000,000 bushels of barley, of the value of $1,591,000; and in 1893 only $921,000 worth of barley was imported, giving the market almost entirely to the farmers of the United States.

Mr. ENLOE. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield for a question.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. I can not yield in my limited time.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I wish to ask the gentleman if the price of home barley has gone up to the home raiser since the passage of the McKinley bill?

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois (continuing). I recollect, Mr. Chairman, (I can not yield to the interruption of the gentleman from Kentucky) I recollect distinctly during the discussion of the McKinley law it was asserted here over and over again that we could not produce barley suitable for the manufacture of malt and beer in this country. Now, I want to say that according to this gentleman, we are to-day supplying the wants of our people with our own production of barley, and he says in this statement, that the barley produced in the Northwestern States is superior to that produced in Canada. I will quote his exact language. He says:

The full effects and benefits of the 30 cent duty are now just beginning to make themselves manifest. The excellent quality of the barley raised in the States above referred to is rapidly making friends for it everywhere, and more particularly in the sections of the country where formerly Canadian barley was used.

And he further says: "It can not be claimed that the American cereal is inferior to its foreign rival," and that if the present duty is not disturbed Canadian barley will eventually be driven from the United States.

This is the language used by the gentleman referred to, and he protests against any reduction in the rate.

Mr. ENLOE. I wish to ask the gentleman if he does not think that it would be much better and safer for him to quote the official records instead of the letter he has in his hand, because his statements are inaccurate?

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. I am assured the statements as to imports of barley quoted by me are correct, and I believe they will be so found.

Mr. PICKLER. How much barley do we import, according to the opinion of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. ENLOE. I will give the gentleman the figures. I have them here, and he can read them for himself.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is one of so much importance that I feel I am justified in giving my views on the subject to which it refers.

The discussion has taken a very wide range, covering the propriety of the reductions made in the woolen schedule, and also the question of whether these reductions are such as the members of this House would have desired. I am very candid to admit—and this is an admission that has been made by most of the members on this side of the House who have engaged in the discussion—that there are many things in this bill that do not fully meet my views of the reductions that ought to have been made; but no tariff bill can be framed except by concession on the part of all those who are willing to support tariff reform, running from the extreme free-trade Democrats to those who talk tariff reform before election, and reluctantly support a bill with such material reductions as characterize this, and are sometimes called "protection Democrats."

Now, this amendment is not a question of rates; it is not a question whether we shall have free woolen goods or shall not have free woolen goods; but when shall free wool and the rates we have adopted go into effect? I am frank to say that I would like to have both free wool and free woolen goods, and to have them immediately. But I recognize the fact that the tariff reformers of this country who must make tariff reform a success, if it is ever carried to a successful issue, have not the purpose to injure or destroy manufacturers, but to liberate both them and the consumers from burdens by enlarging opportunities to the former and cheapening goods to the latter. In framing this bill we have gone as far as we felt we could and secure its passage through both Houses. We were influenced by the same motives in offering this amendment, and ask those of you who believe we ought to have free wool and woolen goods now to make such concessions to the existing condition of things as shall not injure tariff reform with the very people who have assisted us to make tariff reform a possibility.

It has been suggested—I hope inadvertently—by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOHNSON] that the committee has been influenced, and influenced in a wrong direction, by lobbyists, in framing these amendments. I pass that by, because I do not consider it worthy of notice or discussion. As to this amendment, I wish to say that when we began its consideration my colleagues and I stood exactly where the gentleman from Ohio does, differing, I suppose, in one respect from him, and that is that we are anxious that the manner and time and method of putting our reform in operation shall be such as not to unnecessarily injure the Democratic party among those people whose assistance has enabled the people of the South and West to make tariff reform possible—I mean the merchants of New York and the cities, and a goodly number of the manufacturers of the Eastern States, who are with us on this question. Becoming, after patient and careful consideration, satisfied that this amendment would best subserve this purpose I felt it our duty to urge its adoption.

[The time of Mr. MONTGOMERY having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.]

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I appeal to the members on this side of the House to be governed by the principles which have actuated the committee in offering this amendment, and to do nothing that will unnecessarily injure industries of any kind in this country, but do what I understand all tariff reformers want to do, give freer conditions to manufacturers and cheaper goods to consumers, and do this in such a method as to enable the manufacturers to adjust themselves to the new conditions, so that we may proceed as rapidly as possible to absolute freedom from the tariff burdens now impoverishing the laborers and consumers of this country. Your committee believe that the time and method of putting the bill in operation provided by this amendment and the one that will follow, will best subserve this purpose, and for this reason ask its adoption.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have reached this conclusion because I believe if you put this woolen schedule in operation as the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOHNSON] proposes, you will destroy and paralyze the woolen manufacturing industry of this country, so far as the production of the goods which are to be consumed next fall are concerned.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes.

Mr. BLAND. Did the gentleman consider that the 1st of March, the time originally fixed, was a proper time for this bill to go into effect? Did he so consider it at the time it was fixed?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I will answer the gentleman's question. These dates as originally put into this bill were put in while we were giving this question the most careful consideration we could, but before we had the amount of information upon which we finally acted, when we adopted the amendments. We have been carefully considering this question from the very beginning, because the committee all the time considered it the most difficult question connected with the important woolen schedule. And these amendments have been finally decided on as the fairest and justest solution of the difficulty.

Mr. BLAND. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I have not concluded my answer to the question. When we fixed the dates now in the bill, we were driven to the point where we had to present the bill to this House, and we were hopeful at that time that it would pass more speedily than is now possible, giving them free wool from the early date, March 1, and that they would be able to manufacture out of free wool the goods which they are compelled to sell, if they sell them at all, in the market for next fall.

Mr. BLAND. Suppose the bill should take effect on the 1st of March. Does the gentleman think that would paralyze the woolen manufacturer?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. If I could have any hope that this bill would go through by the 1st of March I would stand by the dates that are in it now; but I have no such hope, and I do not think anybody in this House can expect that the bill will pass both Houses and become a law before the middle of May.

Mr. BLAND. Suppose, for instance, the bill should take effect by the middle of April or the 1st of April—and certainly we could get the bill through by then—would the difference of one month be a very serious difference?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I will tell you what the trouble is in that regard. The woolen manufacturing industries of this country, as has been said on this floor, are paralyzed now.

Mr. BLAND. Are not a great many of them paralyzed for a purpose, and is not that purpose the lowering of wages?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Not in this case.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Not, in my judgment, in the woolen manufactories.

Mr. BLAND. I do not suppose they are in this case.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I am talking about this case, because I do not want to get off from this subject. Now I am not one of those who, as some gentleman on this floor has said, want to punish the manufacturers at all; but on the contrary, as I have said, I want to build them up, and if I did not believe that from the date this bill goes into effect the manufacturing interests of this country would increase and grow instead of diminishing and at the same time goods be cheapened, I would vote against the bill with the gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. BLAND. I hope the gentleman does not wish to put me in the category of those who want to injure American manufacturers.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I do not. I do not want to injure but build up manufacturing; still less do I want to do anything in this House that will prevent the laboring men of this country from getting work and relief from their conditions, and getting it immediately. I believe if you fix these rates to go into effect the 1st day of August for free wool, and the greatly decreased rates on woolen goods provided in this bill on the 1st of December, the woolen mannfactories will start up immediately, because the manufacturer will know that he can manufacture goods from tax-paid wool for the fall market, and have four months to sell them under the same conditions. Now, I am as anxious as the gentleman can be to get rid of all taxation on woolen and all other goods as soon as it is possible.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield to me for another question?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND. It is this: Supposing that we find that the manufacturer knows that the bill can become a law on the 1st of April, I do not think we ought to change it; but suppose that in the meantime we ascertain that it can not be done; still I say there is ample time after the bill has passed this House to examine this question and to determine it finally.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Do you think the workmen of the woolen manufactories of this country, who have been out of employment some months now—I do not say from what cause, because I am not discussing that—would agree with you that we ought by legislation to compel the woolen mills to stand still until the 1st of April, or maybe the middle of May, during which time they must suffer from starvation through not being able to get any work?

Mr. BLAND. Not at all, and that is not included in any question I have asked, nor what I have said. What I have meant is this: That if it is ascertained that this bill ought not to take effect until the 1st day of August, then it should be amended, but if it shall pass the House and go to the Senate, and they pass it within a month or six weeks, your whole objection is not good.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. What will the manufacturer be doing in the meantime, and what will his workmen be doing?

Mr. BLAND. But will the gentleman allow me? How can the manufacturer know what to do at any time. We are simply passing this bill through the House. It is not passed until it passes the Senate, and not until it becomes a law; and nothing that the House can do will bind the Senate.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. But every manufacturer in this country knows that when this House passes these amendments fixing these dates that the body at the other end of the Capitol will not be less liberal with him than we have been, and that he can safely give his workmen employment, relying on the terms and dates this House has fixed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Chairman, this matter seems to me more a question of fact than anything else. I do not know what you gentlemen have against New England and against the manufacturers of the North. I can conceive something of your having prejudice against the manufacturers as a class, but the manufacturers as a class are not the people who are involved here, but it is the men who work in the mills. They are the parties who are affected; and it is in the interest of those workingmen of the North, and especially of that portion from which I come, that I desire to speak. I have in my hand a letter from a personal friend, who wanted me to look up a pension matter, who also inclosed in his letter a petition or remonstrance against the passage of this bill; and he has also written me in respect to the matter.

He circulated a remonstrance against the passage of this bill and at the same time a request or a petition for its passage. He was not able to get a single signer among the citizens, manufacturers, and laboring people of the village in which he lives in favor of the bill, but he did get their signatures to the remonstrance, and that I have placed in the possession of the Committee on Ways and Means. Everybody signed it, without respect to party. And let me tell you that some of the men of most intelligence in the State of New Hampshire who desire the defeat of this bill are leading Democrats who are, and some who are not, engaged in manufacturing, and all parties joined together with the laboring people in the remonstrance against its passage. But I wish at this moment to show why the amendment should be adopted, as we all know the bill can not pass for some months.

We know very well it is of the utmost importance that these people should have employment in order to live during the hard winter and for the next few months. If this bill is not changed, and becomes a law as it is, the farmers who did not sell their wool will be compelled to sell it when it will meet in the market the foreign production; and if you put in this provision extending the time when the bill goes into effect until next August, the farmers in California and other parts of the country who now hold their wool will sell it at once, and when you reach the period that this bill takes effect they will have their coming clip at the factory before foreign wool can get there. I now want to read this letter to you. It is from William B. Fellows, esq., a man of character in his community, and accompanies the remonstrance. I know the place very well; it is the village in which I received much of my early education, and perhaps there are 1,800 or 2,000 people living in the town. Its academy and its manufactures are its life. He says:

TILTON, N. H., January 4, 1894.

DEAR SENATOR: I hand you herewith a protest against the passage of the Wilson bill. The signers are reliable people and know what they want and don't want.

Of course a few would not sign it. To them I offered the petition in favor of the bill, which I inclose. I was unable to get anyone to sign that. They say we must have protection, but sit trembling, unwilling to commit themselves one way or the other. That number, however, is growing less daily, and with the continuance of these times will either die or get on our side.

One large hosiery mill here is entirely shut down for lack of orders. They usually employ 150 hands. Another, ordinarily employing 225 hands, has been closed till this week, when it has started on reduced prices with 25 hands on a small order for cotton goods. Two woolen mills (one corporation) are running full time just now on early summer goods. At this time of year they should have large orders coming in for heavy goods for another winter. They haven't received an order o that kind and can't get one. Goods that they sell for 27 cents a yard are protected by a specific duty of 22½ cents a yard. That is struck off by the Wilson bill. Anyone can see the reduction to help on that basis. A third woolen mill is running a little, but the superintendent told me to-night they should close entirely in a short time; can get no orders. A new hosiery mill, just completed, shows no signs of starting. An eyeglass factory, usually employing 100 hands, is practically doing nothing; no orders. That's this village!

Yours, truly,

W. B. FELLOWS.

Hon. HENRY W. BLAIR,
Washington, D. C.

Now, that state of things prevails all over my district. The district is made up largely of small villages and small cities.

The largest city in our State has about fifty thousand people. The mass of my district is made up of populations like that which is described in this letter, living in that way, and I tell you that many people there are cold and hungry, and by defeating this amendment, by refusing to say that this bill shall not take effect until after this year's clip can be made and marketed without competition from abroad, you are simply saying that these people shall go on living there in idleness and suffering for the next six months. If you have the ordinary emotions of human beings you will see the necessity of doing what is here proposed; and I sought the floor a second time simply to read to the committee this statement in order that gentlemen might know the truth. This is not a party question in our State.

We have reached the point where partisans are merged in men. It is a question of humanity and patriotism; yes, sir, of self-preservation.

Mr. WEADOCK. Mr. Chairman, this is a matter within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Ways and Means. I am very much amused to hear gentlemen on this side of the House continually talking about "free trade" without saying a single word as to how the $400,000,000 necessary to pay the expenses of Government are to be provided. Free trade at this stage of the case is impossible, and what we are trying to do by this bill is to devise a method of tariff rates to raise revenue for the support of the Government. The question of free wool has been discussed time and time again. The Fifty-second Congress voted to place wool upon the free list. The great tariff message of 1887 said that wool ought to go on the free list, and the people of this country voted at the recent Presidential election that they wanted it placed on the free list.

But, Mr. Chairman, this House well understands and the country understands that the important question we have to settle now is when this bill shall become law, for then business can adjust itself to the change. The idea that placing wool upon the free list will have the effect that some gentlemen profess to believe it will have upon the market for wool produced in this country is, in my judgment, unfounded, and in this my judgment agrees with the opinions of people who are familiar with the subject. I ask to have read by the Clerk a letter from a former member of this House, a gentleman who is engaged in the business of raising wool. This letter was written in answer to one of the circulars which our friends on the other side refer to so often here.

The Clerk read as follows:

Recently a firm of Philadelphia middlemen sent him a circular letter regarding the prospects of the market for the future. The dealers advised him that the threatened changes in the wool tariff were operating against the market and that they thought prices would continue to decline. They added, however, that a strong effort would be made to induce Congress to retain wool on the protected schedule, and requested him to join in a petition to that effect. They also incidentally wanted to know if he needed an advance in cash on his present clip. His reply was as follows:

"DEAR SIRS: Yours of the 27th at hand. I have also noticed your name in connection with petitions to Congress, asking it not to disturb the wool duties. Now, I am a grower of wool, and I will petition Congress to put it on the free list, and the quicker the better, as wool will be enhanced in value by so doing. As for shipping you the wool, I do not wish to do so, neither do I want an advance upon it. I am not scared by this bugaboo of free wool, and I trust and hope and also believe that Congress will take the sensible view of it they have already started out to do, and put it on the free list where it belongs, and let you growers, who do not grow wool, see that you are wrong in your theories. I should be glad to receive your circulars if you see fit to send them, but do not attempt to scare me with a bugaboo.

"Yours, etc.,

"S. O. FISHER."

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, we have heard a great deal to-day about the farmer. I represent an agricultural constituency, and as to this statement that the protective policy has outraged the farmers of America, I want to enter my solemn protest against it. On the 8th day of November, 1892, in the markets of Chicago, Philadelphia, and New York, the farmers of the United States received larger prices for their products with one exception than at any time in the history of this country, that one exception being wheat. On that day the price of wheat in those markets was about 80 cents. Although the Democratic party declared in the campaign that if they were successful wheat would go to $1 a bushel, yet ten days after the election it had dropped in my State over 15 cents a bushel.

Now, sir, I represent Pennsylvania farmers, and I make this declaration without fear of successful contradiction, that if any man who says that the farmers of this country have been outraged and oppressed by the Republican policy of protection for the last thirty-two years will go with me into my State, up through the Chester valley, Lebanon valley, and the other great valleys of that State, I will show him a country that in beauty and magnificence would put out of sight Eden itself. [Laughter and applause.]

Why, sir, the policy of protection has made our farmers rich in Pennsylvania. I do not care whether they export grain or import it. The Republican policy has filled my State with factories and artisans and mechanics, consumers of the products of the farm; it has given them a market at their own doors, so that even to-day, with a million of people idle around them, they are getting good prices for their products. If there is any one thing that specially characterizes the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania it is her well-to-do farmers; and my observation is that a man who has a good farm and has it paid for, if he exercises the same thrift, foresight, and economy that the man who succeeds in mercantile life or in professional life is obliged to exercise, not only keeps his farm free from mortgages, but after a few years he buys another farm. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I submit as a part of these remarks a tabular statement of prices in Philadelphia and Chicago on the 8th day of November, 1892:

Articles.	Prices November 8, 1892, in—
	Philadelphia.*	Chicago.†

*Philadelphia Press. †Chicago Times.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say for the Pennsylvania farmers that they are broad-gauge men; they are intelligent, educated, broad-minded people. My friend from Nebraska wants nine farmers to be benefited by striking at the industry of the tenth. I wish to say that if there is a farmer in my State whose hills are covered with flocks of sheep, he has not such a mean, sordid, closefisted, dog-in-the-manger spirit as to desire that persons in another district who have no flocks of sheep should suffer for his advantage.

Mr. PICKLER. They are protected in something else.

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir. The farmers of Pennsylvania are willing to pay a reasonable duty on the articles which they consume—binding-twine, etc. They are opposed to this Wilson bill because they want the mechanics, the artisans, the laboring men of Pennsylvania to have good wages with which they may be able to purchase the products of the farms.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HICKS. I ask unanimous consent that the time of my colleague be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. ENLOE. Before the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] resumes I want to ask him whether he attributes the sudden decline in the price of wheat, which he says fell 15 cents a bushel in his State, to the threat of passing the Wilson bill and reducing the duty on wheat 5 cents a bushel?

Mr. MAHON. No, sir; but I attribute it to the fact that the people of Pennsylvania have enough intelligence to know that the passage of a bill of this kind will close up all the great industrial establishments of the State, throwing out of employment 2,000,000 people, who have 8,000,000 more dependent upon them; so that those 10,000,000 people, instead of having wheat bread and beef to eat will have to subsist on corn bread and bacon.

In addition to that the farmers of the State of Pennsylvania are to-day contributing, out of the liberality of their hearts, money running up into millions to feed the unfortunate people who are out of work. The one thing that the farmers of that State want is a chance to vote your Democratic party out of power at the next general election. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, our Republican friends want to postpone free wool and cheaper woolen goods until 1898. Practically they might as well postpone that much-desired consummation until the day of judgment. [Cries of "That's right!" on the Republican side.] Their proposition comes in the nature of a motion for a new trial in a case which the great jury of the American people has twice decided against them. Why do they want to make this postponement? I will tell you: so that in 1896 they may again "fry the fat" out of the manufacturers, debauch the people of the country, and elect a Republican President again if possible. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] That is the milk in the Republican cocoanut. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] says that if the Wilson bill be passed there will not be enough left of the Democratic party to make a grease spot. Do the Republicans believe that? [Cries of "Yes!" "Yes!"] Not a bit of it. If they did, every devil of them would vote for it [laughter and applause]; for, of all things dreamed of in their philosophy, to kill the Democratic party is what they most desire; but it can not be done.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say something to the Democrats. Protection is either good or bad. There is no middle ground about it. It is not, like certain Christians of the church of Laodicea described in one of the epistles, neither hot nor cold, but lukewarm. It is either good or bad. If it is good, let us have all we can get of it; if it is bad, let us get rid of it altogether. [Applause.] Let me tell you another thing: To the man who freezes in the winter of 1894 and 1895 and 1896 and 1897, it is going to be very cold comfort to tell him that he will have a good coat on his back in the winter of 1898. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] says that as soon as Grover Cleveland was elected, wheat in his State went down 15 cents a bushel; therefore the election of Mr. Cleveland sent down the price of wheat. Grover Cleveland was elected; and we had a very hard winter. Therefore, according to the gentleman's reasoning, the election of Mr. Cleveland caused the cold weather. [Applause.] One proposition is just as good logic as the other. [Laughter.]

Wheat went down because manufacturers, to influence legislation here and to raise the cry of hard times, closed down their mills, threw thousands of men out of employment, and thereby diminished the demand for wheat and the consumption of wheat. Mr. Cleveland's election had nothing to do with it.

Mr. Chairman, in the campaign of 1892 we made the welkin ring with our denunciations of the McKinley bill. From every hilltop and in every valley we declared that protection was an unmitigated fraud and that it was unconstitutional. Yet we here stand, fifteen months after that election, in which we won an unprecedented, an overwhelming victory, and we have done nothing to remove the fraud; we have done nothing to wipe out this unconstitutional legislation. And we now have a proposition to postpone the operation of this relief to a further day. [Laughter on the Republican side.] We will do no such thing. Were we honest then? If so, we ought to be honest now and put in practice what we preached in 1892.

Mr. BOUTELLE. You were just as honest then as you are now.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And we are just as honest now as we were then, and we are going to do it; and don't you forget it. [Laughter.] We have both the power and the courage of our convictions, and we are about to do what we promised. The quicker it is done the better for all concerned. Cutting down the tariff will bring relief. Uncertainty means mischief.

Mr. Chairman, "procrastination is the thief of time." That is a piece of old philosophy. "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick." I am in favor of curing the heart disease of the American people by giving them cheaper clothing and giving it to them at once. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLAND. I ask that my colleague's time be extended five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I thank my colleague and the committee. We are getting down to business now. The Democratic heart is being warmed up. We are getting together. We are about to redeem our pledges. Heaven be thanked!

The gentleman from Michigan asks where we are going to get the revenue to make up the deficiency caused by this bill. It will not take me very long to tell him. We are going to impose such an income tax as will make the eyes of the multi-millionaires bulge out. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will you do it?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes, we will do it, and I will do my full share to help the good work along.

Now, let us briefly consider this sheep question. There is one-half of a sheep to each man, woman, and child in the United States. The wool clip is 4 pounds to the sheep; that is a fair average. The tariff is 11 cents a pound. Therefore, granting (which is not true) that the price of wool is augmented by the amount of the tariff, then every man, woman, and child in the United States, possessed of half a sheep, would be benefited only 22 cents by the retention of this duty, while the tariff on the commonest wool hat, the cheapest woolen dress that any woman ever put on her back, on the cheapest pair of breeches that a man ever wore, on the cheapest baby dress in this country, is more than the average citizen will get out of the duty on the average half of a sheep. [Laughter.]

Granting, for the sake of argument—which I deny utterly—that the wool-raiser would lose the tariff on wool, he would make it back twenty times over by the saving in what he will expend for woolen woods, even under the modest reductions of the Wilson bill; and, unless I misunderstand the temper both of this House and of the country, the cuts in the woolen schedules will be made much deeper before we get through with this work of reform. [Applause.]

But it has been demonstrated over and over again that the tariff on wool does not raise the price of wool. If it does, how does it happen that under the McKinley bill wool went down, down, down, till last fall it touched the lowest price within the memory of the oldest inhabitant? The truth is that free wool would raise the price of American wool; because we need the different grades of foreign wools to mix with American wools to make certain kinds of woolen cloths. So that the wool-grower will find the wool he has to sell go up and the woolen goods he has to buy go down.

Mr. Chairman, my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] the other day said, by way of threat, as I interpreted it, that the manufacturers were able to take care of themselves.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, no; not by way of threat.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then I will modify that part of it.

A MEMBER. Take the tariff off. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If they are able to take care of themselves I am glad to know it; but if they are, then in the name of common decency why do not they do it, and not depend on the Government to support them? Representing one of the most fertile agricultural districts on earth, richer than the valley of the Ganges or the Delta of the Nile, I say that the farmers of this country are amply able to take care of themselves and of their own interests, if the manufacturers would only take their grip off the farmers' throats, pull off the vampires that are sucking the lifeblood out of the farmers' veins; and take their hands off of the farmers' pocketbooks. [Applause.]

Our farmers are not beggars. They ask charity from no man. They want nobody robbed to help them. All they demand is justice, fair play, and an honest chance in the race of life; and I tell you that they will and can take care of themselves. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

They are not such fools as the protectionists seem to think. Being exporters, they know full well that no tariff can raise the price of exports, and that their wheat and corn and cotton and live stock and beef and pork are sold in the open markets of the world in competition with all creation. Being importers, they understand thoroughly that the tariff largely increases the price of nearly every article they buy.

They demand that if they must sell in a free-trade market (a thing which no tariff can prevent), they shall be permitted to buy in a free-trade market, and that when they reach home with their purchases they shall not be mulcted in large sums for not having bought of some American plutocrat. They think it is a poor rule which does not work both ways. They know that before the high protective system was inaugurated, they were the most prosperous class in America; and they know only too well that after thirty-two years of the so-called blessings of that system they are the least prosperous. They want that iniquitous system abolished. They know that in the last analysis they bear the brunt of all taxation, and they want their heavy burdens lightened.

They want the Government which they support with their brain, brawn, sweat, and money to quit interfering with the laws of commerce.

They know that then, and not till then, will the American laborer, of whatever occupation—whether farmer, mechanic, artisan, railroader, molder, glass-blower, merchant, clerk, carpenter, bricklayer, blacksmith, teacher, every species of wage-earner—receive the full recompense of his toil and be reinvested with the inalienable right conferred by Almighty God to trade wheresoever, with whomsoever, and upon any terms whatsoever he pleases—to sell in the highest and buy in the cheapest markets of the world.

This Government has precisely the same authority—and not one whit more—to say that we shall purchase our woolens of John Smith, our cottons of Bill Jones, our groceries of Tom Brown, our cutlery of Sam Johnson, and so on to the end of the chapter, and that, too, without regard to price, as it has to say that we must not buy of Englishmen, Frenchmen, Dutchmen, Germans, or any other people without paying heavy fines to our tariff barons for so doing.

It should not legislate for the benefit of any particular class, but for the good of all.

The gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS] talks of appealing to the farmers. Well, they have been appealed to. They have settled the question as far as they can settle it. They did it in 1890; they did it again in 1892. There was no mistake about their desires. There was no lack of emphasis in their opinion. They forced the election of Grover Cleveland in 1892, and they did it solely because of that brave, wise, and manly message which he sent to Congress in December, 1887. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. NORTHWAY. Why did not they reëlect him in 1888?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He was not elected in 1888 because you had got the "fat fried" out of your manufacturers [laughter]; because of pious John Wanamaker and his $400,000 of campaign slush funds, and because of men like unto him; because you had Dudley and his blocks of five in Indiana; because you debauched the people of two States; because you used a good deal of "diplomacy and soap," as Mr. Chester A. Arthur declared at the Delmonico banquet. [Laughter.] That is why he was not elected in 1888.

Now if you want to ask any more questions, crack in. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word at this time to corroborate the statements made by the gentleman from Illinois [Gen. HENDERSON] with regard to the effect of the protective tariff on the industry of raising barley in this country. The letter from which he quoted was printed from a letter received by myself. It was written by Mr. Bruno E. Fink, of Milwaukee, one of the leading maltsters and dealers in barley in this country, who has given a great deal of study and research to the question and to the business in this country.

But I desire to give a local application to the question propounded by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] a few moments ago when the gentleman from Illinois occupied the floor, and when he made this inquiry: "Is it a fact that as the result of a protective duty on barley the price in this country has been materially advanced?" I answer this question by saying yes; it has been advanced. In Wisconsin, in the year 1889, the production of barley reached the figure of 12,524,000 bushels. The average price of barley on the Board of Trade in the city of Milwaukee for that year was 48¼ cents a bushel.

In 1891, after the McKinley bill had gone into operation and its effects were being felt on the markets, and assuming that the crop of the State of Wisconsin would be from the same acreage and of the same yield as the preceding year, the prices on the Board of Trade in Milwaukee having gone up to an average of 62¼ cents a bushel, the result was an increase of 14 cents a bushel in that State on account of the increase of duty from 10 cents a bushel by the tariff act of 1883 to 30 cents by the McKinley act of 1890; and that increase, Mr. Chairman, benefited the farmers of the State of Wisconsin $1,696,000, or nearly $1,700,000 in one year on this one article produced in that State. I would ask if that is not a very considerable benefit to them? Who paid for it? My Democratic friends say the consumer did. Not a bit of it. I can see in the faces of many gentlemen on the other side eloquent evidence that the beer glass of 1891 was just as large and the price just the same as in 1889.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Are you in favor of a duty for the protection of anyone which operates to prevent any importation from coming into this country?

Mr. SHAW. I am in favor of making an American market for the American farmer.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Has the average price of barley since the passage of the McKinley bill been any higher than it was for three years prior to its passage?

Mr. SHAW. Yes; it has.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. The figures do not show it.

Mr. SHAW. And later in this debate I shall present evidence which will convince the gentleman of the correctness of my statement. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have been an interested listener to the debate which has taken place upon the tariff question to day, and which has produced oratorical music which has run the chromatic scale from sugar of milk up to free wool, stopping on the way to pay its attention to the minor chords of British gum and rattan chairs. I have been very much interested; but I have discovered that it is evident that the utterances of a former candidate for President on the Democratic ticket had found some lodgment in the minds of gentlemen here on this floor. Gen. Hancock once said that the tariff was a local issue. It seems to be so.

Gentlemen come here from South Carolina and ask for and obtain a protection of 71 per cent on rice. They are satisfied with that, but they want every other product put on the free list. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. COFFEEN] favors protected wool, and I respect the gentleman for his manliness, and for the fact that he is supporting his constituency on this question; but if they do not obtain protected wool, they are going to vote for the Wilson bill just the same, and thus vote for a bill which will put their special industries on the free list.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think one's industrial surroundings have much to do with his position on this question. I believe it to be true that the legislatures of the Democratic States, the Southern or free-trade States, have not considered industrial questions in making their apportionments in the Congressional districts. They have made geographical lines, based on political considerations only. The result is that we have gentlemen here who represent rice, who represent lumber, who represent iron ore, who represent sheep; and they all come here, each one clamoring for the protection of the one predominating, overshadowing interest that he represents, but they are all willing to sacrifice everybody else. Now, it may be owing to my environment that I look at this question in another way.

I have the honor to represent a constituency of cosmopolitan composition and metropolitan instincts, a district in which the congestion of bustling cities blends into the more roomy areas of interurban territory and then again into cities, and so on radially from each embyronic metropolis in the district, so gradually that the industries and occupations of the favored people of that locality could be depicted upon a chart by a harmonious mixture of the more intense with the more delicate tints of the rose. It is a district in which the brawny Scot, the hardy Scandinavian, the phlegmatic Teuton, the sturdy Briton, the moon-eyed Mongolian, and the lineal descendant of Rory O'Moore mingle with the people of every other nationality from Greenland's icy mountains to India's coral strand. [Laughter.]

It is a district in which the voice of the cuckoo is hushed forever in death [laughter], but a district in which the song of the whippoorwill in the evening continues as a melodious refrain the harsher music of the factory whistles, a district in which the rush, roar, and bustle of the mills and other hives of industry of the cities are taken up and continued by the hum of harvest machines in the golden wheatfields of the surrounding farms; a district in which illiteracy is unknown, in which the brawn and brain of the wild and wooly West are arrayed in harmonious juxtaposition to the culture and refinement of the effete East.

It is a district, Mr. Chairman, in which the ethics of partisan politics are so well understood that, in the discussion of economic questions, in the conduct of a campaign of education, such as we are conducting in this House at this time, the opposing factions meet with such a force that the shock of Milton's angel cohorts does not even suggest the idea of impact, and is no longer used as a comparison for that purpose [laughter], and the amenities of a situation which would elsewhere be distressing are so well preserved that defeated candidates consider it an honor to be beaten by courteous adversaries; and the average of intelligence—and a high one it is, too, I assure you, Mr. Chairman—is reached by an aggregation of means without any violent extremes. We have to go outside of our district to find an example of the "ward heeler" or bucolic statesman.

Mr. Chairman, the district which I have the honor to represent covers a greater number of industries, and presents more phases of human activity than any other district represented upon the floor of this House. We are producers and consumers. We grow barley, which we have been discussing this afternoon, and we make it into beer, the product of that barley. We manufacture lumber in that district. We manufacture that lumber into the more advanced stages of manufacture—into sash, doors, and blinds. We grow wool in that district, and we manufacture the wool into the product of the woolen industry. In many ways we are not only the producers, but consumers.

Is it any wonder, then, that the people of my district are surprised at the position which has been taken by the gentlemen on the other side of this House? Is it any wonder that the people of my district believe that this great idea of American prosperity, of industrial prosperity, is a superstructure which is supported on all the original elements of national success—on agriculture, on commerce, and on manufactures, on education, and on the greatest base upon which any structure can stand—the protection of American labor? Do they not know that you can not destroy one of those elements without ruining the entire structure?

I say, Mr. Chairman, we must consider this question in its entirety. We can not make up a tariff bill by piecemeal, as has been attempted to be done here; and whenever a tariff bill is made it must be made by the friends of the measure and by the friends of protection.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHAW. Just one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed for one minute.

There was no objection.

Mr. SHAW. I was going to say simply, in the way of conclusion, that the pending tariff bill would have been pronounced by the statesmen of 1857 to be "neither fish, flesh, nor fowl;" but as it is patched up to-day, and as it will be patched up for the next two weeks by our free-trade friends, it can only be described in the polished diction of the gentleman from Massachusetts as "a heterogenous aggregation of eccentric incongruities." [Laughter.]

Mr. ENLOE. I want to ask the gentleman a question before he sits down. In the political ethics of your district, during the campaign, did the people there know what is meant by the question, "You know what the governor of North Carolina said to the governor of South Carolina?"

Mr. SHAW. The celebrated conversation between the executives of two of the Southern Commonwealths is quite familiar to me, and it is possible that that conversation was repeated many times during my campaign, but it was confined almost exclusively to the free-trade Democrats of that district. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as this discussion has now drifted into this strain, and has brought up the question as to the profit going to the agricultural classes of this country under protection, I think it would be well to have some facts. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] the other day said that a "quart of facts were worth a bushel of theories," and on yesterday the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] also disputed some facts given him by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HALL]. I have here in my hand the statistical report of the State of Illinois of the State board of agriculture. Illinois, every gentleman will agree, is the best agricultural State in the Union.

A MEMBER. Except Missouri.

Another MEMBER. Except Ohio. [Laughter and confusion.]

Mr. SIMPSON. No, I will not except any State. The farmers in the State of Illinois produce crops under the most favorable conditions of any State in this broad land, both as to soil climate, and means for transportation.

Now, gentlemen, let us see what the facts are in regard to this tariff policy and its effect on the farmers. In the twenty-one years beginning in the year 1873 and ending in 1893 the farmers of Illinois produced 651,000,000 bushels of wheat. According to this report the total cost of raising wheat was $476,000,000, or an average of 73 cents a bushel. The total value of the wheat product was $541,000,000, or an average of about 83 cents a bushel; leaving an average net profit of 10 cents a bushel. For the ten years beginning in 1881 and ending in 1890 the wheat-growers of Illinois produced 290,000,000 bushels of wheat and it cost $227,000,000 to raise it, or an average of 77½ cents per bushel. They received $228,000,000, or an average of 78 cents per bushel; leaving the farmer a half of 1 cent per bushel profit on an average for his wheat for ten years.

In 1893, when we had begun to get the full benefit of the high protective tariff, the farmers of Illinois produced 18,000,000 bushels of wheat, at a cost of $16,000,000, or an average of 89 cents per bushel, and they received $9,000,000 for it, or an average price of 48 cents per bushel, leaving a net loss to the wheat-growers of Illinois for the year 1893, of 41 cents per bushel for every bushel produced. Yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] will get up here and in the face of these facts state to the committee and to the country that the farmers of this country have the best market they have ever had in our history. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

A Republican MEMBER. Where did the gentleman get his facts?

Mr. SIMPSON. Facts! These are facts given by the Republican State board of agriculture in the State of Illinois—facts which you gentlemen will not dare to dispute.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. There is no Republican State board of agriculture in the State of Illinois.

Mr. PICKLER. Who makes these reports?

Mr. SIMPSON. I will tell you who makes them. The same circular, on page 5, contains a similar table of statistics of the cost of other crops for the same twenty years. The farmers of Illinois produced 1,000,000,000 bushels of oats, and it cost them, according to this report, $515,000,000, or an average of 28 cents per bushel to raise it, and they received $478,000,000, or 26 cents per bushel, leaving a net loss to the wheat growers on an average for twenty-one years of 2.2 cents per bushel.

Those are the figures for wheat and oats. Now, let us see as to rye. The rye crop of the State of Illinois, according to the report of this board, was produced at a loss of $390,000. Then take barley. Under this high protective tariff they raised their barley crop of 1893 at a loss of $47,000. The area devoted to barley this season was 19,000 acres, 3,445 acres less than the area in 1892, and the average yield per acre was 19 bushels, the smallest yield ever known in Illinois, with the exception of that of 1874, 1876, 1877, and 1887. The total yield of barley this year was 390,000 bushels, for which the price on August 1 was 35 cents a bushel. This report does not give the statistics of the corn crop. They leave that out; but here are three or four of the principal crops that the farmers produce, in one of the best agricultural States of the Union, and they were raised at a loss, as set forth by this agricultural report made under a Republican administration.

By unanimous consent, Mr. SIMPSON'S time was extended for five minutes.

Mr. MAHON. Does not the gentleman know that all over this country, in the North and the South, the East and the West, the most intelligent investigation by scientific as well as by practical farmers shows that the cost of the production of a bushel of wheat, including 6 per cent interest on the money invested in the land, is 51 cents. If there is any man who knows anything about farming, and who believes that it costs 74 cents a bushel to raise wheat in this country, or in a State like Illinois, I can take him out in a clear moonlight night and in less than five minutes convince him that the moon is made of green cheese. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMPSON. I will say in reply to the gentleman that if he sets up his judgment in regard to the cost of raising a bushel of wheat in Illinois against the judgment of a board selected by the Republican administration of the State of Illinois, I will leave it for the country to decide which is the best authority.

Mr. FUNK. By what authority does the gentleman from Kansas state that the State board of agriculture is appointed by a Republican administration? That is about on a par with some of his other statements. The State board of agriculture is not a political body.

Mr. FITHIAN. Let me answer the question. While it is true that the State board of agriculture is not appointed by the State administration, yet the majority of that board are Republicans.

Mr. FUNK. I do not believe that proposition is true, either. You will find that the board is about equally divided politically—sometimes one party predominates and sometimes the other.

Mr. SIMPSON. I am informed that the gentleman from Illinois has a brother on the State board of agriculture, and I presume he is a Republican.

Mr. FUNK. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMPSON. But it does not make any difference whether the members of that board are Republicans or Democrats. It is fair to presume that those gentlemen have gone into the facts and have made a fair and correct report. I received yesterday a statement from the Statistician of the Agricultural Department, furnished at my request; and this statement sets forth that the average price of wheat in the United States this year has been only 51 cents a bushel. Now every man who is a practical farmer (and I have been a practical farmer for fifteen years, raising wheat) knows that wheat can not be produced at that price anywhere in this country except at a loss.

Mr. FUNK. Why did you not read that entire report as to the farm products of Illinois? Why did you select simply one or two items?

Mr. SIMPSON. Because I had only five minutes. [Laughter.] I apprehend the gentleman would be stirred up just as much by the balance of the report as he is by what I have read. It shows that the hardships resulting from protection have fallen upon the farmers of the country—why? Simply because they represent unorganized labor. They have no trades unions to force the capitalists to surrender a part of the plunder which they exact from the people. That, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] said, is the only power to which capital will yield so as to be induced to give up a part of its plunder.

Mr. CHILDS. I ask the gentleman whether he has stated these figures upon his own authority, or whether he is simply quoting them from the report of the State board of agriculture of Illinois?

Mr. SIMPSON. I have cited the figures from the report of the State board of agriculture of Illinois.

Mr. CHILDS. I refer to the figures as to the average cost of production of a bushel of wheat.

Mr. SIMPSON. I have read those figures as given in the report.

Mr. CHILDS. I ask you whether you know that statement of the cost to be correct?

Mr. SIMPSON. I found that statement of record, giving the cost of producing a bushel of wheat, a bushel of oats, a bushel of rye, and a bushel of barley in the State of Illinois.

Mr. CHILDS. Will you tell us the elements entering into the estimated cost of a bushel of wheat, an estimate covering millions of bushels and many years?

Mr. SIMPSON. If the gentleman will secure me an extension of time I will very gladly go into the details and tell him, article by article, what enters into the cost of the production of a bushel of wheat; because, as I have already stated, I have been raising wheat for fifteen years and know something about the business. I will tell the gentleman that under this beautiful system of "protection" I have in my granary to-day what is left out of my three years' crop of wheat; and this wheat, which I should be able to sell at a profit, I am feeding out to hogs and cattle and other dumb brutes, while under your protective policy millions of men are on the verge of starvation for want of that wheat. This is the result of that sort of "protection."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois obtained the floor.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Before the gentleman from Illinois proceeds I ask unanimous consent that the debate on the pending amendment be limited to ten minutes.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no!

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the request. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment be concluded in ten minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BOWERS of California and others objected.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. What time would gentlemen suggest?

Mr. BOWERS of California. This is an important clause and ought to be fully debated.

Mr. GROUT. There are several gentlemen on this side of the question who want to speak.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I have not attempted to limit the debate, although it has had a very wide range, because I am desirous that all members who may wish to speak shall have the opportunity.

Mr. REED. I suggest to the gentleman that the friends of the farmer are very numerous here, and they will talk this subject out either on this amendment or some other; and perhaps it would be just as well to let the discussion go on now.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I do not propose to do anything to interfere in any way with the "friends of the farmer;" but speaking in behalf of the committee, I desire to get our amendments out of the way as quickly as possible, so that other members wishing to offer amendments and secure a vote upon them may have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON], in his reference to the character of the report which he has read, was as wide of the mark as he usually is when he attempts to discuss a question in which the farmers of the country are interested. This report is prepared by a nonpolitical body. I have not, up to this time, had the opportunity or the occasion to make a critical examination of the figures presented in the report, and do not know whether the conclusions drawn by him as to the articles of wheat, rye, and barley are correct or not. But when the gentleman undertakes to indulge in the "calamity howl" about the farmers of Illinois, that is so common when he talks of the farmers of Kansas, I say that the gentleman is in error, and I wish to point out the reason why.

Mr. Chairman, I was born in Illinois and have lived there all my life. If there is any one class of people in this country that I am familiar with from my daily associations, it is with the farmers and their condition, and I know that there is not a more prosperous class of citizens in any section of the Union or in any other trade or profession than the farmers of that State.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I can not yield.

I remember, Mr. Chairman, under free-trade days when the farm lands in the county where I was born and in the section where I have lived all my life were sold for $5 an acre. Under protective tariff laws and Republican Administrations I have seen these same farm lands increase in value from year to year until the $5 an acre lands now sell for $60 an acre. Take all the counties where we have large manufacturing industries established and the farm lands that sold for $5 an acre in the years gone by have increased until they sell for from $75 to $100 per acre. I have seen the log house under free-trade times give away to the frame house with all the modern conveniences and improvements.

I have seen the straw shed of free-trade times give place to the splendidly constructed barns that are an ornament to the farms all through Illinois. I have seen great tracts of land ranging from 160 to 1,000 acres in one inclosure, divided and subdivided from year to year until now forty acres is considered a large tract of land for one inclosure. The live stock on the farms in free-trade days were few in numbers and of an inferior quality. To-day Illinois farms are stocked with the most approved breeds of horses, cattle, and hogs. Some of the finest and best stock farms in America can be found in Illinois. All the conditions which make a prosperous and successful community have been placed at the feet of the farmers of Illinois by our protective tariff laws and Republican administration.

Last year it was my pleasure to address an assemblage of farmers of more than three thousand in number, men who earn their living by daily toil upon the farms, and I counted more than twelve hundred covered carriages amongst the assemblage. Just think of that for one moment, and then contrast it with the dark picture painted of their condition by such professional farmers as the gentleman from Kansas. And, Mr. Chairman, every one of these men was well dressed, his wife and children were well clothed, and the assemblage was one which bore the highest testimonial of the benefits of tariff laws and Republican legislation. In no other country in the world can such intelligent and prosperous farmers be found.

Now, I say, sir, the gentleman from Kansas may speak for the people of his State, but the farmers of Illinois want no such leader to represent their condition, because they are as prosperous a class as we have in that great and glorious Commonwealth. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I would like to ask my colleague a question.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. WELLS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know if the farmers on the floor will not be willing to consent to put off the further discussion of their interests and continue them another day, and let us take a vote on the pending amendment. I want to keep an engagement this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this discussion has taken a very wide range, considering the question pending before the committee. The proposition, as I understand it, is one that relates solely to the time to be fixed for putting into effect the provision for admitting raw wool free of duty.

A MEMBER. All woolens.

Mr. MAGUIRE. No; I understand it applies not to woolen goods, but to raw wool only, and that the Chairman proposes to offer another amendment covering the case of manufactured woolens. Am I correct?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. That is correct.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Now the arguments that have been made in favor of the committee's present amendment apply more properly to the amendment which the chairman of the committee proposes to offer hereafter. The proposition is that because the manufactures proceed by periods, because the manufacture of winter supplies must commence in the preceding spring, there must be an intervening period of uncertainty to the manufacturers, if it be not determined now that the changes to be made in the woolen-goods schedule shall not take effect until December. I agree that reasonable provision should be made for that purpose, not on the ground that protection for any purpose is necessary or proper, but because uncertainty will in the meantime injuriously disturb the woolen-manufacturing industries.

But with respect to raw wool, sir, I believe that the interests as well of the manufacturers as of all consumers of woolen goods demand that raw wool shall be put on the free list at the earliest possible moment; and I deny absolutely that the farmers are to be benefited in any way by maintaining the present tariff on wool until the 1st of August. The wool-producers of the United States produce a kind of wool that does not make complete cloth of the kind that the American market demands. It requires a mixture of long-staple wools, which must be imported; and if the importation of that wool is barred by the tariff barrier which now exists, it will cause a hindrance to the manufacture of woolen goods without giving any benefit whatever to farmers or wool-growers.

The thing that will benefit wool-growers is to start the factories just as soon as they can be started; to remove every impediment to their successful operation. The demand for wool will be increased by permitting the immediate importation of the other kinds of wool that are needed to mix with the American wools. I say let raw wool be placed on the free list at the moment this bill goes into effect in any of its parts, and let the provision be made, which has been mentioned by the chairman of the committee, for putting into effect the new schedules on manufactured goods.

Mr. BURROWS. A few moments ago my colleague [Mr. WEADOCK] had read a letter from Mr. Fisher, a former member of this House.

Mr. WEADOCK. Yes, I so stated.

Mr. BURROWS. I find by looking at the Congressional Directory that Mr. Fisher is a large lumber dealer and banker.

Mr WEADOCK. Will the gentleman permit me——

Mr. BURROWS. He is a banker and lumberman, and a Democrat. Those are the three occupations in which he is engaged, although perhaps the latter is more in the nature of a disease than a business. [Laughter on the Republican side.] That gentleman is advising us what had better be done in the way of free wool. Now, I desire to have read a letter from a very intelligent gentleman from our State in reply.

Mr. WEADOCK. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him as to a matter of fact——

Mr. BURROWS. I have but five minutes and I wish to have that letter read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONSTANTINE, MICH., November 20, 1893.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to say that the "condition of the wool-growing industry in this, St. Joe County, Mich., was, up to the time it was influenced by apprehensions and fears concerning the removal of the protective duty, in a satisfactory and flourishing shape. This fall, as a direct result of the said fears, the business is destroyed or rendered profitless.

(2) We can not raise wool here as cheaply as in the countries of Australia and Argentine Republic for the reason that we employ men to assist us in the care of our sheep, and pay them the wages due to men. It also costs us more to house and feed our sheep, partly due to the value of the land we own and the civilization we enjoy. In those countries "wool grows itself, almost." Here it is the embodiment of enterprise, capital, and labor—Americanism in the highest.

(3) The wool I sold in a ready market last season at 22 cents per pound finds slow sale now at 12.5 cents per pound.

(4) I will not attempt to say what wool would sell for when it is put on free list, but no farmer here will be in the business then. We will do just as well to raise 55-cent wheat at 75 cents cost. We would not be able to compete with "self-raised wool."

5. This is east of the Mississippi River, but sheep-raising has become interwoven with our "farming" to such an extent that it is indispensable; we can not farm with any profit without sheep as an auxiliary. They are our winter crop. We have built up by degrees and in good faith this business until there are fed in this county alone over 60,000 head of sheep each winter, and it is simply an outrage and robbery to subject us to so great a loss for the purpose of bolstering up the vagaries of a purposeless Administration. The wool-growing industry belongs to us by every right that is known to law, because it is our creation. No party has any authority to legislate us, or our business—a la Poor Lo—to some other reservation. You can not raise sheep in the United States for the prices of the above-mentioned countries without degrading the profits and processes to those of the other countries.

6. We "are slaughtering sheep" here now, for the reason that unless we can sell wool for about the prices heretofore commanded it will not pay us to raise or feed them. This is a matter of fact, drawn from experience.

7. We own the land upon which our sheep graze in summer and from which their winter feed comes. It constitutes our homesteads, and upon its proper valuation we pay taxes, which go to sustain our institutions. In order to do this it is necessary to receive commensurate prices. We are put to the expense of building large sheds for winter feeding and protection during the six or seven months of cold weather. As wool can be raised by grazing alone in the countries mentiond unless we are protected by proper duties we could not compete with outside raisers. With the McKinley duty of 11 cents removed we could not compete with Australia. Big sheep barns that sheltered 2,000 sheep last winter will stand empty this winter.

The wool from these sheep sold last February and March, as soon as off, for 23 cents, and to-day it would not bring 12.5 cents. The difference in feeding lambs, say, last October, and now is, last October they had ready sale at 5 cents. Same time this year are slow at 3.5 cents. Lots of stock ewes are being sent to the slaughterhouses this fall, where they only bring $1.20 per head. The same sheep cost $4 per head two years ago. The same farmer who hauled his wool to market last market time by hay-wagon loads will haul it there next time in a one-horse buggy.

10. I can only say that when there was absolute free trade before, and there was no duty on wool; when, in fact, our fine woolens and cloths were produced mostly, if not altogether in Europe, the price for a suit of clothes made from woolen cloth was so high that "the masses" you mention had to run around with their extremities protruding out of linsey-woolsey and Kentucky jeans—made of hemp and cotton—the masses could not raise either wool or money enough then to suit themselves.

There is nothing that will excuse the Government for meddling with any of our industries—of which sheep-raising has been one of the most lucrative. Both we and the hired help we employ, and, so far as I am able to judge by observation and other information, all patriotic citizens of the country are willing to pay the (doubtful) extra dollar a suit of woolen clothes will cost as a consequence of the present duty. If we can go on selling the products of our farms, whatever they be, at the fair profits of only one year ago we will be able to buy Georgia cotton, Louisiana sirup, and Pennsylvania iron, and be glad that it all is "protected" to them and for us.

11. This time last year sheep were worth from $4 to $5 per head here. Now they sell slow at from $1.20 to $2 per head. The cause is the fear of the promised "free wool."

12. There was a good demand for sheep this time last year. Everyone wants to sell now. Reason same as above.

13. There has been considerable reduction in number of sheep here in last few months. Cause as per above. Those sold have mostly been slaughtered.

14. There has been a wonderful diminution in the amounts of both wool and—the profits are all gone just in anticipation of its being made free.

Trusting that these truthful and earnest statements may assist you with data for use in the coming battle, I remain,

Very truly,

T. O. FUREY.

Hon. J. C. BURROWS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. WEADOCK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say in regard to the author of that letter that I am proud to say he is a Democrat and a good one——

Mr. BURROWS. The author of the letter just read?

Mr. WEADOCK. No, the letter of Mr. Fisher that you found fault with. Mr. Fisher is also a lumberman and a banker. He is also a grower of sheep, and has perhaps more sheep on his ranch in Colorado than there are in the county from which this gentleman writes, whose letter has just been read. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a word with reference to the figures presented by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] as to the price of farm products in the State of Illinois. It will be noticed that they were the prices of this last year. He spoke of the cost of producing the different grains named and then gave the figures as of August 1, which was the very time of the lowest prices of last summer, when there was a collapse in prices if not in actual values of from one-third to one-half, not only in agricultural products, but in stocks and values of every kind, so that the figures given are no guide whatever. The extent of that collapse is indicated by the testimony of this witness from Michigan, whose letter has just been read, who calls attention to the fact that wool fell from 24 cents a pound last year to 12½ cents a pound this year. So these low figures which the gentleman read with such a flourish as the farmers' protection prices were really the prices of a period of general business prostration at the prospect of a free-trade tariff. If they show anything they show the effect of the ruinous tariff agitation with which the Democratic party is now blessing the country.

Now, I wish to say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] that the gentleman from Vermont did not himself speak of the oleaginous spot which was to mark the future resting place of the Democratic party. [Laughter.] It was the language of a farmer from my State from whose letter I read. It was his language, not mine. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] also says that Republicans do not believe that if this bill be passed it would wipe out the Democratic party, that if they did every devil of them would vote for it. Perhaps they would if they were devils; but, Mr. Chairman, it so happens that they are patriots as well as Republicans, and would if possible save the country from the swift destruction to which the passage of this bill would certainly carry it.

Great misfortune is already upon us in anticipation of its passage; but the disaster would be more complete were it to become law, because then we would have to await the verdict of the people for the restoration of the policy under which the country has been so prosperous.

It is true the passage of the bill would more completely seal the fate of the Democratic party, but it would more completely ruin the country at the same time; and as Republicans and patriots we must, if possible, prevent this. Besides, the Democracy is dead anyway. [Applause.]

Let me repeat, for the benefit of the gentleman from Missouri, that when up before I gave him the language of the solitary farmer up in Vermont, but now I will give him the language of the National Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry of the United States, as expressed by their legislative committee.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] a moment since quoted someone as saying that the farmers did not know what they wanted. Well, I submit if the following appeal from this duly accredited committee sounds as if they did not know:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 4, 1893.

To the members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

GENTLEMEN: In behalf of the farmers of the United States we ask your honorable committee to leave undisturbed the duties now imposed upon agricultural products which are imported into this country to be sold in competition with the products of the farmers of the United States. It is generally conceded that, in former revisions of the tariff, agriculture has not received the same measure of protection accorded to other industries; and, in the late revision, the farmers appeared before the committee and secured, in nearly every instance, such duties as have proven of great benefit to them—and they desire that these duties be maintained as long as protection is accorded to any industry in the land.

By the "late revision" is meant the McKinley bill—

We earnestly protest against the removal of the duty from any agricultural products, such as wool, vegetables, fruits, hay, eggs, live stock, dairy products, and tobacco, unless the products of the factory and mine be also left without protection. Wool is the finished production of the farmer, just the same as cloth is the finished product of the manufacturer.

We seek no class discrimination in our favor, and ask that none be made against us.

Very respectfully, yours,

J. H. BRIGHAM,
LEONARD RHONE,
JOHN TRIMBLE,
Legislative Committee.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The first name read is that of a political farmer from Ohio.

Mr. GROUT. He is the master of the National Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry, the only nonpolitical farmers' organization in the country; and if anyone is authorized to speak for the farmers certainly he is, and there can be no more authoritative declaration from the farmers of the country than the above.

Now, while they make this appeal, what is proposed in this bill? The comparative statement submitted by the committee shows that last year there was a duty of $11,902,000, almost $12,000,000, paid on agricultural imports. It is a favorite proposition of the free trader that protection puts the duty into the pockets of those protected. It is class legislation, they say. They claim, for instance, that the protection which the manufacturer gets goes into his pocket and enriches him. Now, if this be true, the same is true of the farmer when protected.

Here is $12,000,000, according to their doctrine, which has gone into the pockets of the farmers in the last year by the McKinley bill, and yet they say he is not protected. Now, while you leave a duty on manufactured woolen goods of 40 per cent, and leave a duty on almost all other manufactured goods, why will you not respect the appeal of this legislative committee representing the farmers and leave the present duty on wool and other agricultural products? Why not leave them the whole $12,000,000 protection which now accrues to them by the McKinley bill? But instead thereof this bill reduces the duties on their products over $4,000,000. It takes away over one-third of their protection, and this is the way the free-trade Democracy, with its loud pretensions, shows its friendship for the farmer. [Applause on Republican side.]

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Chairman, I propose to say a few words in favor of the proposition of the Committee on Ways and Means to defer the date when the operation of the law removing the duty on wool shall take effect. I am in favor of it because I believe that it is in the direction of deliberation and good judgment.

We have here, in the removal of the duty from wool, probably the most radical change that is proposed by our Democratic policy. It not only affects the farmer, but it also affects the manufacturer of woolen goods, the manufacturer of clothing, and the merchant.

The policy under which these industries are now carried on has been in existence for much more than a generation, and I submit that it is but just and proper that some little time should be given them to adjust the complicated interests to the new situation. If we have endured the evils for so long a time we can, with the certainty that the change is to be made, wait a little longer in order to save them from the confusion and disaster inevitable upon a change made in the middle of the business season. We are not here, as Democrats, to perform a surgical operation, but by the use of adequate remedies to build up the industries of the country and make them permanently prosperous. It is not our policy to destroy or cripple any existing industry, but to make them more vigorous and virile.

I was sorry to detect in some of the speeches that have been made an evident bias against our manufacturing interests. We can not afford to entertain any such prejudices, for they form too large and important an item in the history of our country's progress, and present the most promising field for our future.

Believing that they have been hampered and kept back from a healthy development by an unwise policy, we propose to relieve them from their embarrassments by the inauguration of a better policy, but in making such radical changes we should bear in mind the conditions under which they have existed for so many years, conditions for which they are in great part not responsible, and not attempt to effect by violence what can better be done by conciliatory methods—methods that will convince them that we are not careless of their interests. Otherwise we may bring odium and injury to the cause of revenue reform.

I sincerely believe that the woolen industries of the country have suffered more than any other from an erroneous tariff policy. The proof of this assertion is found in the fact that while nearly every other class of manufactures have succeeded in equaling those of competing manufacturing nations, they almost alone of the whole number are far in the rear—so that while we to-day are able to export nearly everything that we can make, not one dollar of woolen goods can be shipped to a foreign country.

Having been the greatest sufferers by a policy that has complicated their interests with those of the producers of the raw material, they should be more carefully considered. I do not believe, therefore, in forcing this change at the season of the year that would be the most detrimental to their interests. I therefore favor the proposition of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BLAND. I believe the gentleman is an experienced merchant, from headquarters, and I would like to ask him a question for information.

Mr COOMBS. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND. If you postpone the time when lower duties will take effect under this bill until December, on what theory will the merchants of the country import goods from foreign countries? Will it not act as giving a monopoly to the woolen manufacturers?

Mr. COOMBS. No. The clothing manufacturer makes during the summer the woolen cloths for the following winter. Now is the time for him to make contracts with the manufacturer of cloths out of which to make his clothing. If this change is made the manufacturer can safely manufacture to supply his wants, and he can safely buy, for he will have disposed of his product before cheaper cloths can be supplied. The consumer will benefit in anticipation by the natural desire of the merchant to unload all of his stock before the change. It will, in other words, offer some guaranty of safety to him in doing this season's business.

Mr. BLAND. I understand all that; but the question is, On what basis will the importer act who imports clothing, woolen goods, and wearing apparel if the lower duties do not take effect until next December in importing woolen goods for next winter's wear?

Mr. COOMBS. I do not think he will import them. Those that are imported are not usually used in the manufacture of ready-made clothing. At all events the conditions would not be changed from what now exist.

Mr. BLAND. But I speak of those who do import goods. They will not import them under the McKinley bill if the date for this bill to go into effect is put off until next December. If they do import them at all it will have to be done under the McKinley bill, will it not?

Mr. COOMBS. Doubtless; it is simply putting the change ahead to a season when it can be done with less injury or risk of injury.

Mr. BLAND. But my question is as to the merchant who does import woolen goods. In other words, if this bill does not go into effect until next December the duties on all goods imported in the mean time will be levied under the McKinley law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLAND. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND. Now, I wish to put my proposition to the gentleman. If the time for this bill to go into effect is extended until next December the duties under the McKinley law will be collected on all woolen goods during that time.

Mr. COOMBS. That has not been suggested yet, however; but I should of course approve of it.

Mr. BLAND. I know, but that is the proposition.

Mr. BLAND. Now, if you were an importer during that period you would have to pay the duties levied under the McKinley law, and would not that have the effect of practically giving a monopoly to the home manufacturer and shutting out the importer?

Mr. COOMBS. I do not think so. I do not see how it would change existing conditions. It only passes over one season, and I do not see how we can bring our reforms into operation, even were the bill to pass both Houses this month, to make it effective for the season already upon us. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, as I am representing one of the largest woolen manufacturing districts in this country, if not the largest, and as I have not expressed myself yet upon the principles of this bill, I feel that it is my duty before the debate upon this amendment closes to say a word in favor of the amendment. I believe, sir, that this amendment is the most important one that has been or that will be offered to this bill. I believe that, because I know that the people who are engaged in woolen manufactures in the part of the country which I represent, and throughout New England generally, are looking to have the uncertainty which hangs about this bill settled, and I believe, Mr. Chairman, that if we should settle the question by adopting this amendment to-night, within forty-eight hours after that vote has been taken the woolen manufacturers of New England will have orders placed for hundreds and thousands and perhaps millions of dollars worth of goods.

In the district which I represent there are to-day thousands and tens of thousands of laboring people who are out of employment. There are thousands of people in that district who are to-day dependent upon charity, public and private, simply because the mills in which they have been accustomed to work are stopped, and because this uncertainty exists in regard to tariff legislation, so that the owners of the mills can not go on with their work—can not place orders for their goods. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I believe that it will be for the interest of all the parties concerned in the woolen industry of this country to have this amendment adopted and to have it adopted promptly. I understand if this amendment is adopted the other amendment proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means will follow, and that will settle this question so that the mills will be started immediately upon the receipt of the news that this point has been settled.

Why, Mr. Chairman, I know of one concern in my district employing 2,000 hands, where they have cut down the time to one-third of their usual running time, and the mill will soon stop entirely unless some measure of relief is given in this bill, and given soon. I know of another establishment, a hosiery manufactory in my district, employing 500 hands, those 500 employés representing at least 1,200 or 1,500 people who are dependent upon their earnings for support, and I know that the owner of that factory has attempted to place orders where last year he had one order for $50,000, in the city of Chicago, but his orders are refused simply because it is not known when this bill is going to take effect.

So, Mr. Chairman, regardless of all these other questions, it is important, it is for the interest of all concerned, and especially for the interest of the working people, that this should be settled. It will keep them from the poorhouse; it will save them from almost starvation: it will keep them out of the hands of public and private charity, by which they have been humiliated in consequence of the uncertainty that has attended this tariff question.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I hope that this amendment will be adopted, and adopted this evening.

[Here the hammer fell.]

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BOWERS of California. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer to this substitute before a vote is taken. This is a very important question.

The amendment of Mr. BOWERS of California was read, as follows:

Amend the proposed substitute by striking out the words "on the passage of this bill," and inserting "December 30, 1899."

Mr. BOWERS of California. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to Representatives here that for twenty-five years of my life I have been a small farmer—not one of your large farmers engaged not only in farming but in banking and in the lumbering business and in the wool-growing business. I have been one of those small farmers not able to hire help to any extent, one who has held the plow himself, who has followed the harrow, who has sowed the grain, and in the early days in Wisconsin cradled it, or followed the cradler raking and binding, and then hitched my horses to the thrashing machine and followed that for three or four months each year for many years. Having been a small farmer, I know what I am talking about when I speak of the interests of farmers. I am not talking like a farmer who has been brought up in a lawyer's office, or a doctor's office, or a real estate office, or a manufacturing establishment.

I know there are some poor farmers, just as there are some poor lawyers and some poor doctors. But I despise this talking about the "poor farmer." You have never heard me use that term. The farmers of this country are not here as suppliants or mendicants asking for charity. They are here as American citizens, asking to be treated as American citizens, asking to be accorded the same rights that every man ought to enjoy in his own business, the rights accorded the big mill owners, the same protection.

My colleagues from California know that I, though coming here as a Republican, represent the views and wishes of nine out of ten of the Democratic farmers of that State. They know that the majority of the wool-growers of that State are Democrats; and I represent them when I oppose the proposition to put wool on the free list. In every county of that State the wool-growers have got together and are opposing the passage of the Wilson bill. Not a day passes when I do not receive some telegram on this subject.

My desk at my room is full of resolutions passed by the wool-growers of California against the passage of the Wilson bill. When I talk about the farmers, I know what I am talking about. I represent the Democratic farmers of California better than any Democrat on this floor that supports the Wilson bill. I have a letter here——

Mr. BOWERS of California. Has my time expired? Will you not let me read one sentence, which will occupy only a minute?

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words in regard to the pending amendment, on which the discussion seems to have taken a very wide range. I do not think we can well overestimate its importance, and I entirely agree with the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. PAGE] when he says this is the most important amendment we are likely to discuss during the consideration of the bill. I am heartily in favor of the amendment and I hope the Committee of the Whole will adopt it. I have received to-day a telegram from a large manufacturing concern in my district advocating the passage of an amendment with this object.

But I pass from the consideration of this special question to say a few words in regard to the tariff in general, in its relation to the farming interests. Like the gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS], I am a practical farmer—one who, as I believe, has held the plow handles as many days as any member on this floor. As a farmer, I want to say that I consider protection has utterly failed to improve the condition of the farmer—at least, in our section of the country; and I speak from the standpoint of a farmer of the State of New York. In proof of this proposition that the tariff has failed to benefit the farmers as a class, permit me to say, that in our State—in New York—one of the most important, even from an agricultural standpoint, in the Union, there is not to-day, after thirty years of protection, a county in the whole State into which you can not go and buy a farm or your choice of a dozen farms for less than half the cost of the improvements that have been put upon it.

There is no gentleman on this floor from the State of New York, knowing anything about the value of farms as compared with that of thirty years ago, who does not know that they have within that time depreciated instead of appreciating. By a report which was submitted to the Legislature of the State of New York in 1891 by the board of equalization of taxation, it was shown that the present value of farming lands in that State, including all improvements thereon, is only 7½ per cent of the aggregate value of the property of the State. Sir, this statement, it seems to me, carries the conclusion that, however we may differ as to the relative value of protection to the manufacturer and his employés, it has utterly failed to protect the farmer or to advance his interests.

[Cries of "Vote! Vote!"]

Mr. FUNK. Mr. Chairman, like my distinguished friend from California [Mr. BOWERS] I claim to be a practical farmer. I am not a lawyer, a physician, or any other kind of a professional man, but have lived on a farm all my life. It was my lot to be a farmer's boy, and I have kown something of the practical workings of this tariff question with reference to the farmer, while gentlemen on the other side have been studying the philosophy of the matter in the schools.

As my distinguished friend from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] would have you believe that the farmers of Illinois are just on the ragged edge of starvation, I want to say that I represent one of the best agricultural districts in this country, in the central part of Illinois; and that to-day in McLean and adjoining counties lands are selling from $75 to $100 per acre. [Applause on the Republican side.] Mr. Chairman, what has caused this? A protective tariff system inaugurated and sustained by the Republican party.

I can well remember, sir, the "good old days of Democracy" that we have heard talked so much about here. Let me tell you what was the condition under the free-trade system in the days of 1850, or from 1850 to 1860. Why, sir, in our country, and I can show you the figures to prove it, corn sold for 10 cents a bushel, and in order that the farmer might be able to buy an ordinary farm wagon, that cost then $130, he was compelled to haul to market 1,300 bushels of corn. In our days how does this compare with prices? Why, a better wagon can now be bought for $50. Why? Because the laws that have been in operation for a number of years, enacted by the Republican party, have all been in the interest of cheapening commodities to the working classes. The high prices were the result of free trade, the same principle that is sustained by your party now. [Applause on the Republican side.] To-day the same farmer can go into the markets of this country and for a hundred bushels of corn buy the same or a better wagon.

Now compare the good old "golden days" of prosperous Democracy, of which we have heard so much here in this debate, and you can see for yourselves where the difference lies. Why, sir, in those days the farmers and the laborers were paid $8 a month; to-day they receive in the same State from $20 to $25 per month. What brought this about? Simply because we have had a proper protective system that has resulted in the benefit of the farmers throughout the country; so that they are able to pay these wages under existing conditions. It gave them a market for their produce at good prices. Let me give you an illustration of how this thing works.

In 1858 my father was paying at the rate of from $8 to $10 per month for labor, and had one extra hand, a gentleman from the Emerald Isle, an Irishman, a good workingman. At the end of the year my father said to him: "Timothy, do you think you would like to work for me next year?" "I think I would," was the reply. Said my father, "What do you want for wages?" "Ten dollars a month," said Timothy. "I am willing to work for that." Father said, "Timothy, I am going to give you $13 a month, because you have been a good hand and are worth it." [Laughter and applause.] It was then talked about through the community that old Ike Funk was ruining the country by raising the price of wages from $10 to $13.

Why, Mr. Chairman, in those days we had what they called a mowing machine. It cost $150, and it took you all day with that machine to mow 5 acres. To-day, under the operation of an improved system—not the free-trade policy—we have a machine which you can buy for $50 that will cut from 12 to 14 acres a day. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope the gentleman will be permitted to continue his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has arrived when the committee must rise: and the committee can not extend the time.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the tariff bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROOKSHIRE] will perform the duties of the Chair at the evening session, which will be devoted, under the special order, to debate on the pending bill; and in accordance with the order of the House, the hour of 5 o'clock and 30 minutes having arrived, the Chair now declares the House in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House at 8 o'clock p. m., was called to order by Mr. BROOKSHIRE as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is now in session for the further consideration of the tariff bill, and under the special order will resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

THE TARIFF.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. LANE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, while this bill does not, in my judgment, make a sufficient cut in the duties on manufactured articles, it is, nevertheless, a movement in the right direction. It is an indication of the trend of public sentiment toward the uprooting of a system whose abuses have overshadowed its benefits. It is a partial response at least to the demand of an enlightened public sentiment, that a policy which so unequally distributes its favors shall no longer find sanction in law.

Mr. Chairman, we have thoroughly tested the protective system. We have seen its workings for the last quarter of a century. Under its influence favored industries have blossomed as the rose, while on the masses of the people its rays have fallen as the scorching sun of the desert.

Its blessings have been extended to rocky and sterile soil, and its blight to lands enriched by nature. Fortunes have been amassed at the expense of taxpayers. It has clothed the East in purple and fine linen. It has left the West in ragged garments.

This disparity in the distribution of wealth is owing to no natural cause. The Mississippi Valley, in natural resources, is rich beyond all other countries. Her broad acres of wheat and corn wave as an endless sea. Her limitless mineral resources rivet the attention of capital. Her boundless forests invite the ax and saw, and all her material greatness passes in review. Yet she enters not the charmed circle.

Nor is it due to lack of industry or enterprise. In all the light of day, the Western farmer knows naught but work. As year treads upon year his life is given to seedtime and harvest. Toil with insufficient renumeration, often want amid abundance, the pleasure and even the necessaries of life mocking him as a mirage—such is his lot.

To him removed from the scene this statement may seem overdrawn. It is not. My own district, a fair sample of others in the West, may be taken in evidence. Within its borders dwell an industrious, enterprising people. From the Mississippi River in the east over and beyond the Ozarks of the west, farms and hamlets stud as brilliant gems its broad bosom. Nature yields lavishly to the touch of the husbandman. On wheels of commerce roll his products to the market. And yet withal, standing in the background, may be seen the bread-winner grimly waiting for returns that do not compensate. Despite statistics to the contrary, he realizes that his pecuniary condition annually grows worse.

Do not misunderstand me. I make no tirade on the wealthy. From the crown of my head to the sole of my feet is no taint of communism. I would have men build and accumulate, if they do not break that which should run through all their transactions, the golden thread of right. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But when I observe the great bulk of mankind prostrate beneath the heel of greed and avarice; when I observe a small number reveling in ease and luxury, and reflect that this condition is in the main produced by unjust laws, I am sometimes amazed at human forbearance. I may at least be pardoned that intense sympathy I have for the poor. Their lot, their hopes, are mine, and, like Ruth of old, their God is my God, and where they die there will I be buried also. [Applause.]

Let us shift the scene. The sun shines not brighter in the East than in the West. The seasons come and go with the same unvarying regularity. But there neither on the surface nor in the bowels of the earth can be found the means of living. Yet in this high-tariff blessed region is centered the overwhelming preponderance of the wealth of the United States.

The last census report shows that the State of Massachusetts, with a population of nearly a half million less than Missouri, and 800,000 less than Illinois, has an assessed valuation per capita of $962.12, while Missouri has only $293.50 and Illinois $190.11, in round numbers four times as great as Missouri and five times that of Illinois. Maine, with a population of little over 600,000, has a per capita of $467.61, while the State of Kansas, with a population of 1,427,096, has but $244.17. New Hampshire, with about half the population of Maine, has $371.19, while Ohio, with her 3,672,316 people, has but $484.20. Vermont, with less population than New Hampshire, has $515.26, while Indiana, with 1,978,336, has but $386.19. Rhode Island, with but two hundred and seventy odd thousand population, has $962.12 per capita, $57.97 more than the States of Nebraska, Iowa, and Minnesota. Connecticut has a per capita assessed valuation of $480.95 for each of its 746,258 people, greater than Kentucky and Tennessee combined.

To place these figures in another form, the nine North Atlantic States—Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania—have an assessed valuation per capita nearly three times that of the eight South Atlantic States—Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida; nearly twice that of the twelve North Central States—Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, and Kansas, and nearly three times that of the South Central States—Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, and Arkansas. In other words, these nine North Atlantic States have a greater per capita of assessed valuation than both the South Atlantic and North Central States combined, and almost as great as these two with the South Central States added, and yet they contain much less than a third of our population. If we eliminate New York, which does not to the same extent live off the bounty of the Government as the other eight of its group, they comprise but one-fifth of our entire population.

It will be seen further from the census report that these nine North Atlantic States own nearly one-half of the total assessed valuation of property in the United States, and yet their increase per cent of population has fallen far behind that of the North Central and Western States.

These figures, Mr. Chairman, indicate the superior prosperity of those sections. The luxury, refinement, and education which wealth alone can bestow sit here enthroned. Here, too, this side the Alleghenies reside the Modocs of finance, ever ready to issue from their lava beds of gold and precipitate a panic on the country and charge it to the Sherman law, or any other law they can think of.

Here, too, reside the gentlemen who contribute trifling sums to Presidential campaigns; though afterwards the New Yorker does penance by voluntarily expatriating himself, while the Philadelphian unblushingly enters into his reward. All of which illustrates the total depravity of the Pennsylvania Republican. [Laughter.]

What produced this wonderful transformation? What gave to this small percentage of our population such immeasurable advantages? It has been said to be Eastern pluck. Yes, but it is a pluck exhibited in getting hold of the public teat and sucking it for all there is in it. Far be it from me to underrate the Easterner. Wherever the interests of No. 1 are concerned, count him a host within himself. His tact and ingenuity elicit my undisguised admiration. He has performed many wonderful things in his day.

I withhold from him not one iota of his just meed of praise. But all that he has accomplished in the past is as nothing to the miracle he has recently wrought. Why, he can convince the Eastern wing of the Democratic party and the Western wing of the Republican party that it is absolutely right to demonetize silver, although such measure is obviously disastrous to the West. He can convince a small section of the Democratic party and all of the Republican party that, during a Democratic Administration, a civil-service system which retains as many Republicans and as few Democrats in office as possible is that millennial era of political reform of which Mugwumps talk and dream. Sir, there is no limit to his capabilities. [Renewed laughter.]

"No pent-up of Utica contracts his powers." He can soar beyond the empyreal realm of the civil service and stampede Democratic aspirants for post-offices. In fact, his Mugwumpian genius can make a Democratic and a Republican Administration look as much alike as two black-eyed peas. [Laughter.]

But there is one thing, let us hope, he can not do. Let us hope he can not longer lay tribute on the West and South under the name of protection.

Let us examine the philosophy of this system. It rests on the principle that man is absolutely independent; that he needs no help from any source beyond himself; that so far as he is concerned he could perform the functions of his being just as well as though he were the only human being on earth. He is an independent, self-contained atom, sustaining no necessary connection with the universe, and "amid the wreck of matter and the crush of worlds" will defiantly loom up in space, and like Tennyson's brook, "go on forever." As his conditions and relations were not thus fixed in the divine economy, we can at best but speculate on this position. And speculating we may be pardoned for surmising that he will eventually stop somewhere, and that that somewhere will not be the place where there is no tariff on salvation, but that other country which sustains no trade relations by reason of the flaming walls that do hedge it in.

As with individuals so with states that adopt prohibitory tariffs. They assume their independence of all other states. All the means of obtaining the necessaries and luxuries of life are found within their borders. The torrid, the temperate, and the frigid zones are theirs. Every variety of soil and all the treasures of buried earth are there encompassed. The productive resources and capabilities of the entire globe are drained into this promised land, while the mutual dependence of man upon man, of states upon states, is dismissed as a dream of Utopia.

This is the logical position of protection. Indeed, its spread-eagle orators have more than once admitted its correctness by wishing the Atlantic were a sea of fire, that all possibility of foreign intercourse might be destroyed. They would sever all trade relations.

The surplus of the farm and shop they would cast to the winds. They would create anew the Monster Error, imagining that no Red Castle Knight will cut off her head, leaving her thousand cubs to lap up her blood and die of satiety. For as protection feeds upon itself, the inevitable result must follow that the few must draw their nourishment from the many. The exactions becoming more and more extortionate the people will rise in their wrath. Then will come the death not only of the system, but of those it supports.

The proposition is clear that a government which permits one class of its citizens to sell their wares to another class for 50 per cent more than they are worth in the market, and which at the same time, as I shall presently show, limits the labor and products of this latter class to their simple value, must inevitably produce the extremes of wealth and poverty which we see to-day.

There is no protection for the farmer or laborer. Manufacturers are no more humane and philanthropic than other people. They are as active in the pursuit of this world's goods as others, and presumably in such pursuit are no more troubled with qualms of conscience. Their angelic side is not turned with abnormal love and regard upon their workmen. They will pay what wages they are compelled to pay. No more. Therefore, the price of labor is fixed in a free-trade market, where the laborer must not only meet and compete with all comers of his own land, but with the paupers of other countries. Whatever advance in wages he may be able to effect is brought about by intelligent united action and by that alone. No philanthropy is involved in the process. It is the old, the new, and the never-ending battle of self-interest. It is the struggle for bread, which must eventually win, for it has both right and numbers on its side.

And yet, the tariff barons, in the deep disinterestedness of their own concerns, tell us that the fear of the Wilson bill not only injures the cause of labor, but accounts for the present gloomy business outlook. The bowels of their compassion yearn for the poor workman. Their memories are certainly very short. If they will read a chapter from the past, even they may learn to measure more carefully their words. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is well known that the war tariff was in force in 1873, and yet the panic of that year rocked our business interests to their very foundations: and for the five years following, gloom and despondency brooded over the land. It was calculated that 3,000,000 men were thrown out of employment; and it was all under Republican rule.

The Republicans were also in power from 1881 to 1886. During that period of high protective tariffs, 1,323,203 men struck either for higher wages or against a reduction of wages. In 1883, when the Republicans again revised the tariff in the interest of manufacturers, 9,184 business houses failed; the loss being $228,343,000. In the year following business stagnated and a million of men went out of employment, notwithstanding the tariff stood at 50 per cent. Armies of unemployed marched up and down the country and destitution hovered like a vampire over the land.

And now, in this year 1894, we are told that the present business depression is owing to the fear that the Democrats will tinker with the tariff. This depression commenced last summer, when the average tariff was nearly 50 per cent, and from quite a different cause. It came, like that of 1873, at the mandate of the money power, who wanted to put the country on a gold basis. It is a significant fact that the two periods of the most widespread business disaster—1873 and 1893—came at periods when the life of our silver money was taken and gold made the sole standard of values. No man will go further than myself in lifting the burden of taxation from the people. No one can more earnestly advocate a reduction of tariff duties. I believe the tariff to be the legitimate parent of trusts and tramps, and one of the main contributing causes of business disaster, and I believe its reformation will, in a degree, restore better times. But I do not intend that the fact shall be obscured that the greatest curse of this country is the insolent, merciless reign of Lombard and Wall streets. [Applause.]

Yet, gentlemen point to the tariff in the interest of labor.

Madame Roland at the guillotine, exclaimed. "Oh, Liberty, how many crimes are committed in thy name!" And paraphrasing we may well exclaim, "O, Labor, how many crimes are committed in thy name!" There never was a wrong crystallized by force but it was dressed in the garb of right. When Antony sought to flood Rome with tears, it was that his bark might glide to a throne! When Napoleon attempted the subjugation of Europe, it was that the white-winged messenger of peace might spread its pinions over the world! When England puts to fire and sword the natives of Africa, it is to Christianize them—and obtain their inheritance! And so when Protectionists demand that the Chinese wall shall not be leveled, it is to benefit the workman!

Why, sir, this standing song for all occasions was sung with good effect a short time ago. We were told the Sherman law had precipitated a panic and brought ruin on the country. And yet behind that cry stood a sordid, grasping throng, only content if by this means they could perpetuate their power. How the heart of Wall street bled for the poor in that memorable period! No doubt the angels laid down their harps and all heaven turned an astonished eye. Here were misers who forgot their gold, gamblers who threw down their cards, and bankers who locked up the people's money that their grief might have uninterrupted vent at the prospect of the poor laboring man being afflicted with a debased currency. [Applause.] No doubt in that great act of self-immolation the words of the Psalmist came to them:

Blessed is he whose sin is covered.

Sir, when the artist of the future shall place on canvas a representation of patriotic devotion, let him not select for his sketch that seaman who—

> When death careening on the gale,
> Sweeps darkly round the bellied sail,
> And frighted waves rush wildly back
> Before the broadsides' reeling rack—goes down with the cry, "Don't give up the ship." Nor that other Revoluntionary character, incomprehensible, perhaps, to some of this day and generation, who spurned an offer of bribe with the remark that, poor as he was, the King of England had not money enough to buy him. No; not these. But with the divine genius of a Parrhasius, let him picture hypocrisy personified in the crocodile tears of a Shylock, flowing as if in commiseration of the ruin he has wrought. Let him add unfading colors to the accursed love of greed and avarice, and once more paint the living truth, that no transaction is too shady for gentlemen of this kidney. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Aye, the song was sung, and like the siren's but to wreck the listener. And where are the halcyon days that were to follow? The clouds have yet no silver lining. Darker grows the darkness upon the people, albeit the sun shines on the money centers.

Time at last sets all things even.

Shelley's Swellfoot is a tyrant who, long intrenched in power, hears no sound save that of flattery. The complaint of his oppressed subjects interrupts not his apostrophe to Ceres. But, turning to that goddess he exclaims, By thy—power divine

These graceful limbs are clothed in proud array
Of gold and purple, and this kingly paunch
Swells like a sail before a favoring breeze,
And these most sacred nether promontories
Lie satisfied with layers of fat, and these Bœotian cheeks, like Egypt's pyramid,
Sustain the cone of my untroubled brain
That point, the emblem of a pointless nothing.

But his meditation is broken by the voice of the oracle:

Choose reform or civil war,
When through thy streets instead of hare with dogs
A consort queen shall hunt a king with hogs,
Riding on the Ionian Minotaur.

And the legend runs, that the king, heeding not the oracle, was verily hunted down with hogs, and dethroned by the Ionian Minotaur.

Fortified by class legislation and impervious to public protest, our financial dictators pursue their way. They hear no sound save that of sycophancy. The polished surface of the walls in which they dwell reflect their self-complacency, as in unctuous meter they do sing—

Great and high,
The world knows only two.
That's Rome and I.

[Laughter.]

But that tune shall be interrupted by another oracle, and it shall be fulfilled.

Choose reform or political banishment, when through your streets shall shortly ride, instead of coach with liveried footman, the sovereign voter, in the chariot of the People's will.

Sir, the people are pretty tolerably slow to get mad. But when they do get mad, their action is pretty tolerably swift. Those Democrats of modern monometallic faith, who now in their new-born zeal out-Herod Herod, and gravely inform us that the money question is settled for all time, and in the next breath scream for a new bond issue, will have occasion to revise their opinions later on. [Applause and laughter.]

When Presidential bees are humming, and tickling their ears with sweet music, a cold wind will creep out from the west, chilling and killing these little winged messengers of hope. Many idols will be shattered. No Democrat who has repudiated the Chicago platform will be elected President. [Applause.] The tail will not wag the dog. The principles of Democracy will be upheld by men who prefer honorable defeat to false victory. No man is necessary to the party, and no man can destroy the party. Its principles, emanating from Jefferson and illustrated in Jackson, are laid broad and deep in the framework and in the very essence of our institutions, and will live with them through all the years. Men may come and men may go, but these shall abide. And to-day coming from the East and the West and from the North and the South are evidences of a determination to anchor the party in its old moorings.

As the opposition to tariff reform in its ranks melted away so will the opponents of its bimetallic policy melt away.

Pardon this digression. As stated, the price of labor is fixed in a free-trade market. Protection simply enriches the manufacturer. It is the keystone arch of governmental favoritism. Gentlemen tell us it has elevated the condition of our wagemen above that of other countries. This is a rule that works but one way. The laborer of England is better paid than that of Germany, France, or Italy, and yet the first is a free-trade and each of the others a protective-tariff country. It is not germane to seek for the cause of this disparity, since it is not owing to tariffs. A reasonable solution might be found in the characteristic, social, and economic conditions of those countries. There, cast, allied individual and corporate interests bask in the light of government favoritism, while the masses live practically by sufferance.

Bayonets and bullets preserve the inequal relation. So far as tariff legislation is concerned, there is no reason why there should be a particle of difference between the wages of the American and the foreigner. I challenge gentlemen to point to a single law enacted in the interest and calculated or intended to raise the price of labor. It can not be said that laws protecting our manufacturers, and thus insuring their continued prosperity, is in aid of labor. These would exist without protection. They are able now to manufacture cheaper than foreigners. Indeed they have already entered the foreign markets. It is not to be supposed they are doing this as a gratuity. It is presumably profitable. Certainly we should not fall back on the absurd proposition that our ability to enter foreign markets should draw its support from taxation of the home consumer. If the people are to be taxed not only to create millionaires, but, having created them, to enable them to undersell foreign competitors, as they are now doing, let us be honest, and admit once for all that the Republican policy is correct—that the many should be taxed for the benefit of the few. And this, in a word, is the quintessence of protection. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

No, the laborer here is free and intelligent. He has comprehended his relations with the capitalist. He knows that he is the creator of wealth, and knowing this he has taken the only course he can take to preserve his rights, and that is to organize. It is not the laborer who is objecting to a reduction of the tariff. He is no longer beguiled with this twaddle of his employers. No, the wail has been heard too often to be deceived as to the source from whence it comes. The robbers have been too long in power to surrender without a struggle.

Mr. Chairman, my constituents are mainly farmers. Not one thing they produce is or can be protected.

No foreign wheat or corn can compete with them in our markets. They have enough for home consumption, and a large surplus to spare. Now mark the injustice. For every bushel of that wheat and corn sold at home or abroad, they receive free-trade prices—prices that are fixed in England. They must pay an average duty of 50 per cent over and above the reasonable cost of nearly everything they buy, and part with thir products at their simple market value. Do not insult their intelligence by placing a duty on wheat and corn. What benefit will it be? They have, and from the very nature of circumstances can have no competitors in the home market. Do you wonder they are complaining? Has it dawned upon your intellects that they will no longer submit to this injustice? Shall the millions of our farmers be compelled forever to work this endless treadmill, that grinds out wealth to scarce a tenth of our population? [Applause.]

Sir, every civic virtue may die out in our populous centers, patriotism become a byword, and political rottenness revel without rivalry, yet in the valleys and on the mountain tops, where nature prevents the warping of man and freedom draws inspiration from the unfettered breeze, is found the last refuge of free institutions. And this is a class more than all others that a high tariff oppresses. It would seem as though the originators of that scheme had purposely selected as its victims not only this patriotic but this most patient element of our population; an element which in the throes of anarchy or communism has ever sustained the cause of law and order.

A system like this, which produces vast extremes of wealth and poverty, is vicious, and an infringement on natural rights If my neighbor is enriched by means of a law which permits him to appropriate the fruits of my labor he is a legal robber. In an honorable and equal competition the race is to the swiftest.

All can not engage in the same avocation. All can not manufacture. Some must plow and some must mine. And that only is protection which permits the free interchange of these diversified products. Remove unjust restrictions, and man, adapted to his environments, with his enterprise and varied skill, will set flowing the natural streams of trade.

This natural interchange of products insures fair compensation and moderate prosperity to the whole. Because all stand upon equal vantage ground, each benefited by reason of his natural advantages. You would not, for example, plow in the granite rocks of New Hampshire, but in the fertile soil of Missouri. You would not mine for the precious metals in the rich agricultural lands of Illinois, but in the regions of the Pacific Slope. You would not look for wealth in a country naturally destitute of it and of the means of producing it, unless you knew it had been carried there at somebody else's expense.

But high tariffs operate in other respects injuriously to the farming interests. They destroy the markets for surplus crops. This is not due to that standing joke "overproduction." Under just economic conditions, where trade is free and the laborer receives a-live-and-let-live remuneration, many mouths now hungry would be fed, many bodies now shivering with cold would be warmly clad. The present destitution would disappear and contented industry take its place, additional markets would be created and that moderate prosperity of the whole, the infallible indication of just laws, would prevail. Trampism is not the normal or desired state of any considerable body of our people. The idle are the exception, and the immense body of the unemployed to-day are shut out from work solely through iniquitous legislation. [Applause.]

The miners of the Pacific Slope march up and down the country hunting work that can not be found, not because their continued employment was not profitable to them and to the country as well, but because this Government in its determination to create a plutocracy has without remorse and with cold-blooded premeditation assassinated their business. Such an act of vandalism ought to meet with that reckoning its atrocity demands. You point to the smokeless chimneys of factories as a result of the menace of this bill; and yet those fires died out last summer, under the rain that fell from Wall street. Onward swept the storm, submerging all business interests. An "object lesson" was necessary to teach the people what they were about to forget—that the money power is their despotic master, and that its mandates must be implicitly obeyed. And now, to sing last summer's song to this winter's tune, this condition is ascribed to "tinkering with the tariff." Manufacturers running their plants half the year, and under present conditions filling their coffers, may well in view of vanishing bonanzas join in the new fad refrain. Well may they afford for a month or even a year to close down, if by this means they can perpetuate a system which enormously enriches them at the expense of the people.

But to proceed, our prohibitory duties are fast destroying our foreign trade. Exports are annually decreasing, as was desired in the passage of the McKinley law. Trade is reciprocal; a policy of isolation annihilates it. Our surplus wheat, corn, and cotton no longer finds a market. It is dead capital. If this policy continues, Statistics, the great comforter, for all the consolation he can impart will have to go out of business. The beggar no doubt would feel flattered to read of his opulence in the great dailies, and for a while this might stay the pangs of hunger. But nature must eventually assert itself. Despite the pictures of glowing wealth with which we are regaled from time to time, believe me, in the immediate future, the farmers and laborers will turn from their contemplation to seize the helm of government, and run it in the interest of all the people. And they will do it under the banner of Jeffersonian Democracy. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, to the objection that any considerable reduction of duties will create a deficiency in the revenues, now already insufficient to meet the current expenses of Government, it may be answered, Democrats are estopped from making this argument. Our contention has always been that a high protective tariff decreased imports, and therefore revenue. The McKinley law, if it could live a little longer, would be a living demonstration of the truth of this contention.

That tariff, therefore, which invites and does not repel trade—in other words, placed on a purely revenue basis—is one of the efficient means of raising revenue; and, like the gentleman from New York, Mr. COCKRAN, I believe this bill will, to an extent at least, relieve the depleted state of the Treasury, that legacy left to us by the Republican party. But, aside from all this, there are other methods of meeting the difficulty, and the best one is a tax on incomes.

Gentlemen rail against an income tax as though it were something unprecedented. The fact is, it has been in operation in many European countries for a number of years. England has tried it continuously for the last half century, where it has shown an increasing growth and met all deficiencies in the revenue. There, even in that gold-standard country, they are not called upon, in junctures like the present, to issue bonds, but meet the deficit by taxing incomes. They do not have that horror of offending the rich which some men here profess to have. They evidently do not believe it puts a premium on perjury. If it does, the increasing taxes raised by it are an evidence that the perjury is committed in the interest of the Government, and not of the taxpayer. What a humiliating and astounding proposition, that the men of large incomes in the United States are so lost to all sense of honor and decency that they will, through perjury, evade this tax.

Sir, I have said many hard things about plutocrats, but never in my life have I brought them so low as this. I do not, can not, believe it. I am not ready to admit that the men of England, Prussia, Bavaria, Baden, Bremen, Austria, Italy, and Switzerland, where this tax prevails, are more honest, more upright than the citizens of the United States; and I do not believe they will thank gentlemen for this unpardonable slur on their characters. No, Mr. Chairman, they will pay this tax, as they pay all other taxes; for in nature and essence it differs from no other, except that it is more just.

You say it is inquisitorial. Indeed, what taxes are not? In my State we have an officer called an assessor. He goes around to the farmer and asks him some such questions as these:

How much money have you got?

What amount in notes and mortgages have you?

What amount do you hold in stocks, bonds, etc.?

How much corn, wheat, and potatoes have you?

How many horses, how many mules, how many cattle, how many hogs?

Has not your wife a sewing machine? Has she not a finger ring hidden in the bureau? Where are the ear rings she wore last Sunday to church?

Now, you swear this is everything you have on earth, and you have not hidden anything, so help you God? [Applause and laughter.]

Does not that smack a little of the inquisitorial?

Are the feelings of the farmer so coarse and blunt that he can endure this process stoically, while the very minute it is applied to a man with an income of $5,000 his fine feelings are so outraged that he resorts to perjury as a relief? [Applause.]

This system places the burden where it ought to rest. It is notorious that a large proportion of our wealth escapes taxation. Land, horses, and cattle are always in sight, but money, stocks, and bonds are not sought after by the taxing power.

The necessaries of life, more largely used by those of moderate means, are heavily taxed by tariffs, while the luxuries largely escape taxation. This policy should be reversed. Those who have more at stake, and consequently requiring a more extensive exercise of the protective powers of the Government, should be made to pay in proportion to the benefits thus received. All wealth is produced by labor of body or mind, or both, which in either case creates surplus means. Of whatever these means consist, they and they alone should be principally taxable. We should not tax the body or mind. We should tax the effect and not the cause. Whatever is clear gain over and above the comfortable means of living should be made to contribute to the support of Government. I had hoped the bill which I introduced, taxing all incomes in excess of $2,500, would be reported by the committee. This amount is ample for the support of the average family, and is far in excess of what the great bulk of the people receive.

I shall not, however, antagonize any bill of this sort because it does not in this respect meet my full wishes. Great reforms are not accomplished in a single stride. Slowly, but surely, advances the banner of reform. Though temporarily checked here and there it is unfurled in the light of ultimate triumph.

Mr. Chairman, this bill strikes at a principle whose insidious root has taken strong hold on public opinion. Under the spur of self-interest men have been driven to espouse paternalism. Self-reliance has been undermined, individual exertion discounted, and the Government turned into a great almshouse, whither all may go for maintenance. Ingenuity grows perplexed in discovering new fields in which to scatter governmental bounties. Public expenditures mount correspondingly higher, while labor, which sustains the burden of all, must submit to still greater exactions.

It is the province of Democracy to call a halt; to advert once more to the idea that it is the duty of the people to support the Government, and not the Government the people; to rehabilitate decaying energies, and place the citizen on the broad plane of equal opportunity, where each may run his allotted race.

And now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, with the Democratic party in full control of all branches of the Government, we can emphasize this elementary principle by redeeming our tariff pledges.

Recent Republican triumphs on local issues, nor manufactured thunder of protective organs, should frighten us from the work. Through the years has the Democratic party fought to relieve the people of unjust taxation. It now stands on the threshold of its accomplishment. Behind is the disappearing fortress of a robber tariff; before, a people entering on an era in which the shackles of trade have been struck from energies that may leap and bound into new life. In this final hour shall we listen to the seductive whisperings of local interests? History tells us of two princes of the sixteenth century who were friends of a lifetime. The Scandinavian monarch of that period wishing to remove one seduced the other into a promise to effect the purpose, and the reward of his treachery was to be no less than the hand of Christiana, the fair daughter of the King. His heart beating in anticipation of possessing such a treasure, he approached his old friend with a view of carrying out the kinlgy design. But when the time for action arrived the better instincts of friendship and the nobleness of his nature prevailed, and what was intended as a treacherous assault was converted into an increasing attachment.

Sir, if there is one principle dear to the Democratic party it is that of tariff reform. By this cause has it stood through evil as well as good report. And now, on the commanding heights of victory, the seductive whisperings of special interests would bid it betray its policy. Listen some may to the tempter's song, beguiled a while by its sweetness, but when the time for action shall come I doubt not the ties of party fealty will prevail in renewed attachment to the time-honored principles of Democracy.

[Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

[Mr. ELLIS of Oregon addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. McDEARMON withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. CARUTH Mr. Chairman, I began my legislative life at the first session of the Fiftieth Congress, when President Cleveland sent in his celebrated tariff message. During the debate on the measure known as "the Mills bill," framed in accordance with his recommendations, I gave expression to my views in regard to the proposed legislation. I have seen no occasion to change my position. On the contrary, time has strengthened my faith in the correctness of the Democratic doctrine that the power of the Congress to tax the people is restricted by the Constitution to the needs of the Government for revenue, and that to go beyond this limitation is to violate the provisions of that sacred instrument, which the Representatives of the people are solemnly sworn to uphold and defend.

Although the pending bill does not in all particulars satisfy my mind, it tends in the right direction, and shows that the Democratic party proposes to redeem the pledges of the platform upon which it solicited popular support and secured at the last Presidential election such emphatic popular approval.

It is the policy of the political organization now in the ascendency in this Government not to confine the sale of the products of American labor to a narrow home market, but to afford our citizens an opportunity to trade with the people of every nation and of every clime.

To accomplish this much-to-be-desired object, it is not only necessary that we should have wise tariff laws, but in order to maintain our position among the nations of the earth—in order to preserve or to extend our commerce—we must have a safe and stable currency which shall pass as money in all the marts of trade.

This necessity was so ably, clearly, and eloquently set forth by the present distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. John G. Carlisle, in an address before the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York on the 21st of November, 1893, that I quote his remarks in full. On the occasion referred to Mr. Carlisle said:

MR. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN: The subject presented by the sentiment just read is so large and involves so many considerations, not only of public policy but of public and private honor and good faith, that I scarcely know how to respond to it on such an occasion as this, where brevity of statement will be more appropriate than elaborate argument. I am somewhat embarrassed also by the fact that I am to talk to an assemblage of gentlemen who, by reason of their personal experience in commercial and financial affairs, are at least in as good a position as I am to understand and appreciate the value of a sound and stable currency and to foresee the injurious effects of a departure from correct financial methods.

Money and its representatives constitute the tools with which the merchant and the banker perform their parts in the numerous and complicated transactions necessarily occurring in the growth and development of our trade at home and abroad. It is not possible to do perfect work with imperfect instruments, and if it is attempted the consequences will not fall upon you alone, but must be felt sooner or later in every part of the land. Confidence would be destroyed, trade would be interrupted, the obligations of contracts would be violated, and all the evils which have invariably attended the use of a base or fluctuating currency would afflict, not the commercial and financial classes only, but the country at large. But our commercial interests are not confined to our own country; they extend to every quarter of the globe, and our people buy and sell in nearly every market of the civilized world.

A very large part of our farmers, mechanics, and other laboring people find constant and profitable employment in the production and transportation of commodities for sale and consumption in other countries, and the prices of many of our most important products are fixed in foreign markets. Without exception these prices are fixed in the markets of countries having a gold standard or measure of value either by express provision of law or by a public policy which keeps their silver coins equal in exchangeable value to the gold coins at the legally established ratio. The value of our trade with the people of other countries during the last fiscal year was more than $1,700,000,000, and more than $1,100,000,000 of this was with the people of Europe, while with the whole of Asia it amounted to a little over $100,000,000, and with all the countries of South America, excluding Brazil, which has a single gold standard, it was $46,000,000.

While it would be unfair to attribute this unequal distribution of our trade with the outside world to the character of their fiscal legislation, I think it may be safely asserted that this country could not long maintain its present position as one of the most conspicuous and important members of the great community of commercial nations which now controls the trade of the world, unless we preserve a monetary system substantially, at least, in accord with the monetary systems of the other principal nations.

There can be no international legal tender without an international agreement, but there must, from the very necessities of the case, always be a common basis upon which bargains are made and a common currency in which balances are settled. No one nation can determine for the others what that basis shall be or what that currency shall be. It may establish a currency for itself and for the use of its own people in their domestic trade, but the value of that currency will be ultimately measured and conclusively fixed by the international standard, whatever that may be. The stamp on its coins attests their weight and fineness, but it adds nothing whatever to their intrinsic value, and nothing whatever to their exchangeable value in the markets of the world; so that a nation's stock of international money always consists of its uncoined bullion, and the bullion value of its coins.

It can not augment its stock of such money to any extent whatever by overvaluing either gold or silver in its coinage laws, nor can it diminish its stock to any extent whatever by undervaluing either metal. While the number of its nominal dollars, or shillings, or francs may be increased or diminished, as the case may be, the actual value of the bullion or coins will not be changed in the least, for no act of Congress, or other legislative body, can repeal or alter the laws of trade or the laws of finance; and every attempt to do so must result in disaster sooner or later.

No matter, therefore, what our monetary system may be here at home as established by own laws, we must either relinquish a large part of our share in the commerce of the world or conduct our international trade upon such basis as the general judgment of commercial nations may establish. We can not possibly change this situation and, consequently, the only practical question is, whether it is better to establish by law an inferior kind of money for use at home exclusively and another kind for use abroad, or to have all our money good enough for use in every market where our people trade. I believe the people of the United States are entitled to have for use in their domestic trade just as good money as any other people in the world have, and that they are entitled to have just as much of it as may be necessary to carry on their business regularly and profitably. Whether it be gold or silver, or both, or paper based upon the coins of the two metals, the people have a right to demand that it shall be in fact what it purports to be—a just and true measure of value, or the representative of a just and true measure of value.

Gold is the only international money, and all trade balances are settled in gold, or, which is the same thing, on a gold basis, all other forms of currency being adjusted to that standard. It is useless for the advocates of a different system to insist that this ought not to be so; it is so, and we can not change the fact. But the gold eagle and double eagle are not accepted at a particular valuation in these settlements simply because the United States of America have declared by law that they shall be legal tender at their nominal value, but solely because the bullion contained in them, if uncoined, would be worth every where the same amount.

This is a great and powerful Government, but there is one thing it can not do—it can not create money. There are some things, however, which the Government can do for the establishment and preservation of a sound and stable currency. In the exercise of its constitutional authority to "coin money and regulate the value thereof," it can suspend or limit the coinage of either metal whenever it is ascertained that the coins of the two metals, of the same denomination, are of unequal value; or it can change their legal ratio so as to make them as nearly equal in value as possible; or it can maintain the parity of its coins by receiving them and their paper representatives in payment of all public dues and discharge all its own obligations in whatever kind of money its creditors may demand.

The principle or rule of law that the option as to the kind of legal tender with which an obligation shall be discharged belongs to the debtor, and not to the creditor, has no just application in a case where the Government issues its notes to circulate as a currency among the people and, by making them legal tender, compels the people to receive them. The private citizen may very properly avail himself of the lawful right to discharge his private obligations, held by voluntary creditors, in any kind of legal-tender money, because he has only his own personal interest to protect and owes no public duty in the premises. But when the Government of the United States has undertaken to supply the country with a currency, and has issued its obligations in the form of notes to circulate among the people in the transaction of their private business, and has received for every dollar represented by such notes a dollar's worth of the people's services or a dollar's worth of the people's property, its honor, as well as sound public policy, demands that they shall be redeemed upon presentation in money current in all the markets of the world.

No government can honorably disparage or depreciate its own obligations, and especially obligations which it has forced its people to accept; nor can any government honorably discriminate between the different kinds of money or currency which it puts in circulation. Whatever may be the differences in the forms and qualities of the currency while it remains in circulation, when the time for ultimate redemption comes all must be treated alike.

The country has recently heard a great deal about bimetallism and a double standard, and it is possible that these subjects will continue to be discussed to some extent in the future. For my part, I have never been able to understand what is meant by a double standard, or double measure of value, and I have never found any one who could tell me.

To my mind it seems as absurd to contend that there should be two different standards or measures of value as it would be to insist upon having two yardsticks of different lengths or two gallons of different dimensions. If there were two standards, or measures, not equal in value, it is evident that one of them must be a false measure; and if they were of equal value, it is evident that, no matter what the law might declare, there would be in fact but one measure, although composed of two different kinds of material. If, for instance, the silver dollar and the gold dollar were of precisely the same value and could be so kept at all times, there would be, in fact, but one standard, one unit for the measurement of values. Whatever that actual standard may be as established by the laws of trade and finance, whether it be so many grains of fine gold or so many grains of fine silver, it is the duty of the Government to conform to it in the payment of its obligations and in all its dealings with the people.

It does not follow from anything I have said that nothing shall circulate or be recognized as money or currency except gold, or paper issued against gold, nor that the prices of commodities ought to be, or will be, fixed upon the hypothesis that gold is the only money in the world; but it does follow that no part of our currency, whether it be silver or paper, should be permitted to depreciate below the established and recognized standard. Any financial policy which would encourage or permit such depreciation, or create a reasonable apprehension of such depreciation, would unsettle values, paralyze business, arrest the growth and expansion of our industries, and ultimately bring almost universal bankruptcy and ruin upon the country. It must be remembered, however, that it is the function and duty of the legislative department to establish the policy of the Government upon this and all other subjects, and to clothe the Executive with the necessary authority and means to carry it out. When the authority and means are granted, the executive department is responsible for the manner in which the law is executed, but beyond this it has no power to act, and, consequently, no duty to perform.

Gentlemen, the question whether the obligations of the United States will be paid in coin current in all the markets in the world has already been settled, and it has, in my opinion, been settled for all time to come. It has been settled, not by any specific act of Congress prescribing the exact mode of payment, but by the spirit and obvious purpose of the whole body of existing legislation upon the subject, and by the deliberate judgment of the American people and the declared purpose of those who have been intrusted with the execution of the laws. The disposition and ability of the Government to maintain its own credit at the highest possible standard, and to preserve the integrity of all the forms of currency in circulation among the people, can not be reasonably doubted, and ought not to be subjects of serious controversy hereafter.

This does not imply that silver is to have no place in our monetary system. What is to be the ultimate fate of that metal is one of the problems which time and events alone can solve; but for many years, notwithstanding all our legislation in its support, the fluctuations in its value have been so sudden and so great as to demonstrate the fact that it can not be safely coined without limitations into money of final redemption at the existing ratio or at any other ratio that might be established. It is not possible, under existing circumstances, for any one government to establish and maintain a stable relation between the two metals, and for this reason alone, if there were no others, we are bound to place some reasonable limitations upon the coinage and use of silver. How much of it can be safely coined, and upon what conditions it can be safely used, are questions upon which there will be wide differences of opinion; but after all that can be said on both sides they will be finally determined by circumstances which can not now be foreseen, and by the natural increase of our population and the natural growth of our industries and trade.

It is enough to say at present that we have already on hand a stock of silver, coined and uncoined, sufficient to meet all the probable requirements of the country for many years to come. The mints of the United States have coined 419,332,550 standard silver dollars, and we now have 140,699,760 fine ounces of silver bullion, which, at the ratio of 16 to 1, would make $181,914,841, or $601,247,391 in the aggregate. Besides this, we have $76,977,002 in subsidiary silver coin, which is legal tender to the amount of ten dollars, and is by law redeemable in full legal-tender money on presentation. Our total stock of gold coin and gold bullion is $659,167,949.

The five countries constituting the Latin Monetary Union, with a combined population of more than 80,000,000, exclusive of their colonial possessions, have $975,000,000 in gold, $725,000,000 of full legal-tender silver, and $95,000,000 of subsidiary silver coins; and yet they found it necessary several years ago to discontinue the coinage of legal-tender silver and enter into an arrangement by which each country agreed to redeem in gold all its own legal-tender silver coins when presented by any other member of the union. Thus gold has been made to support a limited quantity of silver coin at par in France, Belgium, Italy, Greece, and Switzerland, as it has been required to do in the United States since 1878, and as it must continue to do hereafter, here and elsewhere, unless a great change shall occur in the relative values of the two metals.

Being the greatest silver-producing country in the world, and having on hand a large amount of silver coin and bullion, the United States can not be otherwise than deeply interested in every measure designed to enhance its value and increase its use as money upon a safe and sound basis, but we can not alone maintain its unlimited coinage as full legal tender in opposition to the policies of the other great nations of the earth; and the country is to be congratulated upon the fact that we have at last placed ourselves in a position which enables us to preserve our own monetary system intact and exercise a potent influence in any movement that may be hereafter made for the permanent adjustment of this very important and difficult question.

It is a great mistake to suppose that the supporters of our recent legislation upon this subject were animated by any feeling of hostility to the continued use of silver as money to the largest possible extent consistent with the stability of our currency and the preservation of the public faith. The wisest and safest friends of that metal are those who have had the sagacity to foresee the inevitable effect of its continuous accumulation in the form of bullion in the vaults of the Treasury, and the courage to remove from the statute book an experimental law which from the time of its enactment was a constant menace to the welfare of the whole country.

In conclusion, Mr. President, permit me to thank you and the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York for affording me this opportunity to meet so many of the leading business men of this great business city. Although your organization has been in existence more than one hundred and twenty-five years, and has passed through many trials and vicissitudes, it is but simple justice to say that its counsel has always been wise and conservative, and its action patriotic and beneficial. All that is needed now to insure the early inauguration of an era of great prosperity is such action upon the part of this and similar organizations throughout the country as will inspire confidence and revive the spirit of enterprise among the people. Now that our credit has been greatly strengthened and our currency made more stable and secure, an opportunity is afforded those who control our commercial and industrial interests to resume operations under more favorable conditions than have existed for many years, and I am sure you will cheerfully coöperate in any effort they may make in that direction.

I believe that the pending bill will stimulate our industries, afford remunerative work to our mechanics, assist in breaking down trusts and combines, cheapen the necessities of life to our people, open up new markets for the product of American labor, and promote our commercial standing among the nations of the earth. Inspired by this hope, I earnestly support this measure.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, if no other gentleman desires to occupy the floor to-night I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BROOKSHIRE having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. LANE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the tariff bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. BAILEY (at 9 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PUBLIC BILLS.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 17, 1894.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 1378) to amend an act of Congress approved May 12, 1890, granting to the Aransas Pass Harbor Company the right to improve Aransas Pass;

A bill (S. 299) to extend the time for the construction of the railway of the Choctaw Coal and Railway Company;

A bill (H. R. 340) to authorize the construction of a dam or dams across the Kansas River, within Shawnee County, in the State of Kansas; and

A bill (H. R. 3627) granting certain lands to the Territory of Arizona.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. QUAY presented a memorial of 168 citizens of Spring City, Pa., remonstrating against any change in the duty on window glass; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials signed by sundry glass-workers of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against a reduction of the duty on green and flint glass bottles, as proposed by the Wilson tariff bill; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of cigar manufacturers of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the imposition of a uniform duty of 35 per cent on unstemmed leaf tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. QUAY. I present a memorial of the employés of Thomas Potter, Sons & Co., of Philadelphia, manufacturers of oilcloth and linoleum, remonstrating against a reduction of the duties on these materials as proposed by the Wilson tariff bill. As the memorial is very brief I should like to have it read.

The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

We, the employés of Thomas Potter, Sons & Co., of Philadelphia, Pa., manufacturers of oilcloth and linoleum, at a meeting assembled, respectfully call your attention to the oilcloth schedule in the proposed Wilson tariff bill, and urge you most earnestly to consider the facts we lay before you, of the injustice and disadvantages under which we as workmen in that industry will be placed if that schedule be adopted.

Three of the principal raw materials used in this industry are: first, burlap, proposed rate 30 per cent ad valorem; second, linseed oil, proposed rate 15 cents per gallon; third, white lead, proposed rate 1½ cents per pound, whereas on the finished oilcloth and linoleum the proposed rate is only 25 per cent ad valorem. The injustice of this is apparent, as the rates on the principal raw materials are in excess of the rate of the finished article. At the present time when we work for a full week of sixty hours we are paid the following rate of wages:

Skilled labor, $12 to $20 per week; unskilled labor, $9 to $12 per week; which, while not high wages, yet are fully from 100 to 125 per cent in excess of that paid in Great Britain, and from 200 to 300 per cent higher than in Germany, where there are a number of oilcloth and linoleum factories.

Gentlemen, with these facts in your possession we respectfully urge that you as our representatives see that this injustice is rectified, that we may enjoy as good a livelihood in the future as we have done in the past with our present rate of wages.

SAMUEL HIMMELBRIGHT,
WILLIAM R. HALL,
HARRY KEYES,
Committee.

Mr. LODGE presented a resolution adopted at a meeting of the Boston Society of Water-Color Painters, held January 6, 1894, indorsing the free-art clause of the Wilson tariff bill; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Gloucester, Mass., praying for the early completion of the Sandy Bay breakwater and harbor of refuge at Cape Ann, Massachusetts; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOAR presented a memorial of 59 employés of the Smith Paper Company, of Lee, Mass., remonstrating against the passage of the Wilson tariff bill; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Gloucester, Mass., praying for the early completion of the Sandy Bay breakwater and harbor of refuge at Cape Ann, Massachusetts; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Typographical Union, No. 120, of Lynn, Mass., praying for the Governmental control of the telegraph service; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CULLOM. I present a memorial of about 300 residents of Streator, Ill., who are engaged in the manufacture of window-glass, remonstrating against the passage of the Wilson tariff bill, and especially against the proposed reduction of the duties upon manufactures of that article. I desire to state that the memorial comes from a little city which is now made up almost entirely of men engaged in that and other manufactures of a similar nature. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I present the petition of H. C. Yetter, a member of Columbia Typographical Union, No. 101, of Washington, D. C., praying for the passage of an act to establish governmental ownership and control of the telegraph service. This is a petition largely in the nature of an argument on the subject, and I ask the Senate to allow it to be printed as a document so that it can go before the Committee on Interstate Commerce in a shape to be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection the petition will be printed as a document, and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM presented a memorial of the American Lacteal Company of New York City, manufacturers of milk sugar, remonstrating against a reduction of the duty on that article; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McMILLAN presented the memorial of S. W. Connell and 85 other citizens of Gogebic County, Mich., remonstrating against placing iron ore on the free list; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a petition of the Wool-Growers' Association of Columbus, Ohio, adopted at a meeting held January 10, 1894, praying that no reduction be made in the duties on wool or woolen goods. This is a petition from a very responsible body. It contains a great many facts and figures which I think are important. I do not think it is quite so bulky as it appears to be, and I should like to have an order made to print it as a document, and have it referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio that the petition be printed as a miscellaneous document?

Mr. SHERMAN. Without the signatures.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without the signatures. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN presented memorials of 50 citizens of Barlow, of 68 citizens of Norwalk, of 100 citizens of McArthur, and of 88 citizens of Ward, all in the State of Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the Wilson tariff bill; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of Cigar-Makers' Union, No. 173, of Zanesville, Ohio, remonstrating against a further increase of the internal-revenue tax on cigars; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TURPIE presented the petition of William T. Wade, of Indianapolis, Ind., praying that he be granted an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Herman Ridlen, of Greenfield, Ind., praying that he be granted a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GALLINGER. I present a communication in the nature of a petition from the Central Labor Union at Concord, N. H., in favor of Government ownership of the telegraph service. The petitioners express a desire that Congress shall pass a law to place the present telegraph lines under Government control as part of the postal business or build new ones.

I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PEFFER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 754) for the relief of the Southern Railroad Association, lessees of the Mississippi Central Railroad Company, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 288) for the relief of Clara A. Graves, Lewis Smith Lee, Florence P. Lee, Mary S. Sheldon, and Elizabeth Smith, heirs of Lewis Smith, deceased, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PALMER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 435) granting the right to personally inspect and have attested copies of all evidence and reports filed or used in proceedings to obtain a pension, and for other purposes, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. FRYE. I reported from the Committee on Commerce a few days ago the bill (S. 497) to amend "An act to amend section 4400 of Title LII of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the regulation of steam vessels," approved August 7, 1882; and also to amend section 4414, Title LII, of the Revised Statutes, "regulation of steam vessels," and stated that later on under the instructions of the committee I would file an amendment. I ask leave now to report the same bill from the committee with the amendment and have it take the place on the Calendar of the bill reported at the former date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Arkansas in the chair). In the absence of objection it will be so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1215) for the relief of Lenness A Jackson, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 117) for the relief of W. L. Adams, of Oregon, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

A. P. H. STEWART.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1325) for the relief of A. P. H. Stewart, to report it without amendment, and submit a report thereon. The bill proposes to appropriate $185.69. A similar bill has passed the Senate heretofore, and I ask the consent of the Senate to put it on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon that the bill be now considered? The Chair hears none, and the bill will be read at length as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to reëxamine and settle the following claim for tax on bagging and rope wrongfully paid on Government cotton, alleged to have been illegally assessed and collected, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amounts of taxes so found by said Commissioner of Internal Revenue as aforesaid to have been illegally and improperly assessed and collected, to the party hereinafter named: Provided, That the amount paid in any case shall not exceed the amount hereinafter named:

To A. H. P. Stewart, $185.69.

Mr. HOAR. Is there a report with the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is so stated.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps the Senator from Oregon will state the substance of the report without having it read in full.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The committee at this time have readopted a report submitted at the last Congress by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS]. The bill as introduced originally covered a number of claims—some five or six. All were eliminated, however, from the bill except this one claim of $185.69. It is a claim for taxes alleged to have been illegally collected by the Government, and that question is by the bill submitted to the Department.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me one moment, I wish to call his attention to what I think is the importance of the matter. The question under what circumstances the Government or the people of one year should repay taxes wrongfully exacted formerly is a very difficult one, and any decision of it has very far-reaching consequences. For instance, there are some gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber who think we should refund the cotton tax, in regard to the constitutionality of which the Supreme Court were equally divided. We have a measure for that purpose brought up at every session. It has not been the general rule of Congress, I suppose, to refund a tax when it was illegally collected simply because, under the provision of law, the claimant has a remedy for recovering the tax. It seems to me that whether it is a few dollars or a half million dollars there ought to be a clear statement of the principle on which in such a case the committee proceeded so that we may see we are not getting ourselves into difficulty and making a precedent.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is very true; but I understand that this was a tax collected upon rope and bagging used in packing cotton and it turned out that those were articles not subject to tax.

Mr. HOAR. It was an internal-revenue tax?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. An internal-revenue tax.

Mr. HOAR. How could there be an internal-revenue tax on rope or bagging?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. There is none, but it was collected all the same. The proposition of the bill is to refund the tax to this man.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. If I may have one word more before the Senator from Iowa proceeds, who no doubt understands the matter better than I do, I will state that there have been a number of instances where merchants and manufacturers in my own State have made application for a refund of internal-revenue taxes and customs duties, and the Committee on Finance have declined to give them a remedy; and in the cases where they have declined, although I presented the petitions, I think I was satisfied the committee were right, certainly in some cases. It is very important whenever it is done that there shall be a clear statement of the rule.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to hear the report read so as to show why this applicant did not file his claim with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue under the statute and make his case for a refund of the tax within the statute of limitations.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I can answer the question of the Senator from Iowa, I think, to his entire satisfaction. He supposed he had made the claim as provided by the statute and within the time, but it turned out that it was made in such a bungling way that the Commissioner did not regard it as a proper presentation of the claim. It was presented by a letter of John W. Bell, attorney, which is very brief. The letter, it will be seen, covered a lot of claims without specifying particularly what each claim was. It reads as follows:

DICHMAN, BELL & CO., ATTORNEYS AT LAW,
OFFICE NO. 412 FIFTH STREET,
Washington, D. C., August 1, 1871.

SIR: I desire to file with the Bureau of Internal Revenue the cases of Messrs. Stewart & Co., J. L. Reese & Co., Robbins & Aram, J. A. Sample, Root & Williams, Johnson Hobs & Co., C. A. Weed & Co., and others for the refunding of the tax paid for tare on the baling and roping of cotton. The necessary proofs are being prepared now, and I desire thus to file the claims informally, so as to come within the limitation prescribed by general orders, etc.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN W. BELL.

Gen. A. PLEASONTON,
Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Washington, D. C.

This man placed his claim in the hands of Bell as his attorney and supposed it had been presented in proper form. It was not done, as is evident from this bungling letter. There is another letter here from Mr. Mason, the Commissioner, which I will read if the Senator desires to hear it.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be read.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. However, the bill to which the letter relates covered a number of claims in addition to Mr. Stewart's. The letter is addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Claims, and is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., February 18, 1892.

SIR: I am in receipt of yours of the 2d instant inclosing a copy of bill (S. 1730) for the relief of A. P. H. Stewart and others, and requesting that I cause to be forwarded for the use of the Committee on Claims all papers on file in this Department relating to the claims, and also that I favor the committee with my opinion as to the merits of the same.

Senate bill 1730 proposes to authorize and direct the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to reëxamine and settle certain claims, as follows:

1. A. P. H. Stewart, for $185.69.

That is this claim.

This is a claim for the refunding of taxes alleged to have been paid on tare of cotton in September, 1865. The claim was filed in this office February 13, 1888, and was rejected by my predecessor in office for the reason that it was not presented within the time prescribed by section 3228, Revised Statutes.

Claimant relied on a letter addressed to this office by his attorney, J. W. Bell, August 1, 1871, to save the bar.

That is the letter I have just read. The Commissioner proceeds:

I am satisfied that the $185.69 was erroneously collected by the United States as tax on tare of cotton, and I believe that the letter of August 1, 1871, filed by Mr. Stewart's attorney, should be considered as the informal filing of the claim; but as the case was decided by my predecessor with a full knowledge of all the facts, he deciding that the Bell letter identified neither the claim nor the claimants, I have no authority to review his decision.

This communication is signed by John W. Mason, Commissioner.

That is all of the letter which relates to this claim, and I have stated all I know about it.

Mr. ALLISON. The bill involves a small sum, but a great many of these claims have been presented to the Committee on Finance, and I understand we have made a uniform rule that the claimant must show some reason why he did not file within the specified time his complaint before the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, or he must show that he had filed it and for some reason the claim was disallowed.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Commissioner states that if this was a case of first instance he would hold that it was a sufficient filing.

Mr. ALLISON. He thinks it is a just claim?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. But it seems this is one of a number of claims. May I ask the Senator what becomes of the rest of them?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The rest of the claims were for taxes on cotton, which we disallowed.

Mr. ALLISON. Were they included in the Bell letter?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Yes; they were.

Mr. ALLISON. Then this is the only claim in the Bell letter, which the Senator has read, that has been allowed by the committee?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It is the only one. I will call attention to what the other claims were. The next claim was in favor of this same claimant, A. P. H. Stewart, for internal-revenue tax paid on 183,400 pounds of Government cotton, amounting to $3,668. The next was for $4,642.32 internal-revenue tax paid on 232,116 pounds of Government cotton.

Mr. HOAR. In what State or district was that?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It was in Kentucky, I believe.

Mr. HOAR. What is the date of the payment of the tax?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. In 1865.

Mr. ALLISON. Nearly thirty years ago.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Those are the only two claims in favor of Stewart. Then there was a claim of C. A. Weed & Co., also included in the Bell letter, for $794 for tax paid on cotton. The committee disallowed all those claims, but it allowed the amount of $185.69 paid on tare of cotton on the statement of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that the tax was illegally collected.

Mr. ALLISON. Although this is a small sum it may involve other very large sums. It seems to me the committee should make a careful report upon this particular bill, giving the reasons why they have allowed the claim, with the letter of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and so on, in order to exclude other claims that may be involved. I know we are in the habit here of allowing claims, and then after a few years the allowance becomes a precedent for other claims. I remember very well that some years ago we allowed the Chickasaws a certain claim on account of a misstatement of accounts long before in the Interior Department. That claim, after a good deal of consideration, was finally allowed, after having been adjudicated in the Interior Department; but after we allowed the principal of the claim and it was paid, I understand that now there is a bill pending in this body providing for interest upon the claim for forty years, more or less, the interest being double the amount of the original claim.

Unless we are careful as respects these questions we shall involve the Government in the payment of very large sums. I know there are a great many claims pending where parties desire to have the bar in the statute of limitations removed; and I think the report should show that the committee consent to the removal of this bar, because there was really no laches on the part of the claimant. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that he allow the bill to go over until a careful report can be made.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I am willing to do that, but I desire to state my understanding of the case. I did not make the report at the last Congress. It was made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS]. My understanding is that this is a case covered by a certain section of the Revised Statutes providing for the refunding of exactly this kind of a tax, and the only question in reference to the matter is whether the letter was presented in time. That is all there is to it.

Mr. PLATT. That there are other cases of this sort I happen to know from an incident in my own Senatorial life. A party in Connecticut, having a right to have a refund of tax illegally paid, had made his claim within the time allowed by statute. It was the fault of the collector of internal revenue that it had not been forwarded to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue so reported. The claim was small, but I took a great interest in it and argued it before the First Comptroller as if it had been a case in the Supreme Court. I thought I had convinced the First Comptroller that the tax should be refunded, but I found that he had written a long opinion applicable to such cases, and he would not take back his former opinion. I know that there must be a great many of these cases.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Before the bill goes over I ask that the letter of June 5, 1893, from the then Commissioner of Internal Revenue, be read. Then I will ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the letter will be read as requested.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let me suggest that it be printed with the report. If it is printed in the RECORD we will not find it when the bill is called up again. Let it be printed as a part of the report, to accompany it. Then we shall have it on our files.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will go over for the present and take its place on the Calendar. The report of the committee will be printed.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION AND NATIONAL MUSEUM REPORTS.

Mr. GORMAN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following concurrent resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed of the reports of the Smithsonian Institution and the National Museum for the year ending June 30, 1893, in two octavo volumes, 10,000 extra copies; of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 5,000 copies for the use of the Smithsonian Institution, and 2,000 copies for the use of the National Museum.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1446) to amend sections 5579 and 5591, Title LXIII of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1447) to grant the right of way to the Kansas, Miami and Southern Railway Company through the Indian Territory and Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1448) for the relief of James A. Mitchell, of Sebastian County, Ark.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1449) for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth L. Traweek, of Sebastian County, Ark.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WHITE of California (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1450) to provide for an irrigation survey of the Great Plains and of the semiarid belt of country between the ninety-seventh degree of west longitude and the eastern foothills of the Rocky Mountains; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1451) for the relief of George B. Cosby; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1452) to construct a road from Springfield, Ill., to the national cemetery adjacent thereto; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PALMER introduced a bill (S. 1453) for the transfer of a portion of the exhibit of the Department of State at the World's Columbian Exposition to the Columbian Museum of Chicago; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Quadro-Centennial (Select).

He also introduced a bill (S. 1454) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to transfer the reproductions of the caravels of Columbus to the Columbian Museum of Chicago; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MARTIN introduced a bill (S. 1455) for the relief of Jennie E. Jones; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KYLE introduced a bill (S. 1456) to fix the pay, allowances, pensions, retirement and rank of the veterinarians of the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. QUAY, it was Ordered, That George R. Burnett have leave to withdraw his papers filed at the Fifty-second Congress with Senate bill No. 3665, entitled a bill for the relief of George R. Burnett.

HARBORS OF SUPERIOR AND DULUTH.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed:

Concurrent resolution directing the Secretary of War to appoint a commission of engineers to examine and report upon the cost of deepening the harbors of Superior and Duluth and their entrances to a uniform depth of 20 feet.

Whereas Congress has sanctioned by legislation the project of a 20-foot waterway between Buffalo and Duluth and Superior; and

Whereas the channels in Superior and St. Louis bays at the west end of Lake Superior are the last connecting links in this chain of improved navigation; and

Whereas more than two-thirds of the commerce passing the Sault Ste. Marie goes to or from Duluth and Superior; and

Whereas the deepening of the channels between the Great Lakes, costing very many times that of the betterments needed at Superior and Duluth, will be of small account unless vessels drawing 20 feet can readily and safely enter Superior and Duluth entrances and get up to their docks: therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to appoint a commission, to consist of three engineers, to examine the harbors of Superior and Duluth and the entrances thereto, with a view of ascertaining the cost of deepening said harbors and entrances to a uniform depth of 20 feet, and to report their conclusions to the Secretary of War without delay, to be by him transmitted to Congress.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on December 21, 1893, approved and signed the act (S. 1021) to grant the right of way to the Kansas, Oklahoma Central and Southwestern Railway Company through the Indian Territory and Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on December 25, 1893, approved and signed the joint resolution (S. R. 43) relieving the employés of the Record and Pension Office who were injured in the Ford's Theater disaster from the operation of the law restricting the amount of sick leave with pay that may be granted by heads of Departments.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had, on January 15, approved and signed the act (S. 439) for the relief of David B. Gottwals.

REPEAL OF ELECTION LAWS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask an order of the Senate that there be printed for the use of the Committee on Privileges and Elections 2,000 additional copies of Report No. 113, part 2, the views of the minority of the committee against the passage of the election repeal bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the order will be granted.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is that a request for the printing of additional copies?

Mr. CHANDLER. For the printing of 2,000 additional copies for the use of the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why not make the order to print the majority and minority reports together.

Mr. CHANDLER. The reports are printed separately, but I have no objection to printing them together.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not see any of the Senators present representing the majority of the committee, but there certainly ought to be an equal number of the majority report as well as the views of the minority printed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will submit a motion that 2,000 copies of each of the reports be printed.

Mr. PLATT. Together?

Mr. CHANDLER. No; separately.

Mr. COCKRELL. They ought to be printed together. I suggest that that would be a great deal better.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is always better to have the majority and minority reports printed together.

Mr. CHANDLER. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri, and I ask that an order be made that 2,000 additional copies for the use of the Committee on Privileges and Elections be printed of the report, parts 1 and 2 together.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills:

A bill (H. R. 156) for the establishment of a light and fog-signal station near Butler Flats, New Bedford, Mass.; and

A bill (H. R. 4340) to amend section 407 of the Revised Statutes so as to require original receipts for deposits of postmasters to be sent to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department.

CONDITION OF THE CIVIL SERVICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no other resolutions, concurrent or otherwise, the resolution offered by the Senator from Florida coming over from a former day is now before the Senate, and will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. CALL on the 16th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment be required to examine into the condition of the civil service of the United States and the expediency of its retention or increase, and to report to the Senate by bill or otherwise.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I should like the Senator from Florida, before I know whether I shall desire to object to his resolution or not, to state the real object and purpose and scope of the proposed inquiry. If the expectation or the desire is that the civil service shall be retrenched, then I am most heartily in favor of the resolution. If, however, it is a proposition to further extend the rule of the civil-service law over and above what it has been heretofore extended, then I am opposed to the resolution.

It seems to me that the civil-service law has already been extended far beyond the purpose and intent of the first law; it seems to me it is being used for purposes which were never intended by the Congress of the United States when it became a law. It has been extended to railway mail clerks, to post-office inspectors, to physicians at Indian agencies, and it has been extended in various and divers other directions which were not contemplated, as I conceive, by the original civil-service law.

In addition to that, I am told that the present Postmaster-General extends what he calls the spirit of the law, but not its letter, to the fourth-class postmasters throughout the United States, and that a rule has been made authorizing and permitting them to hold their offices for the period of four years from the date of their appointment.

We all know that there is no term fixed by law for fourth-class postmasters; we all know they hold their offices at the discretion of the Postmaster-General, and that the civil-service law neither in its letter nor in its spirit was ever intended to apply to such cases as those to which it has been extended, not in the letter—that is not claimed—but that by the spirit of the law fourth-class postmasters are permitted to hold office for the period of four years, unless charges of some character or description are brought against them.

I think this is an unfortunate rule. I think that such a rule tends to cause men to prefer charges which possibly ought not to be preferred. I believe that under the law which stands on the statute book the present Postmaster-General should appoint men in harmony with the party to which he belongs to the fourth class post-offices, and not seek to use either the letter or the spirit of the civil-service law to extend the period of their service. The fourth-class post-offices have always been regarded as held at the pleasure of the Postmaster-General, and the almost universal custom has been to change them as an Administration changed from Democratic to Republican, or vice versa.

The result under the present rule by the last Administration was to change the fourth-class postmasters as rapidly as they could be appointed; yet under the present Administration some of them are permitted to hold their offices for four and even for five years. I, for one, say that I believe that there is a great deal of humbug about this civil-service business. I am not in favor of extending it one iota beyond what has already been done. [Applause in the galleries.]

There is one other point to which my attention has been called. Just before and even after the present President of the United States was elected there were a number of cases where Republicans then holding such offices resigned the office and had some other Republican appointed in their place, and now it is held that that Republican is entitled to fill the office for four years, unless a charge of some kind is made against his character.

I say, Mr. President, that this is not my idea of republican government and it is not my idea of the way this Government should be run. I am unalterably opposed, as I said, to any extension of the civil service beyond the point to which it has already been extended.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the resolution has nothing whatever to do with the subject of the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas. The Civil Service Commission, the statute which created it, and its proceedings are one thing, and the civil service of the Government of the United States is another thing.

The resolution has no party reference, no connection with party politics. It is a question whether or not the persons performing the civil service of the United States have been properly apportioned according to law amongst the people of the different States. Petitions are before the Committee on Civil Service for an examination into the subject, particularly with reference to the State of Florida. It is claimed that the assignment of persons in the civil service who properly belong to that State has not been regarded; that an undue proportion has been given to other States, and that persons who are not residents of the States from which they purport to come are in the service credited to States to which they do not properly belong.

Quite a number of statements of this kind in reference to citizens of different States have been made, and as that committee is properly charged with the subject of investigating and reporting to the Senate in regard to the civil service of the United States and in reference to its retrenchment, two specific subjects committed to it, it was thought proper that a resolution should be introduced specially authorizing it to inquire into these subjects. The resolution has no reference to any party distribution of the appointments or to any increase of the service.

It does not matter what may be the motive with which a resolution is introduced, the question is as to the propriety or expediency of an inquiry proposed by the resolution and its advantage to the public service.

I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment in order that they may examine and report upon it.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, one word. If the Senator from Florida had no reference to the civil-service branch of this Government, his resolution is very unfortunately worded, for it bears that impression upon its face, and such is the general understanding of its object.

I am glad to hear the Senator say that he has no purpose by the resolution to extend what is called civil-service reform to other branches of the public service. If his purpose be only what he has said, I have no objection to his resolution. It was for the purpose of calling out the intention and scope of the resolution that I called upon the Senator for an explanation. If it is not his intention to increase the branches to which the civil-service law shall apply, I have no objection to the proposed investigation.

There was one thing else which I failed to say in connection with this matter and the evils which I conceive have grown up by the extension of this system. The law, it is true, provides that the President of the United States may from time to time extend its provisions to other branches of the service. I am informed that just before President Arthur went out of the Presidency of the United States he made a large extension of the classes to which it should apply; I am informed that President Cleveland in his last term did the same thing to a certain extent, but probably not to the same extent, and that President Harrison, just before the expiration of his term, extended this law to another class of the service to which it had not been extended before.

I think these are subjects which ought to be remedied, and if the Committee on Civil Service will report a bill to restrict the extension of the system, I shall be glad to aid the Senator from Florida in the passage of such a bill.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I did not understand the resolution of the Senator from Florida to touch at all the subject of improving and extending the domain of the Civil Service Commission of the United States, into which partisan consideration and strife should not enter. But I understood it to refer to increasing the efficiency of the present civil service whatever might be the mode or principle of appointment or selection. But as the Senator from Arkansas has made the observations which the Senate has heard, I do not think that they ought to pass without an expression of emphatic dissent.

Whatever may be the difficulties in a complete application of the principle of what is known as civil service-reform, and whether the action of the present Executive and the present Administration or of past Administrations has come up to that principle, I do not see how anybody can desire to continue a system which has prevailed certainly since the time of Andrew Jackson, if not before, of using the offices of the United States, offices intended and created to serve the people, to bribe them to activity in the service of political parties.

When I came into public life here in 1869 the matter had already gone to a scandalous extent, and great public offices, postmasters, officers for the collection of the internal revenue, officers of customs, even judgeships were used as a reward first and primarily of service to a particular political party, and afterward as rewards for service within the party to the fortunes of particular political chieftains. It had become a scandal in my own State, it had become a scandal in New York, that the great custom-house in which two-thirds or three-quarters of the whole customs revenue in the country is collected should be managed in the interest of party. I think there is a general feeling among the people in favor of the reform. I do not think you will get any applause anywhere for the doctrine uttered by the Senator from Arkansas except from an officeholder or from an office-seeker.

Mr. ALLEN. With the consent of the Senator from Massachusetts, I should like to ask him a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Arkansas in the chair.) Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts does not the civil-service law as now construed have a tendency to fasten upon this country a distinct class of officeholders entirely apart from their merits?

Mr. HOAR. I do not think it has that tendency or that it ever will have that tendency. If it have or if it ever does have that tendency hereafter, it will be very easy to amend it so as to prevent such a result without interfering with its fundamental principles. But I do not see what reason can be given for the selection of a fourth-class postmaster not on consideration of his efficiency, of his likelihood to introduce good and efficient reforms into the service, his having a place of business, if the Government does not provide one which is most convenient to the public; of his being a popular, worthy, and estimable citizen; but solely on consideration whether he is likely to do good and active and efficient work for the Republican party or the Democratic party, and such a motive for political activity is, in my opinion, debasing and degrading.

I do not think it was a good thing when the present Administration came into power that all the consulships of the United States should be suddenly and promptly changed. The expression which has got into the press of "looting" consulships is hardly an extravagant statement. In saying this I wish to repeat what I said a minute or two minutes ago, that the scandal grew up and grew to its head under Republican administration in the past and that the present President, although in many respects he has failed, as it seems to me, to come up to his own professions, and certainly has he, like all his predecessors, failed to come up to the full strictness of the doctrine as avowed by civil-service reformers, has, on the whole, set an example which is better than that set by the early Republican Presidents.

I do not make this remark for the mere sake of making a point upon an Administration with which I differ; but admitting that the same thing has been done in the past, I think it is not a good thing that every foreign consulate and embassy of the United States should be filled by a new man and a supporter of the dominant political party every time there is a change in political administration.

Mr. President, the blame for the changes in the consular service of the United States has been attempted to be placed by the civil-service reformers upon a well-known gentleman of my State, Mr. Josiah Quincy. It is unjust. The men who undertake to attack that gentleman, who, I believe, is the chairman of the Democratic State central committee in Massachusetts, or has been at any rate recently, intend, it seems to me, to make a scapegoat of him and to do him an injustice.

It is a timid and time-serving attack which is made upon him by these professed civil-service reformers. He was not President of the United States, and the appointing power of these officers is lodged by the Constitution and the laws in the President of the United States. He was not the constitutional adviser of the President of the United States in the Department of State; and you might as well undertake, if the President of the United States had dismissed from our country the representative of a foreign country owing to some diplomatic difficulty, to criticise the doorkeeper of the White House for the act, as to undertake to criticise Mr. Quincy for these changes in the consular service. The responsibility, be it right or be it wrong, is with the President of the United States, and the attempt to transfer it to Mr. Quincy is nothing in substance but an undertaking to introduce in modern times the old fashion when a boy king was growing up of keeping another boy with him who should be whipped when the baby king did wrong.

I make these remarks, Mr. President, in justice to a gentleman with whom I differ politically, but who is a respected and honored Democrat in Massachusetts.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts said we would find no sentiment in this country opposed to the present mode of civil service or that would indorse the remarks that I have made probably, to speak accurately, except it was an officeholder or an office-seeker. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts there are a good many thousand Republican officeholders who will not indorse what I have said, because they want to hold on under the civil-service law. Those who are holding office are likely to agree with the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senator is mistaken if he thinks that the public sentiment of the country is that you shall build up a class of officeholders who shall have the right to these offices, who shall hold them for life, who are responsible not to the people or any one else, who will be intrenched, and who will cut off all other applicants save and except the fortunate few who may happen to be in office.

I wish to say another thing to the Senator from Massachusetts. He said the consuls and various other officers ought not to be changed. Mr. President, I believe a Democratic President ought to be surrounded by Democratic advisers and Democratic friends. I do not believe you can successfully run any Administration when the head of the party has one political faith and the officeholders under him are of a different political faith, and all seeking, by every means in their power, to drag him down and make his Administration a failure. I think the President of the United States ought to be surrounded and aided in his office by his party friends, and not by his party enemies. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the duty of the Chair to admonish persons in the galleries that expressions of approval or disapproval are violations of the rules of the Senate, and they must not be indulged in.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I was in hopes that the Senator from Florida would broaden the resolution so as to embrace the inquiry as to whether it would be expedient to repeal the present civil-service law or not. The party to which I belong is not now in power, but in view of the fact that it is likely to come into power in 1896 if the present condition of affairs exists, I should be very much pleased indeed to have the civil-service statute, which I believe to be inefficient, wiped out so that we can have a fair and clear field at that time.

I am satisfied, Mr. President, that the results of the civil-service statute as it now exists are vicious and wrong. I think I am clearly within the truth when I say it has a tendency to grow up in this country a distinct class of officeholders, who are to hold their offices indefinitely in consequence of their ability to answer certain formulated educational questions put to them by overnice examiners. It is to take out of the hands of the great body of the American people the control of their Government and to put it in the hands of a very few that the law was, in my judgment, passed. Inquiry in quarters that are reliable satisfies me that the civil-service law as now administered, and as it has been administered since its enactment, is a mere snare and delusion. I believe that the great mass of the people of this country, as they come to understand the workings of the law, are beginning to condemn it, and I do not believe the Senator from Massachusetts voices the sentiment of the people when he speaks to the contrary.

I should like to see the pending resolution broader, so as to authorize and direct the committee to make a thorough inquiry into the effect of this legislation, and ascertain whether it is expedient to repeal it and institute some other and efficient legislation in its place.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the declaration made by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] touching the civil service law and its operations it seems to me can be properly challenged on this floor. When the Senator says that nobody in this country but officeholders and office seekers are opposed to the present civil service of the Government, I think he misapprehends the temper and the feeling of the people of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. If he thinks I said so, he misapprehends what I said.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I should like to get it exactly correct. Perhaps he wants to reply to what I said. It was that I did not think anybody would applaud the sentiment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] except persons in the two classes named.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a distinction without a difference, Mr. President. The Senator from Massachusetts is always technical, and he always takes exception to any criticism that is made upon his language.

I do not propose to detain the Senate for more than a moment upon this question. I am opposed absolutely and utterly to the civil service law as it exists to-day. In the other House I voted for its repeal and I would like to have an opportunity before my term of service in the Senate expires, to vote against it here. I do not wish to weary the Senate, but I desire to call attention to the fact that while this technical examination is insisted upon when men and women enter the service of the Government, the same men and women can be degraded in the service, can be promoted arbitrarily, can be dismissed without cause, and neither the Civil Service Commission, nor Congress, nor the President apparently has the power to stop that procedure. It is an injustice that can readily be verified by any Senator who will take the trouble to verify the matter.

Mr. President, take two instances of the workings of the civil service law. A young lady of excellent qualifications and high character came from my State and successfully took the civil service examination more than two years ago. I understand that she was placed at the head of the New Hampshire list. She has waited during that entire time for an appointment under the civil service law, and has been told from time to time that the quota from the State is full. What are the facts? Take the names of those who are accredited to New Hampshire under the civil service law, and I scarcely in my life ever heard of any one of them. I think I know the people of my State. I think I know whether the persons accredited to New Hampshire are residents of my State or not, and I stand here to say that in my judgment three-fourths of the men and women accredited to the State of New Hampshire under the civil service law have no voting residence or domicile in the State. One man is in the service, accredited to New Hampshire, whose father never lived one single hour in the State, and the only claim he has upon New Hampshire is that his mother was born there. And yet he holds a high position and excludes bona fide residents of the State from getting positions in the service.

Take another case. A distinguished physician submitted himself for examination a short time ago in the city of Washington. For what position? For the privilege of going out to doctor the Indians in the Indian Territory. He wanted to go there because his wife was ill, and he thought it would benefit her health. He has been a physician in the city of Baltimore; he has been a physician in the city of Washington; he has performed capital operations in surgery, and he stands high in the profession, but he was rejected because he could not answer a certain percentage of technical questions, and doubtless some young man just out of college, who perhaps has never had a patient in his life, will be given the place. The older physician knows enough to treat the intelligent and wealthy people at the capital of the nation, but he does not know enough to give pills and powders to the Indians.

Tell me that that is a desirable administration of the affairs of this Government, and I say to the Senator from Massachusetts and to the Senate of the United States that I believe if the people of this country could get at the thing and correctly understand it the result would be very different from what the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts apprehends.

Mr. President, I simply rose to dissent from the opinion expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts, and to say that in my judgment the people of my State at least do not sustain with unanimity, nor does a majority of them in either party sustain the civil-service law as it is being administered, and I believe they would gladly welcome an opportunity to make known that fact.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not propose to go into any long discussion of the civil service question. It is not presented by the resolution before the Senate. But if the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire be true it is a statement of some exceptional case, some extraordinary case. Statements of the unjust and unfair application of the present civil-service examinations and rules have been made and they have been triumphantly refuted whenever they have been brought to the attention of the persons engaged in administering the law under either Administration. But if it were true that an occasional abuse of that kind has taken place, and that some worthy old doctor, as I understand is the case which my honorable friend quotes——

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not say old. I will correct the Senator to the extent of saying that I did not use the term "old."

Mr. HOAR. I know; but I understand that some worthy old doctor——

Mr. GALLINGER. He is not old.

Mr. HOAR. Who has been healing by the hem of his garment up in New Hampshire——

Mr. GALLINGER. He did not come from New Hampshire, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HOAR. I yield, of course.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will simply suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that I did not say he was an old doctor. I did not say he came from New Hampshire. He is neither old nor has he resided in New Hampshire.

Mr. HOAR. Some worthy doctor who did not come from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is better.

Mr. HOAR. Whether it is better or worse I will leave to the Senator to determine for himself.

Mr. GALLINGER. Whether it is better or worse, it is true.

Mr. HOAR. And some saucy and bumptious young doctor got the place. Such things happen in this world in all sorts of public and private vocations. But, on the other hand, I have seen the case where throughout great commonwealths and for a long space of time the real test for holding public office in this country was devotion or want of devotion to the particular fortunes of some ambitious chieftain. I have seen good soldiers, honest men, men having the confidence and friendship of their fellow-citizens wherever they were known, soldiers' widows, soldiers' orphans, driven from public service in order that some henchman or active political politician, advancing the fortunes of some political chieftain, might be substituted.

I am not speaking of Democratic proceedings now. I am talking about a time when my own party was in power in every Department of this Government, and it was foul scandal, a sore, a cancer on the body of the country. Is it not notorious that when the time has approached when Presidential candidates were to be nominated the country has believed that the whole South was permeated and honeycombed with this evil, and that the offices of the country were being used to promote one nomination or defeat another nomination?

If it be true that occasionally some person will be retained under the present system when he has gotten past efficiency; if it be true that occasionally some worthy person is postponed in favor of some unworthy person, the evil is slight and trifling compared with that which the civil-service law is designed to cure and which largely it has had the effect of curing.

As I said, I do not propose to discuss this question now, but I can not conceive a good reason why the postal service of this country, the custom service of this country in its lower department, the consular service of the country in its lower department, should not be organized on the same principle and in the same way in which banks or railroads or manufactories or insurance companies or all the other great business conveniences and instrumentalities of a great commercial and manufacturing nation are organized. Is there any reason why the persons who give the people of a country town in New England or in the South their letters at the post-office in the morning should have applied to him the test of whether he favors or does not favor a particular political administration? It is not the custom in other countries. It is a principle which the fathers of this Republic condemned. James Madison declared, as my honorable friend from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] will remember, that a President of the United States who should carry into effect the doctrine which the Senator now lays down should be driven from office by impeachment and incapacitated to hold office thereafter. But as I said, I did not rise to discuss this question.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I believe the resolution offered by the Senator from Florida, which has for its object an inquiry into the condition of the present civil service of the United States and as to its expediency, whether that service shall be retrenched or increased, is a wise one, and that this is an opportune moment to consider the resolution. It was my intention to submit a similar one, and I should have done so before this time had I not been a new member in this honored body.

The question under consideration is not whether the policy of civil-service retrenchment and reform, which has been adopted, is a wise and judicious one, but whether it shall be restricted or extended. So much has been said upon the subject that I desire to add but one or two words. I must dissent from my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and my friend from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY]. There is no reason in my opinion why the business of this country should not be conducted upon recognized business principles. There is not a corporation, not a manufactory, not a banking institution or any successful manufacturing establishment in this country that gives a man a position on account of his political affiliations. I have the honor to control in part a company which employs 3,000 men, and I do not know the politics or the religion of five employés of that company.

I am inclined to think from the last Presidential election they were all Democrats; but be that as it may, not one of them has had sufficient political influence to obtain a position in the employ of the company. He is employed upon his merits alone, and upon his knowledge of the business of the company and its affairs. Nine-tenths of those in the employ of the company have worked their way up from the bottom round of the ladder. Such should be the case with employment under our Government. Why should not the same wise and judicial rules that make a private business successful control in the management of the affairs of the Government?

I believe the Civil Service Commission has done a wise and good work thus far in the administration of the affairs of the Government; and if there is one thing which, in my opinion, is deserving of the commendation of the people of the United States it is that President Cleveland has been in favor of a wise and judicious civil service reform. Why should a faithful clerk who has worked up from the place of a messenger in the Treasury Department to the highest position be removed because he, being the custodian of his own conscience, thinks politically different from the head of that Department.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is not the Senator aware of the fact that a great many just such men have been arbitrarily dismissed from office during the present Administration? Does he not know that men who have been in Government employ a very long time and have distinguished themselves in the service have been arbitrarily dismissed?

Mr. PERKINS. I am aware of that fact, and for that reason I believe we should inquire into the matter and correct the wrong where it exists. Two wrongs never made a right. A few days since I voted for the confirmation of an officer in the Treasury Department simply because by years of faithful application to duty he had shown himself eminently qualified for the high position which he occupied and I believed it was a deserving recognition of his merit.

I agree with my friend from Arkansas that the heads of Departments should be in accord politically with the Administration. I believe it proper that the party which is charged with the administration of the Government should take into its councils heads of the Departments who are in accord politically with it. But this does not apply to those in subordinate positions. I think the Civil Service Commission has done a noble work in preventing political managers from assessing clerks in the Departments. I believe it is entitled to the thanks of the people for that alone, if it has accomplished nothing more.

But I shall not weary the Senate. I hope the resolution will be adopted. I hope that the matter will be referred to the Committee on Civil Service Reform and Retrenchment, and that that committee will give it careful consideration and report to this body their conclusions, that we may each one act in accordance with what we believe to be our duty to the whole people, to the country, and to this great nation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I was not present in the Senate when the resolution was introduced, but I think I apprehend its scope, which is to examine into the general condition of the civil service of the United States with a view to its better organization and greater economy. As I gather from the debate which I have heard there are propositions to extend the inquiry so as to examine into the proceedings of the Civil Service Commission and the operations of the classified service which comes within the control of the Commission. I sincerely hope, as a friend, as I am, of the system of civil service reform, as it is called, that that extended inquiry will be ordered. I do not think it is a matter that can be investigated too often or too thoroughly; and whenever it has been investigated, which has been a great many times, it has always resulted in the strengthening and the further extension of the system.

I do not propose at this time to enter into an argument as to the merits of the reform system as compared with the old system. I do not believe that the American people or the majority of any responsible political party have any more idea of overthrowing the classified service and returning to the thoroughly base and un-American system of favor and patronage than they have of giving up electricity and going back to the tallow candles. I do not defend the system as absolutely perfect; very few systems of human device are perfect; but it is wonderfully good as compared with the miserable business of favoritism and patronage which it has replaced.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] made a point in regard to the injustice of arbitrary promotions, reductions, and removals. The point is very well made. There are arbitrary promotions, reductions, and removals, and the reason for those injustices to meritorious clerks arises from the fact that neither promotions nor reductions nor removals come within the scope of the law in any respect; they remain within the range of favoritism and patronage. That is the reason why they bristle with injustice at every point.

As to the matter of quotas, to which the Senator from New Hampshire refers, very great efforts have been made to make the quotas just and fair. It has only been attempted within a comparatively short time. That there are many persons borne on State quotas who properly ought not to be there I think can not be questioned by anybody who has looked into the matter. I am sure that I for one would most cordially support any legislation to provide the most stringent regulations that every State may have its just quota. The States are now nearer to their proper representation than they have ever before been in the history of the Government. An investigation will I am certain develop that fact.

Both parties are elaborately committed in countless platforms to the principles of the law of 1883. The civil service law is here for Congress to repeal, if they believe it ought to be repealed and if they think public opinion demands it. The law has been in operation for more than ten years, and its operation can be investigated either under the resolution as it stands or as it may be amended. I sincerely hope the chairman of the committee will push the investigation and bring out all the defects of the present law and also in bills, that the system may be strengthened and further extended. I said at the beginning of my remarks, the thing to do is to investigate the system fully and to the bottom, and the more it is investigated the more strongly it will stand.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. President, I am not altogether certain as to how I stand upon the civil service law, because I have had some peculiar experiences with relation to it. I am disposed to think that it is a law very good in theory, but a little indisposed in practice. I conceive that a system, if it can ever be brought to that point which will result in a fair distribution of the patronage of the Government to those most entitled to it will be all that can be desired. I admit that the former plan, whereby office was made simply the reward of political activity without corresponding ability to discharge the duties of the place was not a good system.

I recognize another evil which has not I believe been spoken of this morning. Where members of Congress, whether of this body or of the other House, are constantly required to apply for their friends at the various Departments and seek to obtain positions for them much of their time and attention is taken up—time which might be valuably and effectively employed in carrying out the policies they have been sent here to maintain.

But that some investigation of the system is desirable I believe to be obvious. In the first place, there is no just distribution of the so-called quota. In regard to my State no one pretends that there is anything like a just distribution. Probably it is because California is so far away that many ladies and gentlemen from other parts of the United States believe that if they assert that they came from California there will be nobody to deny it.

A Senator has remarked that a certain person was charged to a certain State because of the presence of a relative in that State. I have received authentic evidence of the appointment of a very estimable gentleman some years ago under civil service rules as a Californian who claimed that he was a Californian because his mother-in-law resided in that State. [Laughter.] This relationship, somewhat obscure as a foundation for the establishment of a just quota, was, however, effective. At present it is apparent to those of us who are familiar with the subject that the distribution is not only unfair now, but that it has been unfair from the beginning.

We may speak quite impartially about the distribution of patronage in the Departments of the Government here because we have but little of it. There was a time when we aspired to some of it, but we do not now expect many favors of that kind, because we find that the civil service regulations as enforced have absorbed all the places, and that we are consequently barred.

I think it would be well to probe this matter, and that if some method of establishing the identity of parties who claim to be from a specified State could be adopted, it would further the desirable ends for which the law was established.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator from California allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WHITE of California. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. Is the Senator aware of the proof which is now required by the regulations as to citizenship?

Mr. WHITE of California. I am aware of the proof which is required by the rules.

Mr. LODGE. It is the certificate of a county clerk, I believe, and of one or two residents of the county.

Mr. WHITE of California. The certificate of the county clerk is obtained in many cases upon reports of a third party, upon hearsay—almost always so in remote States. Of course, there are instances where a clerk gives a certificate bona fide, and most clerks will always believe that they are certifying to the truth, but they are not as careful about that matter as they should be, and the parties who would know and who do know are too seldom consulted. However, the outcome is as I state it.

I believe that it would be well, and that it is absolutely necessary, that some system shall be established and maintained which will take the immense patronage which would otherwise be put in the hands of those whose duty it is to do something else, and place it in charge of those competent to discharge it. Senators frequently have said to me that half of their time is even now taken up in listening to appeals for office, and most of which must be necessarily ineffective.

I am not prepared to say that the present system is excessively popular. I doubt very much whether upon a vote it would be indorsed by a majority of the people of the United States. Nevertheless, I would not vote for its abolition, because I believe it to be a step in the right direction, and I think that experience and bona fide exertion will finally perfect the scheme.

I think that the present Administration is carrying out the law more strictly than it has ever been enforced. It is not carried out in its extreme strictness even now but in the matter of permitting a postmaster who has already served nearly four years and who resigns just at the end of the preceding Administration so as to have a successor of his own political faith appointed, the appointee being permitted to hold for four years more, I think probably we are now going further than anyone else has ever pretended to travel.

I believe that the resolution of the Senator from Florida should pass. I believe that an investigation made under it will result in advantage. I might add that some of the examinations proposed by the Civil Service Commission are to my mind rather absurd. There are many cases where a person is examined who is an absolute expert as to the particular subject-matter concerning which his administrative ability would be called into exercise, but who has no knowledge of that particular branch of science or learning concerning which he is interrogated, and he fails because he does not reach the standard in a special branch which does not pertain to the duties which he would be called upon to discharge if he were appointed to the position he seeks. This, however, is not a defect in the law, but it is an error in the administration, and may be cured without any abrogation of the statute simply by amending the rules under which it is administered.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I beg leave to call the attention of the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] to what I conceive clearly to be an oversight in his understanding of the civil-service law. The Senator speaks about the extension of the civil-service law and the retention of postmasters under that law. There is not one letter, nor one word, nor one line in the entire civil-service law which holds any man in office. The Senator from California is therefore entirely mistaken when he attributes to the civil-service law the retention of any Republican postmaster. The civil-service law has no bearing whatever upon the retention of anybody in any office.

Mr. WHITE of California. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me a moment?

Mr. COCKRELL. With pleasure.

Mr. WHITE of California. I did not assert, I think, that the civil-service law provides for the retention in office of any postmaster, but the theory upon which postmasters have been retained is that it is in accordance with the spirit of that enactment and the tendency of the legislation, a view with which I do not agree, I will say.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no such tendency in legislation. The civil service law was passed with the distinct understanding and with the open declaration on this floor made by myself and every one who advocated the passage of the bill at that time that it had nothing on earth to do with the exit from office. It was only a guard upon the entrance to office, the door, and not the exit. There is not a line in the civil service law that refers to the retention of an appointee under that law. Every appointee under the civil service law can to-morrow, without any violation of that law, be discharged. It is no violation of that law.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. May I ask the Senator from Missouri a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. With pleasure.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Does the Senator understand that there is nothing in the law to prevent the head of the Treasury Department, for instance, from removing a third-class clerk or a fourth-class clerk in that Department, who is there under the classified service?

Mr. COCKRELL. I say there is nothing in the law to prevent it—not a letter, not a syllable, not a word, not a line, not a sentence. Republican postmasters in fourth-class offices under a Democratic Administration retained in their offices, are there at the will of the Democratic Postmaster-General. Under a Republican Administration Democratic postmasters in fourth-class offices retained in their offices are there at the will and pleasure of the Republican Postmaster-General. It is because the Postmasters-General under either Administration prefer the retention of Republican or Democratic postmasters to the appointment of those of their own political faith.

I do not want the civil service law to be made a subterfuge for anything else. Let it stand or fall upon its own merits, but do not let it be saddled with the preferences and the likes and dislikes of this or the other head of a Department. The civil service law is no pretext and no excuse and no mitigation in any shape, manner, or form for the retention of anybody in a fourth-class post-office beyond the pleasure and will of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I understand that to be the case so far as fourth-class postmasters are concerned, but I confess to my ignorance in reference to other matters. If it is as the Senator states, and I have no doubt it is——

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no question about it. When the civil-service law was passed and I had the honor of addressing the Senate upon it at great length, I showed beyond any doubt, and no one disputed it, that the President of the United States under the then existing laws had together with the heads of Departments every right and power which the civil-service law would give him when it was enacted. The civil-service law did not vest in the President of the United States and heads of Departments any right or power or authority which they did not then possess under the law. I voted for it because there was then a Republican Administration and had been for years, and the leading Republicans said their civil service needed reform and the law was necessary. There was an open and frank admission on the part of the Republican party at that time that the civil service needed reforming, and it was asserted that the law was necessary It was passed.

It was intended, and was so declared by Dorman B. Eaton and others who wrote in regard to the proposed law, simply to guard the entrance into office, and had nothing to do with the back door or the exit. It protected no man in office. It was simply to relieve the Departments and all from the pressure for appointments and changes in subordinate positions in the Departments, and to make a test of fitness and qualification for those places before appointments were made.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator from Missouri pardon me for a moment?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. GORMAN. Is it not a fact, however, that the Civil Service Commission put a construction upon the law, probably made a regulation to the effect that there must be reasons for removal in most of these cases, in the postal service and customs service?

Mr. COCKRELL. The executive administration of the civil-service law is a very interesting matter. I wish I had time to lay before the Senate exactly what the various Presidents have done under that law and what the Civil Service Commission has done. It is remarkable that the three Presidents who have occupied the Presidential chair since that law was enacted never saw the beauty of the extension of the law to a largely increased force until just about the expiration of their terms of office. That is the record.

President Arthur made the extension very largely just before he went out of office. President Cleveland, on the 31st day of December, 1888, made an extension of the civil-service law so as to include the railway postal clerks and others. That was quite a great extension, and it is rather amusing to read what occurred just then in regard to it. I will get in a moment all the orders of President Cleveland and President Harrison in regard to the matter. December 31, 1888, after the Presidential election of November, 1888:

Order No. 218.

By direction of the President of the United States, and subject to and in accordance with section 1 of an act entitled "An act to designate, classify, and fix the salaries of persons in the Railway Mail Service," etc.—

The Railway Mail Service was classified and placed under the civil-service law and regulations. There were some other orders in regard to it that I thought I had my finger upon right here, but I do not see them just at this moment. That order placed the Railway Mail Service and railway postal clerks, I believe, under the civil-service law and regulations. I read another order:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, January 4, 1889—

Just exactly two months before the expiration of a Presidential term—

The above rules are hereby approved to take effect March 15, 1889; provided that such rules shall become operative and take effect in any State or Territory as soon as an eligible register for such State or Territory shall be prepared, if it shall be prior to the date above fixed.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

It will be seen that that was to take effect on the 15th day of March, just eleven days after the expiration of the Presidential term. President Harrison came in on the 4th of March, 1889, and here is the following order:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, March 11, 1889. (Received March 12.)

Whereas civil-service rules for the Railway Mail Service were approved January 4, 1889, to go into effect March 15, 1889; and
Whereas it is represented to me—

By what?—

by the Civil Service Commission, in a communication of this date, that it will be impossible to complete arrangements for putting said rules into full effect on said date or sooner than May 1, 1889: It is therefore Ordered, That said railway mail rules shall take effect May 1, 1889, instead of March 15, 1889, provided that such rules shall become operative and take effect in any State or Territory as soon as an eligible register for such State or Territory shall be prepared, if it shall be prior to the date above fixed.

BENJ. HARRISON.

Under President Cleveland the Civil Service Commission said, "Let this order take effect on the 15th day of March," and just as soon as President Cleveland went out of office and President Harrison came in they turned around and said to him, "It will not do to let it take effect on the 15th day of March, but let it take effect on the 1st of May, 1889;" and by the 1st of May at least between two and three thousand railway postal clerks who had been appointed under President Cleveland and who scarcely constituted one-half of the railway postal clerks were turned out, and under the law of reinstatement the old Republican railway postal clerks were put back in the service. I do not know how true it is, but it is said the work was so laborious that it was continued a month or more after the 1st of May, 1889, and all the work done in that time was dated back anterior to the 1st of May, 1889.

President Cleveland had been in office four years. If he had seen proper to have brought these men under the civil-service law and it was such a glorious blessing to extend it, it might have been done in time to have saved the heads of the Democrats who had gotten in under it; but President Harrison made it to suit himself, and thus the benefits of a nonpartisan service were destroyed.

President Harrison came in, and what do we find him doing toward the close of his term? We find him extending the civil service. Why not at the beginning of the term in order to test the efficiency and virtue of its extension instead of waiting until near the close of the term? I have not had time to look it up, but I believe he put the navy yards and then the Indian service under the civil-service regulations, extending it even to physicians and to Indian agents and the teachers in Indian schools.

President Harrison and President Cleveland during their two terms of service, and mostly toward the close of their terms, placed 15,000 officers who were eligible to appointment, residents of any State, under the civil-service law and extended the system very largely. If I had had time I would have given the dates of all the extensions, so that Senators might see exactly what was done.

There is now a conflict in regard to the civil-service law. All the actions of the Executive Departments that are not agreeable are charged to the civil-service law, and it is made the scapegoat of many sins for which it is not responsible. It is made the scapegoat to retain inefficient officers, which it does not do, as I have said. It has nothing in the world to do with the retention of anybody in office.

It has been extended to such an extent that it embraces offices that ought never to have been brought under a civil-service law and opened to competitive examination, because in many offices something more than a mere technical knowledge which can be developed by a civil-service examination is essential. Take a physician to an Indian agency. He may be a graduate of what is said to be one of the finest medical schools in the world, as the University of Virginia, but may know very little about actual practice, and yet he will pass at a higher grade than a physician who has been practicing years and years. It is the same way with teaching school. A young graduate may come in and pass the highest possible examination who has never had an hour's experience in public-school teaching.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 2331) to repeal all statutes relating to supervisors of elections and special deputy marshals, and for other purposes.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope, as the Senator from Missouri has not concluded his remarks, he will be permitted to proceed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the resolution come up to-morrow.

Mr. CULLOM. Very well.

REPEAL OF ELECTION LAWS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2331) to repeal all statutes relating to supervisors of elections and special deputy marshals, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no amendment——

Mr. CHANDLER. I submit an amendment, which I ask may be read and printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill the following additional section:

SEC. 4. At every election in any State of a Representative in Congress, each candidate for Representative nominated by any political party or by a nomination paper signed by one hundred resident voters shall have the right to appoint in writing signed by him one watcher to represent him at each voting district, precinct or place where votes for Representatives are to be cast. Every such watcher shall have the right to be present at the registration of voters who are to cast their votes within his district, precinct or place, and also to be present at the election therein, and he shall have the right to freely witness all the registration proceedings and the receiving and counting of the ballots for Representative in Congress and the making and signing of the returns thereof, and every such watcher shall be allowed to be and to remain so near to the place where the names are registered and the place where the ballots are received, counted, and a return thereof made, that he may easily and fully perform his duties; and any person who shall in any way, directly or indirectly, by bribery, intimidation, or violence, or any device whatever intentionally hinder, delay, obstruct, or prevent any such watcher from the discharge of his duties shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $100 or by imprisonment not exceeding 30 days, or by both, such punishments at the discretion of the court. In case any rules or regulations for conducting Congressional elections shall exist in any State which would contravene the provisions of this section, such rules or regulations are hereby amended and altered so as to conform to the rule and regulation made by this section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has heard the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GRAY. I merely rose to ask who had offered the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not wish the amendment voted upon at this time. I ask to have the amendment printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that the amendment be printed. It is so ordered, if there is no objection. The pending question, however, is on the adoption of the Senator's amendment. Is the Senate ready for the question? [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. PLATT. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am afraid there is no quorum present.

Mr. TELLER. Let the amendment be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, it becomes the duty of the Chair to order the roll to be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen,	Frye,	Jones, Ark.	Shoup,
Allison,	Gallinger,	Kyle,	Squire,
Bate,	George,	Lodge,	Teller,
Berry,	Gibson,	Martin,	Turpie,
Blackburn,	Gordon,	Mitchell, Oregon	Vest,
Caffery,	Gorman,	Morrill,	Vilas,
Call,	Gray,	Palmer,	Voorhees,
Carey,	Hansbrough,	Perkins,	Walthall,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Pettigrew,	White, Cal.
Cullom,	Hawley,	Platt,	White, La.
Davis,	Hoar,	Pugh,	Wilson.
Dixon.	Hunton,	Roach.
Faulkner,	Irby,	Sherman,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire, on which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire, as I did not catch the first part of his amendment, to what is it an amendment? I should like to have it read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add the following——

Mr. GRAY. To add the following to what, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. CHANDLER. It is an additional section to the repeal bill.

The amendment was again read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the amendment?

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the object of this amendment is in order that, if all the existing election laws are swept from the statute books, there shall at least be a provision of national law entitling every candidate for Representative in Congress to have a watcher representing him at each place of registration and at each election precinct where votes are cast, which watcher shall not be hindered or kept from the registration place or voting place by any person whatsoever. The object is to make this a paramount right under the national law, and to alter any regulation of any State so that each candidate for Congress may have a watcher at the registration place and at each polling precinct.

I have thought that notwithstanding Senators upon the other side are determined to strike from the statute book the great body of laws which provide for election supervisors, which provide for marshals at the polls, which provide for punishing under national statutes crimes against the suffrage committed in the States in connection with Congressional elections, they yet would think that it was worth while to give this one right, enacted, sanctioned, strengthened, and made paramount by a law of the United States, to every candidate for Congress in every district in the United States. I hope that before the discussion ends upon the pending bill the Senators upon the other side will conclude not to vote against this provision, and that they will be content to have at least this little piece of legislation upon the statute book as a testimonial to the national power and as a recognition and assertion of national power under the clause of the Constitution which gives Congress the right to make or alter regulations for the conduct of elections of Representatives in Congress.

Mr. PLATT. It would be no expense to the Government.

Mr. CHANDLER. This is a very simple provision. It incurs no expense to the United States. It does not put a Federal official at the polls, but it gives a very simple protection and guard to the Congressional elections. I believe that it will be the judgment of Senators upon the other side to add this provision to the bill before it passes this body, if it does pass. I am quite sure that the amendment will commend itself to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] who spoke yesterday. The Senator began by admitting the constitutionality of action by Congress under that clause in the Constitution, which, however, I believe is universally condemned by Senators upon the other side of the Chamber; the majority report at least sets out that the clause is unconstitutional which purports to authorize Congress to make regulations for the government of Congressional elections. The majority have planted themselves upon that ground.

The Senator from Illinois dissents from that ground and says that he believes Congress has a right to legislate under that clause; and I shall ask him with great confidence to vote to leave this little remnant of national power upon the statute book in case the great body of the national legislation is stricken therefrom.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to interrupt the Senator from New Hampshire for a moment. The Senator from Illinois is present, and of course I do not presume to answer for him, but the Senator says he understood the Senator from Illinois to admit the constitutionality of the laws which we are trying to repeal. I did not so understand him.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator admits, I think, that Congress has the constitutional power to pass these laws. I think the Senator said that he was in favor of these laws when originally passed. I will look and see. He said:

> I can not say that in the beginning I disapproved of much in this legislation.

The Senator also said, I think, very distinctly that he believed in the constitutional right of Congress to pass national election laws. He said:

> I do not deny that Congress has the power to regulate the elections of Representatives in Congress.

If I understand the majority report, the report made in the House of Representatives, I understand its purport to be a declaration that the United States can not pass a law regulating the conduct of national elections unless the State or the States absolutely fail to make any such laws. There is a long constitutional argument in the majority report of the House, adopted in language by the majority of the Senate committee, which is now on the desks of Senators, and a declaration that as long as the State undertakes to perform its duty there can be no constitutional law passed by Congress; that the constitutional right of Congress is to legislate when the States neglect or refuse to perform their duty.

Now, I understand the Senator from Illinois, who undoubtedly unwittingly gave his assent to the language of this report, to say that in the beginning he was not opposed to this legislation; that he believed in the constitutional right of Congress to pass laws regulating the election of members of Congress, and certainly the Senator from Illinois will admit that a simple provision of the laws of the United States, which gives each candidate for Representative in Congress a watcher, the right to designate under his signature one person in each voting precinct to witness the registration and to witness the election, is not an unreasonable statute. It is not an extensive assertion of national power; it is not satisfactory to me as such assertion of power, but it is a provision for guarding the suffrage and for the assertion of national power for the purpose of guarding the suffrage, which I think the Senate ought by a unanimous vote to adopt.

I was sorry to see the disposition manifested on the other side of the Chamber to vote down my amendment without so much as having it printed or making any investigation into its merits, and I am afraid, with all due respect to Senators, without a fair consideration of its merits.

Mr. President, I do not desire to argue the amendment at this time any further. I only spoke because I was invited by the Senator from Delaware to explain the amendment, and I trust I have made at least its purport and intent so clear that Senators will think it worth while at least to consider it over night before recording their votes against it. I certainly do not ask any unusual courtesy in suggesting that the amendment having been seriously offered by me, I believing that it ought to be adopted, in asking this additional consideration of it.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Hampshire will permit me—I only speak for myself—after the two or three weeks' delay which has occurred in the consideration of this matter, so as to give ample time for the minority to prepare its report and for Senators to be prepared for the discussion of the bill, if he suggests further delay, I will state to him that I am rather inclined to think that that is asking the courtesy of the Senate beyond what was anticipated.

As to voting for the Senator's amendment, without having it printed or without sleeping a night over it, the Senator will recognize, as a matter of course, that his amendment goes to the very gist of the controversy between the two sides, as perfectly understood now as it will be to-morrow or next week, and that on this side of the Chamber, without going at all into the discussion of the constitutional power of Congress to legislate, in our view there ought not to be any Federal supervision whatever over these elections by Congress or by the President.

That is a subject which must be left entirely to the States. No matter what has occurred in the past; no matter what emergency there may have been, this is now a time of peace, and with better feelings and better conditions in the governments of our States, these statutes ought to be wiped from the statute book entirely. Unless the elections as conducted under the direction of the people of the several States are as pure and good and free as they can be under our human system then the Government is a failure. Those of us who are in favor of repealing these laws are content to leave the regulation of elections to the people of the States, to trust them. If they can not be trusted, as I said before, Mr. President, the whole theory of our Government is a failure.

That is the broad question presented by the Senator from New Hampshire. He will pardon me for dissenting from any suggestion and declining to comply with any request for a postponement of this matter, because the line is too clearly drawn, too well understood. We can vote upon his amendment as intelligently now as we can at any other time.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I had not made any request, I think, for the postponement of the bill itself. I did say to the Senate that I preferred that it should not be voted upon at this time because I thought the Senate ought to receive such enlightenment as the debate might give before a vote should be taken, but I now do say to the Senator from Delaware and to the Senator from Maryland that, acting in all good faith toward the Senator in charge of this bill, I do not find that any Senator upon this side of the Chamber is ready to proceed with the debate this afternoon.

I have made inquiry of all the Senators who are to speak. I find that some dozen Senators have intentions more or less definitely formed to speak upon the bill, and some half dozen who have positively decided to speak thereon, and I have asked those Senators if they were ready to speak and have been informed that there is no one ready to speak at this moment. Therefore I now suggest to the Senator from Delaware and to the Senator from Maryland that they allow the bill to go over until Monday next, and then take it up for consideration with a view of proceeding with it until it shall be disposed of.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have not the least desire to delay a vote on the bill or to postpone action upon it in any way, but I desire to speak upon it. I had hoped to be ready this week, but our long session on Monday and some other matters have so interfered with me that I have been unable to be ready to speak this week, as I had hoped. I therefore desire to give notice that, with the kind permission of the Senate, immediately after the morning hour on Wednesday next I shall ask the liberty to address the Senate upon the pending bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I desire to speak upon this bill, to put upon record my protest against it, and in a feeble way attempt to vindicate the constitutionality of Federal supervision of the election of Federal officers, about which I have not a shadow of doubt, but I am not ready to do so now. I have just got the report of the minority of the committee, which I desire to study carefully. It came to me yesterday. I have not had a spare hour since. There is plenty of time for this bill; there is no election coming on just now, and the bill is as certain to pass as the existence of the Democracy. There is no question about it, and we may as well take it easily and not crowd ourselves about it.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I did not interrupt the Senator from New Hampshire in his kind references to me, because I think in all probability I have less sensitiveness on the point of mere consistency than any other Senator on this floor. I have never felt that to arraign an argument of mine or to assail me successfully it was necessary to refer to any incidental or accidental remark I had made. On yesterday I objected to this bill. I pointed out its difficulties; I presented my objections to it as nearly as I could. Incidentally I alluded to other subjects. I certainly did say yesterday:

I can not say that in the beginning I disapproved of much in this legislation. I confess at the close of the war I insisted upon giving to the negro man the ballot as being far cheaper and far safer than to give him the musket, because I felt that the National Government was obliged to protect him in his liberty and in the new right to acquire property. I felt that to give him the ballot was to place in his hands a great educational agency, the employment of which would suggest to him to cultivate amicable relations with his white neighbors, and would teach him to vote, as this negro from the rice plantation near Wilmington said, according to his own interest—

As I illustrated by the story of the negro whom I met in North Carolina.

The fact is, Mr. President, that the arrangement of these measures belongs to another branch of the argument, which I addressed to the Senate yesterday. I regarded the war as having its own law, and I regarded the close of that great contest as making requirements that were purely accidental to and resulting from the war. I deemed it indispensable that the Government should protect the negro in the exercise of his rights, and I was surprised when I was told by the Senator from Massachusetts that the law was not passed for the South, but that it really was passed for New York. Then even my slight approval of the legislation seems to have been mistaken. I said again:

I do not deny that Congress has the power to regulate the elections of Representatives in Congress.

Who can deny that which is in the express language of the Constitution? I surely would not part with that power.

Mr. GRAY. Let me recall, if the Senator will allow me, that it is very justly said that no one can dispute the words of the Constitution. Those words are:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Mr. PALMER. I am not disposed myself to contract or limit that power. It belongs to the great powers which were given to the Government for its own preservation, and I think I can see that it might become necessary—I am not sure but it has been necessary in our past history—that Congress should exercise this power not by legislation alone, but in the various methods by which Congress did assert and assure to districts representation in the House of Representatives.

There are great powers which belong to the Government which are to be invoked when the occasion demands it, but these are exceptional powers and to be exercised only when the preservation of the Republic becomes necessary. If Senators will take occasion to examine the whole Constitution they will find deposits of power which may be termed extraordinary which are to be invoked under extreme circumstances, not to be summoned into exercise on ordinary occasions when the general principles of free government move on or are applied without difficulty in all sections of the country.

I repeat I do not deny that Congress has the power to regulate the election of Representatives in Congress. Of course I use that term in the sense of the Constitution itself; but I said:

If a law should be presented which should be uniform in its application and just in its effects, I would give it consideration, at least; but at present I am not called upon to discuss legislation of that kind, because I propose to present a counter idea.

I then proceeded to present that counter idea, that the underlying principles of free government demand that the people shall be intrusted with the administration of their own government. I quote the remark here of a distinguished jurist. I remember that in 1862, when I, with others, was occupying the city of Nashville with a military force, I met an old lawyer whose name is familiar to Senators from that State, old Mr. Fogg. He told me that the courts were closed and he wanted to talk law to somebody. I myself had been away from the courts until I felt the same hunger. I asked him to give me his views upon a question which I submitted to him. He said:

War has its own laws. When the war is over the national necessity will be to return to judicial interpretations of the Constitution and yield these military interpretations.

We have reached that point now. I admit the existence of some power in the Government. I admit the right of Congress to declare war; but I should be astonished if the Senator from New Hampshire should propose to exercise that power to-day, for there is no occasion for it. I admit the power of Congress to the extent of the Constitution to regulate the election of Representatives, but there is no occasion for doing so to-day; and why? Because the people themselves are peaceful, they are intelligent, they love liberty, love law, love order; they appreciate the value of the institutions of free government, of a government by the people, and hence there is no more occasion for invoking the particular power to which the Senator adverts, and which I concede to-day, than there would be for the exercise of the power to declare war. Those are extreme powers to be employed for emergencies.

I am content to be judged by my own theory, and that theory is that the people of the United States, of the localities, the townships, the election districts, or whatever may be their municipal organizations, have the right themselves to control and regulate and conduct their own elections without the help of a watcher.

Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that if he means merely to preserve the vestige, if he means merely to show that there is a rod that may be held over the people, an innocent, gentle, kindly switch, as over school children, to teach them that the master is present—if that is what he means, he has well chosen his agency. If he means simply to assert the power of the Government, perhaps this mild, gentle requirement may accomplished that much; but if he means to accomplish anything more than the mere assertion to freemen that they have a master, his proposition simply fails.

I shall at some future time perhaps, I trust, give an answer to several questions propounded to me by my kind friend from New Hampshire, and particularly that most interesting question which he and I have discussed so much, as to why I left the Republican party. That seems to be one of the points which interests him very much and it interests me very much, and I know of no gentleman in the country to whom I am more disposed to be responsible than to him.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not know any gentleman in the country whom I should be quicker disposed to follow out of my own party into the opposition than the Senator from Illinois, if I were convinced that I ought to do so. Therefore I await with some trepidation the reasons which the Senator has failed to give us.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Illinois had better not give them.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator has failed to give us those reasons as yet, but he has now promised to give them to us at some length, and until I hear from him I shall stay with my own party.

I wanted to ask the Senator a question, which I intended to ask him before he sat down. He closed by stating that he believed the people of every township—those were his words—ought to control their own affairs; that they ought to control their own elections. I believe the Senator is sincere and honest in all his convictions and in his expressions when he has carefully studied a subject. Therefore, I want to ask him in all sincerity if he has examined the laws of some of the Southern States and has noticed how the townships are allowed to govern themselves? For instance, on page 30 of the minority report there is stated as to the election laws of South Carolina:

The governor appoints for each county a supervisor of registration, and also three commissioners of elections, and the commissioners appoint three managers of elections at each polling place.

The townships in South Carolina have put over them election officers who are appointed by three commissioners of the county, who are appointed by the governor, and the registration for each county is made by a supervisor appointed by the county.

Now, I call the Senator's attention, on page 32 of the minority report, to the case of Virginia:

In Virginia the Legislature every two years, by resolution, names and elects three residents of each of the one hundred counties and ten cities in the State as an electoral board for that county or city. This board appoints a registrar for each of the election districts within the county or city (there being about 1,500 districts in the State), who register the votes of his district.

This board, that is to say this electoral board of three named in the Virginia State capital by a resolution of the Legislature, also appoints three judges of election and two clerks for each district.

Without referring to other States, I call the attention of the Senator from Illinois to these two, South Carolina and Virginia, where the power of appointing the local election officers, who are to call the election, receive the votes, count them, and certify the result to the canvassing board, are appointed and named at the capital of the State either by the governor or the Legislature; and if by the Legislature, then by a caucus of that Legislature, and I may say that, inasmuch as these States are Democratic, by a Democratic caucus of the Legislature. Now, I ask the Senator whether that is home rule, whether that is local self-government, and whether that system would be tolerated a moment by the people of Illinois? If he says it would not be, then I ask him why he is willing to repeal these national election laws, which afford some protection to voters, under such circumstances, and to leave the people of every township to the mercy of such unfair and barbarous laws as these?

Mr. PALMER. It affords me great pleasure to answer the Senator from New Hampshire that I emphatically and as earnestly and in language as strong as I can use and be respectful, condemn the laws to which he refers. They would not be submitted to in Illinois, in any county in that State.

Mr. ALLISON. Why not?

Mr. PALMER. Because they are wrong; they violate popular rights.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a good reason.

Mr. PALMER. But I remember that in Louisiana in 1876–'77, nd in ot he r States, I found States under the control of Republican boards equally despotic in their power. They were the outgrowth of the unhappy conditions produced by the war. I had hoped that we had escaped from them all. I have spoken of the laws referred to. They are unnecessary, in my judgment, and do not and will not in the end accomplish the results hoped for by their authors, unless they hope for injustice or the retention of power for the present, which is the most dangerous acquisition that men can have. I remember during reconstruction times, when the Republican party, of which I spoke yesterday, had possession of those States, that I found returning boards in a number of them that were organized. They were political boards. I witnessed the operation of one of them, at least, and I found that the purpose was to retain in power a particular party, and that purpose was accomplished.

Perhaps I ought to say, lest I should be charged with doing something that I would not be guilty of, that I think the result of that canvass was to place in the Presidency one of the best men the country has produced, not the equal of his competitor in point of ability, but the equal of any other man in purity and elevation of character. I desire to pay that tribute to Rutherford B. Hayes, lest I may do injustice to a friend and a comrade.

Those were conditions which belong to the past. I condemn those laws because they are not consistent with popular liberty. I condemn this system by which marshals are created.

Mr. President, I have very little to do with the past. I am dealing with the future. I have no power to correct the evils of which the Senator complains, but the remedy of the marshals does not and has never cured those particular evils. Those evils are incurable, and will only yield to the progress of intelligence and of sound and just principles. This is no cure for them. The Senator says why reject this nostrum which he proposes for the cure of evils. I say I reject it simply because it will not in the slightest degree relieve the disease. It may have many virtues, but I reject the medicine because it will not cure the complaint. I object to this system of marshals because it does not cure any of the evils of which the Senator complains, nor does it in the slightest degree mitigate the operation of the laws which are so justly condemned.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator be kind enough, if it is agreeable to him at this time, to also state whether he objects to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, and, if so, why he condemns it?

Mr. PALMER. Simply because it is childish. It is a mere bare assertion of a useless power, a mere assertion of power which is as offensive to all just conceptions of popular liberty as if it had some meaning to it; and I think the Senator claims for it nothing more than I conceive, that it is a mere rod, a mere symbol of power. The State Legislatures are abundantly able to provide for conditions like these, and they have not failed to do so.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] proposes to secure to each candidate having a sufficient number of voters behind him to show that he is not a mere pretended candidate the right to have a person present who shall know what the election officers do. Is such knowledge, in the judgment of the Senator, childish, or is such security childish?

Mr. PALMER. It is. It is based upon a false conception. Can it be possible that candidates have as much interest in the purity and justice of elections as the people themselves? What is a candidate? A candidate is one who proposes himself for popular suffrage, proposes himself for the consideration of his neighbors. Does he acquire any specific vested right from the mere fact that he intimates a willingness to be voted for? Does that give him a right that he may assert?

Mr. HOAR. Is not he the person, if the Senator will pardon me, upon whom we in all our customs devolve the right; and does not public sentiment, at least, devolve the duty of contesting elections upon him? I suppose the Senator will not deny that there have been such things as fraudulent elections in this world—not in New England and not in Illinois, perhaps.

Mr. PALMER. I have heard it said that such a thing has happened, even in Illinois.

Mr. HOAR. Then so much the worse.

Mr. PALMER. Yes, somuch the worse.

Mr. HOAR. Somebody is expected, if there be a fraudulent certificate or an apparent result produced by fraud in violation of the rights of the people, to present the facts to the House of Representatives, who are the constitutional judges, to gather them, to know them, prove them, argue about them, and that has always been done, and probably always will be done, by the candidates. Now, this proposition is that the candidate shall be entitled to have a witness of the action of the election officers. That is all.

Mr. PALMER. It is entirely unnecessary and needlessly offensive.

Mr. HOAR. Offensive to whom?

Mr. PALMER. Offensive to the people themselves, offensive to those charged with the duty of conducting the election.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator another question. Is he of opinion that the existing laws in the various States of the Union, as they stand and as they are put together in the minority report, are reasonably sufficient to secure honest elections? Does he approve them?

Mr. PALMER. I am of the opinion that they are reasonably secure——

Mr. HIGGINS. If the Senator from Illinois will allow me, I call his attention to the fact that where the Australian ballot system has been adopted, as I think it has been in almost all of the States of the Union, it is one of the principles of that system that a candidate shall have an official recognition before he shall be voted for, so that his name can be printed upon the official ballots, which are prepared by official authority. There must be a proper certificate from the convention or other nominating body, or, if not by a convention, then by a sufficient number of citizens of their own motion, made to a secretary of State or other proper officer, so that the candidate can receive official recognition by having his name printed upon the ballots.

I merely make the suggestion in view of the Senator's inquiry as to whether or no a candidate has any vested right by reason of his candidacy.

Mr. PALMER. I am aware of the fact to which the Senator refers, but it would be simply a useless, irritating interference by Federal authority, by a distant authority, with the right of the people to conduct their own elections, and an imputation upon the justice and fairness of elections conducted by the people themselves.

I have no desire to go further into this matter now. I hope I have answered the questions which have been propounded to me in regard to my past action, for which I decline no responsibility.

Mr. ALLEN. With the consent of the Senator, I should like to put him a question.

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. I will ask the Senator if he knows anything about the character of the persons who are usually selected as deputy marshals at the different polling places, and also whether the tendency of the law now under consideration has the effect of depriving to any extent respectable citizens of the right to vote?

Mr. PALMER. I answer the question of the Senator from Nebraska by saying that my observation is that the class of men who are usually assembled around the polls are not chosen by their neighbors; they are not men who possess popular confidence; they are often called that they may simply get their pay for the day or for a number of days, and their presence is a deterrent to self-respecting men, who would otherwise take part in the elections in the States.

Mr. ALLEN. I will ask the Senator the further question whether the practical operation of the law now under consideration has the effect of transferring the control of local elections to national authority, and in that sense destroys the efficiency and power of the local authorities?

Mr. PALMER. I fully agree with all that is implied in the question of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator misunderstands me. I did not imply that that was true. I simply asked as a matter of information.

Mr. PALMER. I accept the implication and concur with the suggestion. The suggestion is a pertinent one. I will say that the present law tends to degrade the elections and degrade those who are charged with the duty of conducting elections, and I conclude by repeating the proposition I advanced yesterday, that the cultivation on the part of the election officers and of the voters of respect for themselves and respect for their own rights as independent freemen is essential to the purity of popular elections.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, nothing surprises me more than the idea which the Senator from Illinois appears to entertain, and which the Senator from Nebraska advances, that this bill is a bill to promote the control by the people in their own localities of their own elections. That this bill should masquerade under that pretense seems to me most astounding, when it is only a bill for Federal observation so far as the conduct of the election is concerned, as was developed yesterday, and when the bill proposes to remit to certain States the control of their own elections without Federal observation, not by townships, as the Senator from Illinois says, not by the people themselves in their own voting places, as the Senator from Nebraska says, but to oligarchies, a little handful of men at the State capitals of the various States, who control the elections in the voting places, and not the people in each locality.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Does not this subject, after all, resolve itself to this proposition: The relative honesty of the men who are in control of the elections?

Mr. CHANDLER. The relative honesty?

Mr. ALLEN. The relative honesty of the men who are in the control of elections.

Mr. CHANDLER. In actual control?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. No, sir. If the Senator will allow me, it involves a great principle. The Senator from Illinois wants to apply it in one way. He wants to apply the principle of local self-government by giving it to oligarchies at the State capitals. I want to apply the principle of local self-government by giving it to the people of each locality.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me, why should the Government, by the intervention of marshals and deputy marshals, undertake to interfere with or to observe the elections held in the different States? What is to be gained by it? Is it not a confession that local self-government is itself a failure? Is it not a confession that the people of the different States of the Union can not be intrusted with the election machinery of their own States?

Mr. CHANDLER. It is an assertion of national power over the election of Representatives in Congress, and, to the extent to which that implies that there is a need of such supervision, it is a distrust of the machinery of the States, which is amply justified by the history of the past and the laws of the States which are now upon their statute books.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to ask the Senator, with his permission, one more question. Is it not a notorious fact that, in the cities where the election law is sought to be enforced, the deputy marshals are notoriously thugs who are brought there in consequence of their notoriously bad and desperate character to control the election?

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, it is notoriously otherwise. The Senator has got hold of a Democratic campaign lie of some twenty years' standing, which has been exploded for nineteen years, and is repeating it in the Senate. The Senator is, however, entitled to an answer to his question. It is not notorious. It is not the fact.

Mr. ALLEN. What is the character of the persons usually employed to observe the elections, that is, with reference to their being responsible, law-abiding, and honorable citizens?

Mr. CHANDLER. As a whole, excellent, as good as the character of any election officers in the Senator's State or any other State.

The Senator has only begun to read up on this subject. He has started back to 1871. If the Senator will kindly read down to 1893 he will find—for his question is entitled to a fair answer—that, with few exceptions, the character of the Federal supervisors and the character of the special deputy marshals has been excellent. They have not all been men who, if left to themselves, would find their way into the United States Senate.

I repeat to the Senator that, take the history of the national election laws for now some twenty-one years, the character of the Federal officials who have been employed, the supervisors and deputy marshals, has been on the whole as good as that of any election officers in the States.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from New Hampshire permit me to make an observation at this point in reply to a suggestion of his?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. I have endeavored to ascertain the correct workings of this law, and wherever I have been able to obtain any information which I regarded as reliable, I have not failed to do so. The impression made upon my mind all the way through of the workings of this law is, that it has been a law to perpetuate in power the political party which happened to be in power at the time the election was being held, and that it is a virtual transfer of the election machinery of the different States into the hands of the National Government; and, as a rule, the persons who are charged with the duty of inspecting the registration and observing the polling of the vote are of a lower character than the persons over whom they are set to watch.

Mr. CHANDLER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to read now from the report of a committee of the House of Representatives made two years ago. I read from page 7. Speaking of certain arrests the committee say:

> With a few exceptions, the United States marshals and supervisors who made these arrests were in appearance most disreputable. Almost all of them were grossly ignorant, and in general they had been evidently recruited from the lowest mass of the population of a great city. Decidedly the best of them were the colored marshals, who were able to give their evidence in an intelligent manner. Undoubtedly, among the United States marshals and supervisors who were appointed at this election were very many respectable men, but those chosen to make these partisan arrests were of the lowest class of our population. It is a matter of regret to the members of the committee who were present on election day and heard the evidence in regard to these arrests that it is not possible to reproduce in description the contrast which existed between the persons who were hired to make these arrests and the citizens who were thus arrested, charged with offenses of which they were innocent and thereby deprived of their right to vote.

I desire to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that this extract is a correct portrayal of the information I have had upon this subject. I do believe that the whole purpose of this act is to transfer the control of the election machinery in the different States into the hands of the Federal Government, a power which ought not to be exercised in common fairness and honesty to the States, and that the power to control the election machinery of the States at this time in the history of this country should be left with the States themselves.

I had no purpose, Mr. President, in participating in this Republican and Democratic discussion. I do not know that I have any interest in it particularly, but I do believe that the Federal election law ought to be repealed.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator what in principle or reason there is why the election of a member of the National Congress should be dealt with by any other authority than the nation? What right have the States to deal with it at all? I understand that the matter of the State dealing with that subject is a matter of mere convenience. The States hold elections, and, therefore, it is well when they are having their elections to have our elections held at the same time, so that the expense may be saved of a double arrangement; but, in constitutional principle, why have the States any right to come and say, "We demand to control this authority; you keep off of it," any more than they would have the right to say about the appointment of custom-house officers, or collectors, or of foreign ministers? I should like the Senator's view of that proposition before he sits down, if he will give it.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me a moment?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if the Constitution itself does not confer the first power upon the States, subject, of course, to be altered or changed by the General Government? Is not the power conferred by the Constitution itself on the States to control elections?

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Arkansas does not need to ask me that question. He knows the answer, and he knows that I know the answer. It is a matter of convenience.

Mr. BERRY. That is a correct statement. The Constitution says that elections shall be controlled by the States, subject to be altered or changed by the General Government.

Mr. HOAR. To be altered or changed—exactly, and that is done as a matter of pure convenience, as stated. Undoubtedly the Constitution says so, just as the Constitution might have said Congress should confer the function to make United States postmasters upon the selectmen of the towns or places where they are to serve, or any other national function. But my question was deeper and broader than that answer. I am speaking now of the matter of constitutional principle. We are a nation. I suppose the honorable Senator from Nebraska is as decidedly of that opinion as I am.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir; I have been aware of that for some time.

Mr. HOAR. Nobody denies it. We are a nation, not a league of nations. In regard to matters which are within our national domain we are a sovereign, not a league of sovereigns, although the States undoubtedly, in my judgment, have very large powers of sovereignty, and one of the things which is purely national is the United States House of Representatives. The members of that body do not represent States as do the Senators; they represent districts of the United States and the people thereof in their relation to and as a part of the national legislative power. Therefore, in all logic and in all reason the function of choosing those is a national function, the superintendence of that function is a national duty, securing that right is a national obligation, and the fact that the Constitution itself says that, as a matter of convenience, while the States are holding their elections, we will let them manage these, reserving our complete control over them, seems to me to indicate that it is not a sound principle to say that it is a State function primarily.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Massachusetts evidently misunderstands my position. I do not deny the power of the General Government in a certain measure to supervise these elections; I do not pretend to say that they are State elections in the sense in which the Senator from Massachusetts would indicate; but I do say that, granting that the General Government has power to control these elections or to supervise them to some extent, it is not wise, it is not good policy, for the Government to interfere with the election machinery of any State or Territory unless there be a controlling necessity for such action. The very safety of this Government, in my judgment at least, depends upon a wide distribution of power and the placing of responsibility for the control of our elections and the machinery of our Government out among the people, and keeping it there.

The General Government should never reach its hand into any State or Territory to control its elections, unless there be a controlling necessity for it, unless the people of that State or Territory have shown themselves manifestly incapable of having a fair election. In my judgment, the experience of this nation under the law now under consideration has been that the elections are infinitely worse, as a rule, in the hands of Federal supervisors than those in the hands of the local authorities.

On the question of the right of Congress to pass an act such as this and to supervise the elections, I thing I agree perfectly with the Senator from Massachusetts. I agree with him in the further statement that this is a nation and not a league of States; but it is a nation with limited and controlled powers, a nation which draws its powers from the Constitution, and not from any authority outside of it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I am confident that if we had only to deal with the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Nebraska on the other side of the Chamber, we should succeed in reaching a common basis upon which a large portion of these laws might be saved. They might insist upon some amendments of the present law, but I think those two Senators could easily be induced, if the debate were prolonged, to assent to some measure of assertion of national power over the election of Representatives in Congress.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. CHANDLER. I was going to ask the Senator a question, but certainly I will yield to him.

Mr. ALLEN. The party platform of the People's party, the party to which I have the honor to belong, provides for the control of those elections by the Australian ballot system, and, in my judgment, that is the only wise plan.

Mr. CHANDLER. Are they in favor of a national Australian ballot law?

Mr. ALLEN. It is not stated whether it shall be national or State.

Mr. CHANDLER. They have not reached that point yet.

Mr. ALLEN. But I infer the intention is that it shall be State.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator will allow me again to compliment him upon the spirit of large nationality which was disclosed in his closing remarks, which give me hope that, if we could get at the People's party on this question, we could induce them to consent to support a national election law applicable to the choice of Representatives in Congress, having the Australian features in it. Therefore I do not regard him as I do not regard the Senator from Illinois as the proper champion of this bill. I hope to see upon the floor of the Senate before the discussion ends some of the Senators who seek to belittle national power, and therefore wish to repeal these laws. The Senators who have already spoken, the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Nebraska, have too broad a nationality to be even the advance guard of this assault upon national power. I say, and I repeat it, that if we had to deal with those two Senators alone, we should have no doubt of the preservation of some portion of these laws upon the statute books.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me to emphasize the fact that I recognize the national authority and right to supervise elections of Representatives in Congress whenever that may be necessary; but I dissent most emphatically from the position made by the Senator from New Hampshire and the implied position of the Senator from Massachusetts that there is any necessity for a law of this kind.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand the position.

Mr. ALLEN. Whenever in the history of the country the time comes, if it ever does come, that it is essential, in order to preserve the purity of our elections which fill the lower House of Congress and possibly the upper House, for the Government to legislate on the subject of elections, in my judgment it will have the power to do so. I do not dispute the question of power.

Mr. CHANDLER. We welcome the Senator, then.

Mr. ALLEN. But, in my judgment, the effect of the law has been not only destructive of the rights of the citizens in a great many instances, but I recall cases where, under the guise of national power, or the claim of national power, legislative bodies of different States in the Union have been overturned by the strong military arm of the Government; and I deny that the Government has the power, when it comes to that question, under this law or under the Constitution or under any statute which can be framed, to destroy the autonomy of a State Legislature. I deny that the Government has that power. I deny that there is any cause or any occasion for the existence of a law such as the one under consideration.

Mr. CHANDLER. May I ask the Senator from Nebraska whether he would be willing to vote for a national Australian ballot law?

Mr. ALLEN. Whenever it is essential; whenever it is necessary.

Mr. CHANDLER. Would the Senator vote for it if it were pending now?

Mr. ALLEN. No, sir; it is not necessary.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, I repeat (and everything which the Senator has said confirms me in my previous statement) that I should expect to retain the laws if we only had to address ourselves to Senators like the Senator from Nebraska, because his heart is right on the fundamental principle of the assertion of national power. He is mistaken only in his facts. He is mistaken in asserting that there has not been occasion for the exercise of national power. He is mistaken in the belief that there is no need now for the election laws. After the pending bill is passed the Senator will have abundant occasion within the next four years, in my belief, to wish that his vote had been given for keeping the laws on the statute book.

I ask the attention of the Senator from Nebraska a moment in reference to the character of the persons who have been appointed to administer the law in the States. I desire in the discussion of this question to deal with entire candor and fairness with every question that is put to me. The Senator is convinced that the marshals who have been appointed under the law have been persons of bad character, unfit appointees. I supposed at first that the Senator had had called to his attention a list of alleged disreputable appointees that has been paraded as an argument against these laws for the last twenty years. I desire to say to the Senator with reference to that list, which will be called to his attention and will undoubtedly be introduced into this debate, that I understand it to be an alleged list of marshals who were appointed under the law of July, 1870, which was a naturalization law.

Two sections were attached to that law in which there was authority given to a United States judge to appoint two citizens as watchers, and the United States marshal was authorized to appoint special deputies to preserve order. That law was in use in New York City at the election of November, 1870. It was subsequently repealed, and it was replaced by the law of May 31, 1870, which, amended by the law of February 28, 1871, is the present statute.

The list which has been paraded in debate may have been to some extent the subject of criticism. There may have been upon that list the names of bad men, although I am sure an analysis of the names which were cited would show and has shown that the statements about these deputy marshals was a gross exaggeration, and that the criticisms of the list were properly reducible to a minimum. Since that time, during the whole twenty-one years of the enforcement of the present law, there have been developed very few specific cases of incompetent or dishonest or characterless officers appointed to execute it.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from New Hampshire permit a question?

Mr. CHANDLER. Most certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. Is it not true as a rule that the persons who are appointed deputy marshals to attend at the polls are the partisans of the party procuring their appointment?

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator mean that they belong to the party which procures their appointment?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand the contrary to be the case. The supervisors, the Senator understands, are to be of different political parties, and they are appointed by the court. The deputy marshals are appointed by the marshal, and he is responsible for their appointment. I understand that the marshal of the city of New York has always appointed two persons in each election district and that he has appointed one from each party. I may be mistaken about it, but that is what I understand to be the case.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me to ask him another question?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. It is true under the law, is it not, that the deputy marshals have plenary power at the polls? They have power to arrest without warrant and to take persons arrested before a commissioner or a court and require bail or imprisonment. Now, is there any provision for a remedy to the persons who are wrongfully arrested other than the pecuniary responsibility of the marshal himself?

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not know of any extraordinary provision. What provision would the Senator suggest?

Mr. ALLEN. Is there any provision for the deputy marshals to give bond for the faithful discharge of their duties, or are they simply gathered up and sworn in without any bonds, having no responsibility whatever except their pecuniary responsibility to the person arrested where they may commit a trespass?

Mr. CHANDLER. They are appointed by the marshal of the district upon his responsibility. His bond covers their acts. What would the Senator have?

Mr. ALLEN. I must beg the Senator's pardon. Certainly the bond of the marshal does not control the acts of the deputies.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does not the bond of the marshal cover the acts of his deputies?

Mr. ALLEN. Not necessarily so. These officers, I understand, are taken promiscuously without any bond, and act without any responsibility whatever.

Mr. CHANDLER. They are appointed for election day. I do not think they give bond; but I am quite confident that the bond of the marshal covers the acts of the special deputy marshals whom he appoints for election day.

Mr. ALLEN. Allow me to ask the Senator from New Hampshire another question. Suppose one of the deputy marshals in discharging his duties at the polls should unlawfully arrest an election officer and carry him off to prison, so as to make him guilty at common law of trespass, does the Senator pretend to say that the bond of the marshal who appointed him would be responsible for that act?

Mr. CHANDLER. I am inclined to think that if he got judgment against the deputy marshal, the marshal would be responsible.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator is certainly at fault. The only remedy of the honest citizen who is disgraced and who is prevented from discharging his duty, is the pecuniary responsibility of the deputy marshal, if he happens to be pecuniarily responsible.

Mr. CHANDLER. In an action for false imprisonment.

Mr. ALLEN. What would that amount to, if the deputy marshal had no property that could be taken to satisfy the judgment?

Mr. CHANDLER. What would the Senator have? Would he have the deputy marshal beheaded?

Mr. ALLEN. Is there any criminal responsibility upon the part of the deputy marshals for an excessive use or abuse of their power? There is none whatever.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me, he is making a speech instead of asking a question.

Mr. ALLEN. I beg pardon.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will permit me, I want to ask him some questions.

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suppose deputy marshals have the same responsibility that rests upon all other officers when they make arrests. Why should a person who is arrested for a fraud in connection with an election be protected from unlawful arrest in any way different from any other citizen who is subject to unlawful arrest, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know that I understand the Senator. If he will repeat the question, please, I shall try to answer him.

Mr. CHANDLER. Why should a person wrongfully arrested for an election fraud have any other remedy against the officer arresting him than has a citizen arrested for any other offense?

Mr. ALLEN. He should not have, but he should have the same protection from wrongful arrest for that offense that he has for any other.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does he not have it?

Mr. ALLEN. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire, if he will permit me, that there is not a State or a Territory in the Union where an officer of that character is not required to give bond and whose bondsmen are not responsible for an excessive use of his power. A bond is required to be given especially for that purpose and for no other purpose.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator's suggestions are certainly worthy of investigation, and if I could convince him that the election laws ought to be kept on the statute book I perhaps would join with him in a suitable amendment of the law.

Now, Mr. President, I will go on in reference to the deputy marshals. I have spoken of the deputy marshals in 1871. If the Senator from Nebraska will remain where my voice can reach him I wish to ask him some other questions.

The Senator has read from a recent House report with reference to deputy marshals appointed, I think, in New York City at the election in 1892. I do not think that report is entitled to be credited as to the character of the deputy marshals. I myself once read the report, and I am not prepared to take its assertions as derogatory to the deputy marshals appointed by the marshal for the southern district of New York at the time when the censure of the committee of the House was placed upon him. They were appointed by the United States marshal at the time, and I have no doubt whatever that the marshal who made the appointments which were censured by the committee will be abundantly able to vindicate the character of his appointees.

I was about to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question in reference to the views which he submitted concerning the encroachments upon the principle of local rule affected by the national election laws, but as he has left the Chamber, and as I see the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] is getting impatient at the unusual extension of the debate this afternoon, I will reserve the question until I again see the Senator from Nebraska in the Chamber.

Mr. VEST obtained the floor.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. VEST. Certainly, with great pleasure.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, the question seems to have arrived at a parliamentary stage when a vote might be taken; but I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire in regard to the probable course of the debate on the side of those who are opposed to the repealing bill. When does the Senator think we can fairly get the measure before the Senate for a final disposition of it? I have been appealed to by the Senator from New Hampshire and by others on that side, for whom I have great regard, to delay the consideration of the bill on the ground that they are not ready now to address themselves to its consideration; but it must be borne in mind that those who are charged with the responsibility of bringing the measure to the front and of keeping it there occupy a very delicate position.

It seems to me, after a delay of nearly three weeks, in which, in order that the convenience of Senators might be consulted, ample notice has been given on more than two occasions that the bill would at an interval of a week be brought forward and its consideration pressed, that they can hardly now desist from what seems to be the manifest duty of asking for a vote when debate stops, either now or to-morrow or any other day when the Senate may be in session and the bill remains the unfinished business. I should like to have some expression of opinion from the Senator from New Hampshire, who seems to be in charge of the matter on the other side.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am unwilling to proceed with the debate in the absence of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. HILL]. The reasons which called that Senator from the Chamber are very well known to the Senator from Delaware. I have had the honor to submit a report which makes very serious reflections upon the election laws of the State of New York, and certain results which have been accomplished in that State mainly under the direction of the senior Senator from New York. I myself am certainly unwilling to debate that part of the report in the absence of the Senator from New York. If the Senator from Delaware knows when the Senator from New York will be here I should say we could begin the debate at that time, end it, and have a vote within a reasonable period thereafter. Is that satisfactory to the Senator?

Mr. GRAY. I very much appreciate the delicacy the Senator from New Hampshire has shown in regard to the absence of the Senator from New York, but it so happened that in the course of my duty as a member of the committee having charge of the bill, I constantly consulted the senior Senator from New York in reference to its consideration, and when he went away he indicated that he wished no delay at all. He appreciated the fact that the matter ought to come before the Senate and be proceeded with, and he would take the responsibility of being here in time to have his share in the debate; but at all events, he certainly expressed no desire to have the matter continued, knowing it would come to the front, and that notice had been given that it would be taken up yesterday.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from New York could hardly have said he was willing that the debate should proceed to an end and that a vote should be taken in his absence.

Mr. GRAY. He did not say anything about a vote. I consulted with him as a Senator who was very much interested in the matter of the repeal of these laws and he knew the bill was to be brought up yesterday. So I think I can speak for him in that regard. He was more than willing that it should come to the front and take its parliamentary course. That suggestion, therefore, does not appeal to me at all, for the reasons that I have stated. But I should like to know whether there are other reasons why the Senator from New Hampshire would like to have the matter go over now.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Delaware is entitled to a perfectly fair and frank answer from me. I stated to-day that there are a dozen Senators who, I thought, had more or less intention of speaking on this subject. There are a half-dozen Senators who have definitely decided to speak, and I have urged them to be ready. There certainly is no desire on this side of the Chamber to shirk debate. We have no desire to avoid a full discussion of the questions involved in the pending bill, and if we are a little dilatory in getting ready, Senators must not attribute it to a lack of zeal, but rather to some of the extraordinary events of the last week.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator in his place indicate what day will suit the Senators on his side to take up seriously a discussion of the bill and proceed with it as such things are usually proceeded with where it is the intention to reach a result?

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not wish to take offense at anything the Senator has said, but he does not mean to say that we have not been serious in discussing the bill so far?

Mr. GRAY. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator does not mean, when he asks us when we shall be ready to discuss the bill seriously, that we have not been dicussing it with seriousness and gravity thus far?

Mr. GRAY. I did not say so; but I understood from what the Senator said that he had not himself considered that the bill had been taken up in the way he wished it to be taken up by those who are opposed to its passage.

Mr. CHANDLER. To that construction of the word I make no objection.

Mr. GRAY. That is what I gathered from what the Senator said.

Mr. CHANDLER. I agree that it is time for a serious discussion of the subject in that sense.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator indicate when, in that sense, serious discussion ought to commence?

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like the assistance on that question of my friend, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. There are other Senators who want to speak.

Mr. HIGGINS. I will state, in answer to the suggestion of my colleague [Mr. GRAY], that we on this side of the Chamber will be ready to take up the subject on Monday next. I wish to submit some remarks, and I think I will be ready at that time.

Mr. GRAY. I have been told more than once that there are a number of Senators on the other side who wish to submit remarks on the bill. The only question is as to the time. The time can not be indefinitely postponed, of course.

Mr. HIGGINS. It is probable the Senate will adjourn over Saturday, possibly over Friday, and only to-morrow will intervene. I presume it would suit all to say that the debate shall begin on next Monday and go on die in diem.

Mr. GRAY. Is that the understanding of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

Mr. GRAY. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire, if the Senator from Maine will permit me, whether it is his understanding which my colleague has just expressed?

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to hear from the Senator from Maine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. GRAY. I yield, of course, but I want the Senator from New Hampshire to express his opinion about it.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, it was very decidedly my intention to make one or more speeches on the pending bill, but, as the Senator from Delaware knows, my time has been very thoroughly occupied for the last fortnight upon the Committee on Foreign Relations, where I am compelled to be at 10 o'clock every morning. I have not a mind that has capacity enough to hold three or four things at the same time. It is now taken up largely with the Hawaiian question.

Then, again, it is very hard work to discuss a question where the affirmative side of the proposition have nothing to say. I do not mean to charge the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] with saying nothing yesterday, but I should like to be able to reply to somebody——

Mr. GRAY (to Mr. FRYE). Reply to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to reply to the Senators from Mississippi; I should like to reply to the Senators from South Carolina; I should like to reply to the Senators from Florida. If the election laws are to be repealed and we are to be remitted to the State laws, I should like to have those gentlemen show that their State laws are in proper condition now for us to rely upon.

Mr. GRAY. If I may be permitted to speak for them in their absence, I have no doubt that they would like to reply to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FRYE. We are perfectly dazed here by finding an extraordinary proposition before Congress and the Democratic party having nothing to say to convert each other. When the silver bill was under discussion there was no lack of argument on the other side of the Chamber. Democrats had to try to convince other Democrats.

When the tariff bill is before the Senate I have no doubt the Democratic side will find itself in precisely the same condition; Democratic Senators will be compelled to convert Senators on their own side and to make speeches for their conversion. When, for instance, the question of Hawaiian affairs is before the Senate I have no doubt there will be Democrats enough who will have something to say, and that they will be compelled to say it, too, for the purpose of convincing gentlemen on their own side of the Chamber.

But here is an extraordinary proposition which seems to need on the affirmative side of it absolute silence practically. The South introduced the proposition into the other House and insisted that the election laws must be repealed, and led their Northern allies to support the repeal. I imagine the South as represented in the Senate is insisting upon the repeal of those laws, and that it has brought into the service as figureheads distinguished Democrats from the North rather than themselves to take the lead.

Now, I am surprised that while on every other question there is division, there is discussion, there is give and take, there is something said which calls for reply, in this case there is nothing. While the Democratic party is divided on everything else, whilst now it has immense difficulties within its own limits and its own borders on every question of any importance that comes before the Senate, it is very noticeable that when there is a proposition which opens up the ballot box to opportunities for fraud there is no division whatever on the Democratic side; they are as one man, of one mind; they are solid; they are enthusiastic even to the extent of absolute silence. That question is always certain to unite the Democratic party. I am not entirely certain that the question has not been brought before the Senate for one purpose and one only, to unite the discordant ranks of the Democratic party.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator ought not to begrudge us one measure on which we are united.

Mr. FRYE. I do not begrudge it, but I should like to have the Senators on the other side give some reasons why they are so united on the question of the repeal of the election laws, in order that I may have an opportunity to reply to a certain extent.

Mr. GRAY. Being so united there is hardly any necessity for any special attempt on the part of one Democrat to convert another, as the Senator said awhile ago was done during the recent financial debate.

Mr. FRYE. I do not fancy the cold-blooded method in the United States Senate of a Senator rising in his seat with a pile of books before him, and for an hour or two or three hours reading, with perhaps only one Senator, generally the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN] or the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER], apparently listening to the effusion.

It is not agreeable talking under those circumstances. If we can have a debate even on the Federal election laws, I think it would be a delightful thing and would bring the Senate back to the old times of years ago. I would a great deal rather enter into a controversy, if you please, or a contest, notwithstanding the Democrats are so united, than in a cold-blooded way rise in my seat to oppose a proposition which has been made by the other side and is hardly supported by a word.

Mr. GRAY. I congratulate the Senator from Maine on the fact that he has changed somewhat his attitude toward an important measure and the mode in which it should be put upon its passage or be considered by the Senate; but there are some of us who recollect that about three years ago when a question quite as important as the repeal bill was before the Senate—I refer to the proposition to pass what was known as the force bill——

Mr. FRYE. What was said by the other side to be the force bill.

Mr. GRAY. What was said on our side to be the force bill.

I am willing to so accept it. I remember that then the tactics by which the bill was brought before the Senate and by which it was proposed to pass it were absolute silence on the other side, and an attempt to draw out the Senators on this side, and to confine the speaking as largely as possible to those who were opposed to the passage of the bill. I recollect very distinctly that as speech after speech was made on this side of the Chamber in opposition to the bill, the chairs on the other side were rapidly emptied and their occupants found refuge in the cloakrooms or committee rooms, or some other place that was more congenial to them. That is precisely what was done.

The pending bill has been brought forward in regular course and according to the usages of the Senate, without the violation of any courtesy, I may say, and with every disposition, as manifested on the floor, to extend the utmost indulgence and consider to the uttermost in this debate the convenience of all Senators, especially those who are opposed to the bill. I do not think the Senator from Maine will deny that.

If there is no occasion for arguments addressed by one to another on this side, as the Senator from Maine seems to have admitted by saying that we present a solid front, and that we are at last perfectly united, then there is not the same occasion for the Senator from Maine to insist upon one or another coming forward to speak. I suppose that this debate will be conducted as all other debates have been conducted and must be conducted in the Senate, according to the usages that have obtained and the convenience of individual members of the Senate. When a man wishes to speak or thinks he has anything to say he will be apt to say it; and if the debate does go on I have no doubt that much will be said on both sides.

But that is not now the question. The question is, when the other side, after all that has been conceded on this side in regard to their convenience, are willing that this matter shall be taken up and proceeded with, die in diem, as my colleague said, until a conclusion. If the Senator from Maine agrees with my colleague, and they are willing to proceed on Monday, that course shall be pursued, in view of the suggestion my colleague has made that it is possible we may adjourn from to-morrow over until Monday, and I have no objection to letting the whole matter go over until then.

Mr. FRYE. I do not exercise the right of having anything to say about when the debate shall close or when it shall commence. I do not regard any speeches of mine as of sufficient importance to delay a measure or to ask for any procrastination in its consideration.

Mr. GRAY. That is from Wednesday until next Monday. Upon the Senator from New Hampshire, who is a member of the committee and an important member, who submitted the views of the minority, saying that he agrees with what my colleague said——

Mr. CHANDLER. I have never.

Mr. GRAY. I have no doubt he means to deal fairly with this matter. I have never suspected otherwise.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think the Senator from Delaware means to deal fairly with the subject. I am aware that he has subjected himself to some criticism for not getting the bill through right away, within a week or two. I had an idea the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] wanted it passed right off. I have not supposed that a bill could be passed in that way. There is no closure rule yet in the Senate, and until there is a closure rule if a half dozen Senators wish to speak upon a bill and are not quite ready in the midst of other exciting events, I take it for granted that the time will be given to be ready, and that it will be assumed when the request is made that it is made in good faith and not for the purposes of delay.

I assume also, on the other hand, that as long as there is no closure rule in the Senate, unless Senators intend to prolong debate and prolong the consideration of the bill unfairly, they will, after the debate has been sufficiently prolonged to allow everybody who wishes to speak to do so, consent to the fixing of a time for taking the vote. But the Senator from Delaware, the other day, pushed up as I supposed by others, got the floor before the debate had commenced, as it seemed to me, to ask me whether I was prepared to fix a time when the debate should close and a vote be taken. I was not prepared to——

Mr. GRAY. The Senator is not prepared now to answer the question.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am not prepared now to answer that question.

Mr. GRAY. Very well. Now, I want——

Mr. CHANDLER. I had not got through.

Mr. GRAY. I beg pardon; I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wished to say to the Senator that I do not think the usual course has been pursued in this body; that I think there was a disposition in the beginning to distrust the minority and to assume that we wanted unreasonable delay. There has been no intention of that sort.

Mr. GRAY. That seems very absurd, if I may be permitted I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire, in view of what has taken place on this floor on three several occasions. When the suggestion was made by the Senator from New Hampshire on two several occasions that the matter should go over a week hence it was acceded to on the ground that it would consult his convenience and that of his colleagues. It was acceded to without a word or without criticism; and yet now after nearly three weeks he says the matter has not been conducted in the usual way. The only thing unusual about it has been the unusual concession which has been made and the unusual disposition, so far as I have observed the Senate, to indulge in every way the Senators who are opposed to the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I do not rise to make any complaint of the Senator from Delaware. On the contrary, so far as I have observed his course in this matter it is not liable to any complaint or exception whatever. For my part I have not been here all the time. I do not think that it would be profitable at this moment to go into a discussion of the proceedings in regard to the management or conduct on either side of the contest over the election bill. Therefore I will not take the time of the Senate at present by narrating that history as I understand it. But as the Senator from Delaware has made a statement about it, I think I ought not to let that statement pass without simply observing that I do not agree with him. I think the Senator is mistaken in his statement about the history of the debate on the election bill.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator means the bill called the force bill on this side?

Mr. HOAR. I do mean exactly that measure.

Mr. GRAY. It must be very fresh in the recollection of most Senators in this Chamber that the election bill to which the Senator from Massachusetts refers was brought forward on the very day after Congress met in December, and was resolutely kept to the front from that day until a conclusion of some kind was reached—some six, seven, or eight weeks—without any intermission whatever. There was no time given; no indulgence conceded to those who were opposed to the passage of that bill. They were expected to be ready to debate it. Not a word was said on the other side; and when two or three speeches on this side had been delivered, I recollect, so far as I contributed my humble part to that debate, the Presiding Officer was about to put the question to a vote when I took the floor, and everyone sat silent on the other side, although not one speech had been made on that side in favor of the bill——

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. GRAY. Except by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. That is something.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] has been ignored in that respect to-day.

Mr. FRYE. I apologize for that.

Mr. GRAY. I apologize for this, then. There was an opening speech by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. That measure was introduced in the previous session of Congress, and I do not suppose there was an intelligent small boy in the country old enough to observe the current political history who did not know, who did not believe, at any rate, that there was a purpose on the part of the opponents of the bill to prevent a vote being taken upon it, to consume time by debate and by other parliamentary processes if it had taken till doomsday. After the bill had been introduced, had been explained and discussed not only by me but by other Senators on this side of the Chamber in the previous session, it became apparent that if the measure was not put in advance or if it were postponed there would be either upon the tariff bill or on it such prolonged debate upon the part of the minority that neither measure would reach a vote. I do not say that that was avowed, but it was understood; and there was talk of a cloture.

There were consultations on the part of the friends of that bill. There was an agreement by an entire majority of the Senate upon the form and terms of a cloture rule, which it was thought might be necessary. Then the matter went over to the first Monday of December with notice that it was to be taken up and pressed through when Congress came back at the new session. All that had preceded the history which the Senator from Delaware states. When we met in December there were arrangements to fill up the time day after day. At 5 o'clock some Senator would come around and say, "I do not feel very well to-night, and wish you would let the bill go over until to-morrow," or "I do not want to take the floor at 4 or 5 o'clock," and more in good nature than wisdom I would yield; and I was more than thankful I did in one case, it happened, where I should have been sorry all my life if I had not.

That is the history of that matter, without going into it any more fully. Nobody ever said in terms, "We shall talk until doomsday." I suppose their purpose was concealed under parliamentary methods. But we on our side supposed that was the purpose, and I suppose now that it was the purpose. Afterwards, some three or four Republican Senators, for reasons satisfactory to them, united with the Democrats, and the bill was postponed, and that was the end of it.

Now, I wish to say to the Senator from Delaware, while I do not think any useful purpose can be subserved by this narrative, we agree about it. My friend insisted upon referring to it after I said I did not want to state it; and I have stated my understanding of the matter.

I do not conceive that anything of that kind comes up now. The Democratic party is in the majority in this body and they have the right, after reasonable debate, to have the measures they propose brought to a vote. It is the right of the American people that they should be brought to a vote; and if anything has been done on the other side or by anybody else it would not, in my opinion, justify a resort to that kind of tactics on our side now. I do not believe there is a Senator on this side of the Chamber who either expects or desires anything but a reasonable debate in conformance with the importance of this subject, but which, as compared with other great debates, will be a brief one, in the due and orderly course of business, and then a vote.

I do not believe there is any other purpose anywhere. I have not seen, or heard, or suspected any such purpose. If this matter be taken up Monday morning, or Tuesday morning, or Wednesday morning, or any other morning, it will be through in the ordinary, natural course. Several Senators who desire to speak on it say they are not ready to speak to-day or to-morrow. That is the whole of it. Of course, there is plenty of opportunity for wrangle and discussion and debate upon the exciting experiences of the past, and if the Senators want it we shall have it. I do not myself propose to waste any time over it.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me one moment, I merely want to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I am disappointed in a perfectly candid effort to arrive at an arrangement that will suit the convenience of all sides on this subject.

Mr. HOAR. What does the Senator want?

Mr. GRAY. I asked the Senator from New Hampshire to indicate whether he would act on the suggestion of my colleague, but he declined. I have made the attempt and I am sorry it has not been responded to in the spirit in which it was made. If the Senator from Missouri, who has the floor, will permit me, as the hour is late, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator from Delaware to withhold that motion for a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware withdraw the motion?

Mr. GRAY. I do.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator left the floor complaining of me, when he interrupted me while I was answering his question. He took the floor and engaged in debate with the Senator from Massachusetts and did not wait to hear my answer to his question.

Mr. VEST. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. GRAY. I renew my motion, Mr. President.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and twelve minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 18, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 17, 1894.

ENVOY EXTRAORDINARY AND MINISTER PLENIPOTENTIARY.

William I. Buchanan, of Iowa, to be envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States to the Argentine Republic, vice John R. G. Pitkin, resigned.

CONSULS.

Edward W. S. Tingle, of Montana, to be consul of the United States at Brunswick, Germany, vice Cyrus W. Field, recalled.

Allen Thomas, of Florida, to be consul of the United States at La Guayra, Venezuela, vice Philip C. Hanna, recalled.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS.

John F. B. Beckwith, of Georgia, to be collector of customs for the district of Savannah, in the State of Georgia, to succeed Tomlinson F. Johnson, whose term of office will expire by limitation January 24, 1894.

Marion M. Hutson, of South Carolina, to be collector of customs for the district of Beaufort, in the State of South Carolina, to succeed Robert Smalls, resigned.

SURVEYOR OF CUSTOMS.

John M. Burks, of Nebraska, to be surveyor of customs for the port of Lincoln, in the State of Nebraska, to succeed Henry C. McArthur, resigned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 17, 1894.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m., and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SURVEYS FOR GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of appropriation submitted by the Secretary of the Interior for reproducing plats of surveys for the General Land Office; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL FITZHUGH, ADMINISTRATOR, VS. THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Court of Claims, transmitting the findings of the court in the case of Samuel Fitzhugh, administrator of Henry Fitzhugh, deceased, vs. The United States—which was referred to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. WANGER, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of George R. Burnett, without leaving copies.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE SENATOR STANFORD.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the special order fixed for next Saturday at 2 p. m., for the delivery of eulogies on the late Senator Stanford, be postponed until Saturday, the 10th of February, at the same hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] asks unanimous consent that the order fixed for next Saturday, for the delivery of eulogies on the late Senator Stanford, be vacated and fixed anew for Saturday, February 10, at the hour of 2 o'clock, the same hour as the present order. Without objection this order will be made.

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE CHANGES.

By unanimous consent, at their own request, the following members were excused from further service on the committees named:

Mr. DE ARMOND, from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SIBLEY, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COMPTON, from the Committee on the Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress.

The Speaker announced the following committee appointments:

To the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Mr. MONEY.

To the Committee on the Judiciary, Mr. DE ARMOND.

To the Committee on Naval Affairs, Mr. GRIFFIN.

To the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, Mr. GRIFFIN.

To the Committee on the Library, Mr. COMPTON, Mr. BARTLETT, and Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania.

LOVICA HALL.

Mr. HOOKER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3195) the title of which is "granting an increase of pension to Lovica Hall, a widow of a soldier of the war of 1812."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the laws for pensioning soldiers and their widows of the war of 1812, the name of Lovica Hall, widow of Asa Hall, late a private of Captain James Houser's company, United States Artillery, at the rate of $25 per month.

The committee reported the following amendment:

In line 8, strike out the word "twenty-five" and insert the word "twelve," so as to read "at the rate of $12 per month."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HOOKER] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill. Is there objection?

Mr. KILGORE. What rate is this lady receiving now?

Mr. HOOKER of New York. None whatever. There is a mistake in the title of the bill, which we propose to correct. She receives no pension whatever.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the bill. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOOKER of New York, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The title was amended to conform to the body of the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill and joint resolutions of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 1306) to establish a port of delivery at Bonner's Ferry, Idaho;

Joint resolution (S. R. 8) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to cause the settlement of the accounts of Special Agents Moore and Woodson, under the treaty of 1854, with the Delaware Indians, etc.; and Joint resolution (S. R. 51) to provide for the printing of the report of the joint committee of Congress and proceedings at the centennial celebration of the laying of the corner-stone of the Capitol.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed of the reports of the Smithsonion Institution and the National Museum for the year ending June 30, 1893, in two octavo volumes, 10,000 extra copies, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 5,000 copies for the use of the Smithsonian Institution, and 2,000 copies for the use of the National Museum.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 4243) granting the right of way for the construction of a railroad and other improvements over and on the West Mountain of the Hot Springs Reservation, Hot Springs, Ark.;

A bill (H. R. 2796) relating to the disqualification of registers and receivers of the United States land offices, and making provision in case of such disqualification; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 93) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to permit the owners of cattle and horses transporting them into Mexico to reimport same into the United States at any time within twelve months from date of the passage of this resolution, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 4340) to amend section 407 of the Revised Statutes so as to require original receipts for deposits of postmasters to be sent to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department; and

A bill (H. R. 156) for the establishment of a light and fog-signal station near Butler Flats, New Bedford, Mass.

INDEBTEDNESS OF SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4449) fixing the limit of indebtedness which may be incurred by Salt Lake City.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Salt Lake City, in the Territory of Utah, may become indebted to an amount in the aggregate, including existing indebtedness, not to exceed 6 per cent on the value of the taxable property within said city, to be ascertained by the last assessment for Territorial and county taxes previous to the incurring of such indebtedness; and all bonds and obligations in excess of such amount given by said city shall be void.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. RAWLINS. I ask the Clerk to read the report of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The report (by Mr. GOODNIGHT) was read as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4449) fixing the limit of indebtedness which may be incurred by Salt Lake City, in the Territory of Utah, submitted the following report:

The limit of indebtedness which may now be incurred by cities in the Territories is fixed at 4 per cent on the value of the taxable property within the city limits.

Recently it has become necessary for Salt Lake City to construct an expensive sewerage system, by reason of which the present limit has been reached while the improvements are far short of completion. It will work a great hardship to increase the present rate of taxation on account of present stringency. To stop the improvements in course of erection would render valueless large expenditures already made, and throw many people out of employment now greatly in need of the assistance which will come from expenditures made on improvements, the need of which is imperative. The bill is urged by the Delegate from the Territory and desired by those most concerned.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Speaker, let that bill be reported again.

The bill was again read.

Mr. COOMBS. I would like to ask the gentleman if there is any tax on personalty?

Mr. RAWLINS. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this resolution?

Mr. COOMBS. Had you reached the 4 per cent?

Mr. MARSH. I would like to ask the gentleman if it will affect in any manner the indebtedness already contracted?

Mr. RAWLINS. Not at all.

Mr. COOMBS. Has it reached the 4 per cent?

Mr. RAWLINS. It has reached the 4 per cent.

Mr. MARSH. Does it exceed the 4 per cent?

Mr. RAWLINS. It may have exceeded it to some extent.

Mr. MARSH. Is this a bill that would enable you to repudiate the excess of the amount of debt contracted?

Mr. RAWLINS. It does not. It is in order that the obligations made may be paid. It is absolutely necessary, and it is recommended by all classes of citizens and parties in Salt Lake City.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request? (After a pause.) The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

IMPROVEMENT OF BIG SANDY RIVER.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the House of Representatives at the earliest day possible information as to the amount necessary to complete the improvement in the Big Sandy River, at Louisa, Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to consider this resolution. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now call the committees for reports.

RELIEF OF SETTLERS ON PUBLIC LANDS IN OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Mr. McRAE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 268) for the relief of settlers on the public lands in Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes; which was ordered to lie on the table.

ADDITIONAL LAND OFFICE IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. McRAE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 355) to establish an additional land office in the Territory of New Mexico; which was ordered to lie on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of committees, and under the order heretofore adopted the House will resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to consider the bill, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation and provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee in the chair.

THE TARIFF.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole

House on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering a bill raising revenue. The Clerk will report the pending amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 686, page 90, by inserting at the conclusion of the paragraph, "Provided, That this section shall take effect on and after the 1st day of August, 1894."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "August 1, 1894," and insert "October 1, 1898."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the proposed substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 90, in paragraph 686, insert:
"Provided, That this paragraph shall take effect immediately upon the passage of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment to the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "immediately after the passage of this act," and insert "December 30, 1899."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment proposed to the amendment by the gentleman from New York, in order that the text may be perfected.

Mr. BURROWS. May I ask on what page that is?

The CHAIRMAN. Page 90.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] is recognized.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, during this discussion I have listened over and over again to the charge made by gentlemen on the other side, that a Democratic House, a Democratic President, and that a Democratic Senate were elected by an overwhelming vote of the people in 1892. Now, the idea occurs to me to ask gentlemen on the other side whether they have heard that there was an election last fall, and that the great empire States of New York, Ohio, Illinois, Iowa, and Massachusetts reversed that verdict?

Mr. DALZELL. What about Pennsylvania?

Mr. MORSE. And Pennsylvania. The great empire State of Pennsylvania, too, reversed that verdict by an overwhelming decision against the Democratic party.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that these gentlemen should not go back too far into ancient history, but they should come down to the events of modern times. And I submit that if the election of last November had been a Congressional election there would not have been any Cherokee Strip on this side of the Chamber; and, while I am neither a prophet nor a son of a prophet, yet I do predict that in the next Congressional election the Republicans will have charge of this House by a large majority and there will be no Democratic strip on this side of the House.

Now, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], because he proposes to postpone to a future day, until 1898, until another Congressional and national election, until after the voice of the people shall be heard again, the operations of this free-wool clause of the bill; and I would be glad to postpone the date when the whole bill should go into operation until the people will have had time to repeal and reconsider the Chicago platform of the Democratic party adopted by the people in 1892. I also charge that the national election to which our Democratic friends have so often referred was carried against the Republicans by misrepresentations on the part of the Democratic papers and speakers. They charged that the manufacturers were reaping an unfair and unjust proportion of the profits and that the laboring people of this country did not enjoy their fair share of remuneration.

Now, the country has lived to learn that the manufacturers' interests are the interests of the laboring people; that injury to the manufacturers is injury to their employés; that destruction of the American market for agricultural products is an injury to the farmers of the West. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] in his remarks on the binding-twine amendment which I offered went on to show how much larger a proportion of people ate wheat than manufactured binding-twine.

Does that gentleman suppose that he can destroy the large cordage industry of New England and turn out the twelve thousand men engaged in it into the streets without injuring the agricultural interests of this country? Suppose you succeed in destroying that cordage industry, in taking work away from the twelve thousand men employed in it, and from those dependent upon them, what then? Why, the inevitable result will be that they will immediately proceed to crowd into other occupations.

Mr. GRESHAM. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MORSE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRESHAM. You speak of the twelve thousand laboring men in New England engaged in the cordage industry. There was a cordage factory in my town and the trust bought it out with the express understanding that it should continue to be run, but before long it was closed up and the laborers engaged in it were thrown out of employment. Was that in the interest of the laboring people, or was it in the interest of the trust?

Mr. MORSE. In reply to the gentleman I will say that there may be some instances like that to which he has referred, but the cordage industry, which I represent on this floor, is an independent industry, and belongs to no trust, but carries on business for itself, and for nobody else. Now, I say, suppose you do succeed in destroying that industry and turning out these 12,000 men upon the streets without work, what will be the result?

The result will be that they will crowd into other trades and professions, and, failing to get work there, what then? They must resort to the business of last resort, agriculture, and we must plow the stony and sterile soil of New England in order to increase our own food supply, instead of buying it, as we do now largely, from the farmers of the West; and yet our Western friends are trying to destroy the great manufacturing industries of this country!

Mr. WILSON of Washington. The gentleman is mistaken. His friends from the West are not trying to destroy anything.

Mr. GRESHAM. Before the parties in my town would sell out the factory an agreement was made by the trust that they would keep it running, but afterwards they stopped work and threw 200 or 300 men out of employment. Now, I ask the gentleman was that in the interest of the laboring people, or was it in the interest of the trust?

Mr. MORSE. I am not defending any trust on this floor. I am speaking for my own constituents, who do not belong to any trust.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the remarks of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] on several occasions, and I have heard him again and again ring the changes upon the charge that the manufacturers are the enemies of the laboring people; I have heard him denounce the railroads as unjust and extortionate monopolies. I hold in my hand a map of the railroads that have gone into insolvency since the Cleveland "retrenchment and reform" began, and I submit that my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. DRAPER] stated the exact truth when he said in his speech here the other evening that the manufacturers of New England make only a small per cent on the capital invested in those great industries. The dividend on manufacturing stock of Massachusetts, based on the selling price from January 1, 1882, to January 1, 1892, was only 3.87 per cent; on railroad stock for the same date was 4.29 per cent, and on bank stock 4.53 per cent. In the light of these figures what becomes of the charges of extortionate profits made against these Northeastern corporations and manufacturers of New England again and again on this floor?

By unanimous consent Mr. MORSE'S time was extended.

Mr. MORSE. Now, I submit Mr. Chairman, that when the gentleman from Kansas, or any other gentleman, strikes a blow at those great corporations which give employment to thousands and perhaps millions of our people; when he strikes a blow at the railroads, those great arteries of trade, those great arms of commerce, he strikes not only a blow at the laboring people of this country, but at the "poor farmer" as well, whom the Democratic and Populist parties profess to love so much; and if anybody wants evidence of the effect upon the great corporations of this country of the present policy, and of the Wilson bill now impending, let him look at this map of the railroads that have gone into insolvency since that policy was announced.

Mr. MOSES. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MORSE. Certainly.

Mr. MOSES. The gentleman spoke just now of 12,000 men being thrown out of employment in the cordage industry of New England, being compelled to turn to agricultural pursuits. Suppose the wages of the agricultural laborers are made so low that they will have to leave the farm and crowd into manufacturing pursuits? To-day the cotton-raiser does not get 40 cents a day.

Mr. MORSE. I submit in answer to the gentleman that never since God said "Let there be light," never in any country on the face of the earth, have the farmers' interests been as prosperous in this country as under the McKinley tariff bill, as set forth by my friend from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] yesterday. What is the matter with the agricultural interests of this country now? The matter is that you gentlemen have destroyed and are trying to further destroy the home market. Talk about the foreign market for agricultural products—why, it is a mere bagatelle compared to the home market. What we want to do is to develop and enlarge the home market. What we want to do is to encourage our manufacturing interests so that they will create an increased demand for products of the farm, instead of destroying our manufactures by free trade and putting agricultural products on the free list.

Mr. DAVIS. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. MORSE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. If farming is so profitable, why is it that Kansas is loaded with mortgages on real estate to the amount of $235,000,000, Illinois $384,000,000, and Pennsylvania $613,000,000?

Mr. MORSE. My answer to that question is this: Hundreds and thousands of people in this country, many of them emigrants, go out into the agricultural sections of the West, upon the prairies, and take up land. Some of them do not carry anything with them but an alimentary canal and an appetite; and what do they do? They begin farming operations.

Having no means, they look around for somebody to lend them money. Pretty soon, perhaps, some Eastern man with capital steps in and loans them the money they require. Prosperity at once begins. They rapidly pay off the mortgages on their farms; for the statistics show that these mortgages, under the wise protective policy of the Republican party as embodied in the McKinley bill, were rapidly being discharged.

Mr. DAVIS. Pennsylvania is not a new State; what do you say about Pennsylvania?

Mr. DALZELL. The mortgages in Pennsylvania are not generally on farms——

Mr. DAVIS. But they are on land.

Mr. DALZELL. In our State the mortgages generally are upon property in the great cities, and they represent enterprise.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, one more question in the same line. Why are the farms of New England selling on the average at one-half the cost of improvements?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, there is no question that great harm has been done not only to agricultural interests but to manufacturing interests by the threatened free-trade bill, or bill in the direction of free trade, now pending in this House. May I take time to give one individual illustration of the hardship this bill is working to the laboring people of my district? There is a man of my acquaintance who has been out of work for some time—a man of family. Finally he got employment—only last week. One day he sat down while at his work. The superintendent told him that it was against the rules for him to sit down at his work. He thereupon rose and went on with his work.

Pretty soon the superintendent came round again and found him sitting down, and again rebuked him. The man then replied, "You would not scold me so much if you knew how little food I have had to eat during the past month. Practically all I could get to eat I have given to my children; and I have myself eaten within three days only two or three apples." That is the condition to which gentlemen on the other side would reduce the laboring people of New England by these propositions to put binding twine, cordage, agricultural implements, and other manufactured goods and the products of other great New England industries on the free list. I appeal to those gentlemen on the score of humanity to stay their hands.

Sir, I have a letter received only yesterday from a laboring man in my district. He says he has never voted anything in his life but a Democratic ticket. Let me read a page of his letter.

During the war we used to say, "We are coming, Father Abraham, three hundred thousand more." The following letter speaks for millions of the working people who have been deceived by Democratic papers and speakers:

ALLSTON, MASS., January 15, 1894.

DEAR SIR: I feel like writing this to you. I have always been a Democrat. Soon as I got my voting papers I voted for Buchanan; in 1861, Douglas; in 1865, McClellan; 1869, Seymour; 1875, Greeley; 1877, Tilden; 1881, Hancock, 1885, Cleveland; and 1889, Cleveland. Since I came to the country, in 1851, I have been coached by the Democrats, no Republicans came near me, but lately I have been told I was taxed to enrich the rich on tin and clothes and other things, and I voted for free trade.

Now the scales have fallen from my eyes, and I signed a petition that went to Congress that their hands might be stayed. Now then, yesterday I read in the editorial of the Herald that we were "dragooned into signing." That is cruelly unjust and makes my blood boil. I have been a fool to read such a paper and vote with it. To do it again would make me a knave.

My brother travels for a steel firm on Oliver street—Wetherell Bros. They represent a mill in Pittsfield, Pa., and a wire mill in England, and now since the tariff begun to change the home mill is discharging its help and the English mill is increasing theirs, and they write: "If the Wilson bill becomes a law, in hopes to double our trade with you and are preparing for it." The Pittsfield mill says: "If the Wilson bill becomes a law we shall feel our way cautiously. * * * Shall lower wages," etc.

Respectfully yours,

B. A. JOURDAIN.

Hon. ELIJAH A. MORSE, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

Now, I put that letter against some of the talk of gentlemen on the other side who charge that men of this character were dragooned or forced into signing petitions against the passage of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, to resume what I have already said, or tried to say amid so many interruptions, I say during this discussion I have listened over and over again to gentlemen on the other side who have rung the changes upon the overwhelming Democratic success in the election of 1892.

I charge that the Democratic victory of 1892 was brought about by a misrepresentation made to the people of this country by the Democratic speakers and papers, especially the deception that was practiced upon the working people of this country.

They were told that the manufacturers were absorbing an unjust proportion of the profits. That free trade or a tariff for revenue, while it might somewhat injure the manufacturer, would in no way injure them, and that it would enable them to buy their goods cheaper.

The farmers were told that Democratic success meant increased prices and increased markets for their products.

How have these promises been fulfilled? It is needless to answer; "he who runs may read" the answer. But, gentlemen, how is it about the last election held in this country, after an experiment of nine months of Democratic control of every department of the Government, and after the Wilson bill was foreshadowed by the country?

I repeat, let the great empire States of New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, and Iowa answer. Why, the gentlemen on the other side forget that these great States repudiated the Democratic party and the Wilson bill, and in Ohio voiced the sentiment of the country by indorsing the author of the McKinley bill by a majority of 80,000; and had Grover Cleveland announced his Sandwich Island policy prior to the last election Ohio would have given Maj. McKinley 20,000 more, and Massachusetts would have given Governor Greenhalge 10,000 more.

I do not wonder that the gentlemen on the other side are in a hurry to pass this bill. If you will defer it until after another Congressional election you can never pass it.

Why, Mr. Chairman, I have listened on this floor for days and nights to the denunciation of the great manufacturing concerns, the corporations, and the railroad companies that do the great business of the country and give employment to millions of our countrymen.

If you could believe these gentlemen these manufacturing concerns, these corporations, these railroads were the enemies of the country, who are living upon the lifeblood of the people, and absorbing an unjust and unfair proportion of the profits.

How long shall this mad and insane cry prevail, "Down with the manufacturers!" "Down with the corporations!" "Down with the railroads?" I suppose until the country learns when these great arteries of commerce and trade are successful and prosperous the country is prosperous, and disaster and misfortune such as is represented by this map which I hold in my hand means disaster and misfortune to the whole country and all the people in it, such as we are now suffering.

I repeat, gentlemen on the other side speak as though you could destroy great industries of the country and turn thousands of workmen into the streets without affecting the agricultural interests and other industries of the country; such a supposition is idle and absurd. Under such a policy the men engaged in these varied industries cease to become consumers and become themselves producers of agricultural products, and thus one business reacts upon another and the whole business of the country is injured.

I tell you, gentlemen of the West and South, that you can not destroy a great industry of the country by free trade without inflicting an injury upon your own section. When one member suffers all suffer. The whole protection system of the country (for the whole country) stands or falls together.

[Here the hammer fell].

Mr. WILSON of Washington. You say your friend who always voted the Democratic ticket, voted for Horace Greeley. Was Horace Greeley a Democrat?

Mr. MORSE. Well, he was an adopted Democrat. [Laughter.]

The following map of railroads which have gone into the hands of receivers and became bankrupt since the last national election, shows the effect of the Democratic economic and financial policy (as announced in the Chicago platform) on these great arteries of commerce. The New York and New England Railroad, however, has gone into the hands of a receiver since this map was made. This map shows that nearly one-fifth of the railroads of the country are bankrupt in January, 1894. In other words, the map shows the Wilson bill and Cleveland "retrenchment" and "reform" as applied to the railroads of the country. This map is an illustration of the Democratic demagogue campaign cry, "Down with the manufacturers!" "Down with the corporations!" "Down with the railroads!"

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I append to my speech the following resolution of the Massachusetts Legislature introduced by Senator Kittredege, of Boston. I expect it will be adopted and received here soon:

That the senators and representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in general court assembled, believing that the passage by Congress of the Wilson tariff bill, so called, will be detrimental to the business interests of the country, respectfully protest against its passage, and request the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this Commonwealth to use their influence against the passage of the same.

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress, and also to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this Commonwealth.

The following communication is a specimen of numerous similar votes and resolutions transmitted to me by labor organizations, which speaks for itself:

TAUNTON, MASS., January 16, 1894.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the Cotton Mule Spinners' Association, representing about one hundred members, it was voted unanimously to appeal to you to vote against any clauses in the Wilson bill which will reduce the tariff on the goods we produce.

Most all of our members are employed in the hosiery business. And we believe the present condition of our industry is caused almost entirely by such threatened reduction in tariff as will flood our market with imported goods.

We greatly object to being deprived of work and wages for the benefit of foreign manufacturers. And we hereby give notice to help no man nor party who insists upon starving our children and ourselves by bringing our wages down to the European standard.

Hoping you will comply with our request, and oblige, yours, very respectfully, on behalf of the committee,

ARTHUR HERBERT, Secretary.

To the Hon. ELIJAH A. MORSE.

I also append to my speech the petition of the workingmen of Boston, Mass., adopted at the meeting in Faneuil Hall, January 3, 1894:

To the Congress of the United States:

The undersigned, working people of Boston, Mass., without regard to party, respectfully represent that we believe the present deplorable condition of industry is due almost wholly to the danger of such reductions in the tariff as will flood the market with imported goods. We object to being deprived of work and wages for the benefit of foreign producers. Those of you who directly represent us are hereby instructed to vote against the Wilson tariff bill, or any other bill which will tend to increase foreign competition with goods that we produce, and we hereby give you plain notice that we will not hereafter support any man or party which upholds a policy the effect of which is to deprive us of employment or reduce our wages.

The old cradle of liberty never rocked to a better purpose than at the great mass meeting that adopted the above petition to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just taken his seat has followed in his remarks the line which has been too frequently followed on his side in this discussion, of charging the present business depression upon the threat of a change from a protective system to a tariff for revenue. Some gentlemen have gone so far in their reckless statements as to say that these are "Cleveland times," insinuating by such expressions that the election of Mr. Cleveland as President has caused this depression in the business condition of the country. The great leader on the other side of the House, in his remarks on the day before yesterday, used this language:

Because to-day all industry is arrested by reason of the mere threat of adopting another system.

Mr. Chairman, it has been the custom of Republican orators in defending protection to point to one fact as establishing the wisdom of their policy, and as also showing that it is calculated to give greater scope for employment in this country. I call the attention of the House to some facts concerning the commerce of this country preceding the election of Mr. Cleveland. I quote from the Treasury reports on foreign commerce and immigration for December, 1892. I take therefrom a table showing a comparison of the imports and exports for the last six months of 1891 and the last six months of 1892. I shall print this table in the RECORD:

Comparison of imports and exports for last six months of 1891 and 1892.

Month.	Exports.		Excess, 1891 over 1892.	Imports.		Excess of 1892 over 1891.
	1891.	1892.		1891.	1892.
July	102,668,893	858.401,758	$4,267,135	$67,012,035	$71,526,865	$4,484,830
August	72,635,541	64,846,682	7,838,859	65,953,330	77,216,797	11,263,467
September	82,854,085	62,908,483	19,945,602	61,504,737	72,933,408	11,428,671
October	102,877,243	87,860,919	15,016,324	66,836,259	79,122,762	12,286,503
November	110,103,587	97,708,824	12,330,713	64,890,507	73,220,096	8,329,589
December	119,985,896	87,545,274	32,390,622	69,448,023	70,451,710	1,003,647
Total	551,125,195	459,266,940	91,858,255	395,774,921	444,470,638	48,695,717
			48,695,717
			140,553,972

This table shows that the exports of this country began to fall off as early as July, 1892.

Compare the value of our exports month by month from that month with the value of our exports month by month from July, 1891.

The falling off of the value of our exports for the last six months of 1892 as compared with the same period of 1891 amounts to $91,858,255.

How much that falling off of the sales of our productions contributed to the financial depression of 1893 can not be stated. Let us consider the table now as to our imports during the same period.

It shows clearly an excess of imports during the same six months from the beginning in July, 1892, over the imports during the same months of 1891. The excess over the imports in 1891 was of the value of $48,695,717. There was a falling off of exports from this country in the six months—five of the months preceding the election of Grover Cleveland—of $91,000,000, as compared with 1891. To that extent—$91,000,000 worth of products of the people of this country—they failed to find a market abroad; and gentlemen who are talking so much of the home market might offer a suggestion as to a remedy. From your standpoint the McKinley bill worked badly. Why did not the home market use up these ninety-one millions of products and enable the price of these commodities to be kept up? Instead they failed to find a foreign market or any market.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I can not yield; I have but five minutes. We bought in the period in 1892 over $48,000,000 from abroad more than in 1891, and sold abroad over $91,000,000 less. Investigation of the table shows a swinging over of the balance of trade against us in that length of time to the amount of about $140,000,000. If there is anything in your argument concerning the balances of trade, here is a condemnation of the system under which we were living just before Mr. Cleveland was elected.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I should like to have five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection the gentleman will proceed for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. On page 6 of this record I find that there was a decline of $42,089,753 worth of exports during 1892 as compared with 1891, and an increase of $47,877,236 of imports, making a total change of trade against us, according to your way of stating it, of $89,966,989 in the total commerce of that year.

Mr. BURROWS. What year?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Eighteen hundred and ninety-two.

Mr. BURROWS. The fiscal year?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. No; not the fiscal year, but the year 1892.

Mr. BURROWS. What portion of the year?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The total of the year, unless my notes are wrong.

Mr. MARSH. You mean the calendar year.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I mean the calendar year.

Now, as against the declaration of politicians for political effect on this floor, I wish to read an extract from an interview with an eminent Republican of the State of Pennsylvania recently had and quoted in the public press of the country. Ex-Governor Beaver says:

The wave of business depression was due.

That is, the time had come that the political system of taxation under which we have been living so long had brought about a condition of affairs that made it inevitable that business depressions would ensue.

DEMOCRATIC POLICY NOT TO BLAME.—EX-GOV. BEAVER SAYS THE WAVE OF BUSINESS DEPRESSION WAS DUE.

[Special to the World.]

The Herald publishes the following interview with ex-Governor James A. Beaver, which it is alleged was had with Gen. Beaver recently while in the north of this county:

"To be candid, I do not believe this depression in business is the result of Democratic policy. This wave of business depression was coming, and it is only the good fortune of the Republicans that the Democrats got in power in time to be caught by it. It is one of those periodical depressions that regularly affect the country, and nothing could have averted it. I do not believe the Democrats or their policy have anything to do with it. It would have come anyhow, and if Harrison had been elected it might have been even worse."

For myself I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, but that the business condition might have been even worse if Harrison had been elected.

How does that statement of Governor Beaver compare with the allegations of gentlemen on this floor, that the apprehension of a change in the system of taxation was the cause of this business depression? And where did the depression begin? Did it begin with the producers or the consumers? It began with the consumers, the consumers of manufactured articles. The great farming interests of the country not selling abroad and not selling at home found themselves incapable of purchasing the manufactured products of the country. It was not a fear of reduction of taxation that prevented the consumers from buying. It is simply absurd to say that such could have been the case. It began with the consumers failing to buy. For if it did begin with the manufacturing capitalists alone, then it would have the appearance of a great lockout, the most odious, detestable, and cruel that could be conceived. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] sees fit to laugh. I do not say that it began there—I did not accuse——

Mr. REED. "Sees fit to laugh!" I was forced to do it.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I say if it did begin there, it deserves to be stigmatized as I have stigmatized it, as the most atrocious abuse of capital which ever occurred in the country, and which could not have been possible under any other system of government than the system of protection.

These statistics that I have quoted are the statistics that were presented not by a Democratic authority, but the statistics that were presented during the Republican Administration. They are statistics that come from the report of a Republican Secretary of the Treasury, and he shows, or these figures show, as clearly as it can be written, where this calamity began and how it began. It is a part of the great business depression that extends around the globe. It would have come anyhow, and as ex-Governor Beaver says:

I have no doubt whatever that if Benjamin Harrison had been reëlected President it would have come, and I almost regret that it did not occur—and I almost regret that it did not occur during his Administration, so that the people of this country would not have had the least ground for doubting that the protective system under which they had lived was the greatest curse that legislation had ever inflicted upon a free people.

[Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. REED. They do rather doubt it now, do they not?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. A few of them doubt it.

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman has referred to our foreign trade. Will the gentleman explain how it was that under the tariff of 1846, from 1846 to 1860, the balance of trade was against us every year but two?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I do not care anything about that. I have been applying recent facts.

Mr. BURROWS. The balance of trade was against us during the whole time except two years. How do you account for that?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I do not account for it at all. I have been using your argument that the balance of trade being in favor of the country was an argument to sustain the protective system, and to show you that within a year after the passage of the McKinley bill it began to swing against us, and has continued against us until recently.

Mr. MARSH. Does the gentleman mean the blance of trade or the balance of exchange?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Balance of trade, they call it.

Mr. BURROWS was recognized.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the gentleman make that request as soon as I get through? I will take but five minutes.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] states that within a year after the passage of the McKinley bill, which was October 6, 1890, the balance of trade commenced to go against us.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Perhaps it was a little more than a year.

Mr. BURROWS. The statement that it was within a year does not happen to be correct.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I was mistaken in saying it was within a year. I meant within the succeeding year, in the year 1892.

Mr. BURROWS. And the gentleman says that our exports have been falling off. Now, as a matter of fact our exports for the year ending June 30, 1890, were $857,000,000.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. You can not claim anything for 1890 under the McKinley bill.

Mr. BURROWS. If my friend will allow me to make this statement of figures, I will be obliged to him. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, our export trade had risen to $884,000,000. The McKinley bill had then been in force about nine months. The next year, under the operation of the McKinley bill, our foreign export trade rose from $884,000,000 to $1,030,000,000 under a year's full operation of the McKinley bill.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. But now explain why it did not continue.

Mr. BURROWS. Simply for the reason that you have declared in favor of free trade, business has stopped, and that is the reason why I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that under the tariff of 1846, from 1846 to 1860, there were only two years that the balance of trade was not against this country; and it is because of the operation of that very condition of things now, or the fear of it, that the balance of trade is shifting the other way.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The apprehension, then, began as early as July, 1892?

Mr. SPRINGER. When the balance of trade was against us in the estimation of the gentleman it was really in our favor.

Mr. BURROWS. When?

Mr. SPRINGER. Between 1850 and 1860. I mean we imported more than we exported, and that is what I call in our favor.

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman means that when we buy more abroad than we export that then everything is prosperous? [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.] According to the gentleman's idea, if we can get to the position where we can buy everything abroad and get nothing at home we will be on the high road to prosperity!

Mr. SPRINGER. If we can reach the time when we get everything abroad and send nothing out of the country for it, we will be getting richer all the time. The gentleman is proceeding on the theory that the more he gives away and the less he gets the richer he will be; but the truth is that the more that comes into the country and the less that goes out marks the difference of our prosperity, and increase in wealth.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Another Daniel come to judgment. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; that is not another Daniel. It is an old maxim that every gentleman ought to understand by this time. In Great Britain——

Mr. BURROWS. I supposed I had the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thought the gentleman had yielded the floor to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BURROWS. I had not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to protect the gentleman.

Mr. SPRINGER. I beg pardon of the gentleman.

Mr. BURROWS. I do not think the Chair can. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Am I recognized for five minutes?

Mr. BURROWS. I yield the balance of my time. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOWERS of California. Am I to understand the gentleman to say that the more goods come in the better we are off?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will answer the question. It has confused the minds of the people of all countries for many years, but it seems to me that it is a very simple proposition, and when accurately understood there need not be any misconception in regard to it. In Great Britain the balance of trade, so called, has been against that country for the last twenty-five or thirty years to the amount of $500,000,000 a year, and in recent years the balance has been nearly twice that amount.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. For nearly fifty years the balance has been against her.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from West Virginia says for nearly fifty years. For the last thirty years the so-called balance of trade has been against Great Britain to the amount of $500,000,000 a year or more. Now, according to the theory of the gentleman from Michigan Great Britain is getting poorer every year by this difference in the balance of trade.

If that is so, there would not be wealth enough left in the two islands of that country by this time to run two manufacturing establishments, whereas England has been getting continually rich all the time; so that at this time the people of the rest of the world owe the people residing in the British Isles over $10,000,000,000, and it takes more than $500,000,000 a year of the earnings of all the rest of the world to pay the people of Great Britain the interest upon British investments abroad. That is what makes the balance of trade against Great Britain, and the earnings and the wealth of the world are pouring into that country at the rate of more than $500,000,000 in one year and all the rest of the world is engaged in working for the subjects of Great Britain to pay the interest upon these British investments abroad.

Mr. SIMPSON. If the gentleman will allow me, I desire to suggest that the farmers of this country have paid that debt or a part of it, for the last year in 60-cent wheat, as was said at the other end of the Capitol this year.

Mr. SPRINGER. By reference to the Statesman's Year Book, 1893, page 76 and 79, it will appear that the total imports into Great Britain for the ten years from 1883 to 1892, inclusive, were valued at £3,995,268,000, or, allowing $5 to the pound sterling, $19,976,340,000. The exports for the same period amounted to $11,709,370,000. The imports for these ten years exceeded the exports by $8,266,970,000. These figures do not include gold and silver, but the imports of gold and silver during this period exceeded each year the exports. For the year 1892 the excess of imports of gold and silver over exports was $15,580,000; and this may be regarded as a fair average for the ten years previous. For the year 1892 the imports of merchandise per capita in Great Britain amounted to $57.60, while the exports per capita amounted to only $32.70.

The imports of merchandise in Great Britain for 1892 amounted to £423,892,000, while the exports were only £227,060,000. The excess of imports was £196,832,000, or $984,160,000. The excess of imports of gold and silver, as I have before stated, was $15,530,000. The total excess of imports over exports for 1892 of merchandise, gold, and silver into Great Britain was $999,690,000, or nearly $1,000,000,000. And gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber would have us believe that Great Britain was made that much poorer by this enormous balance of trade against her in one year!

How long could a country having only 37,000,000 population endure such a drain upon her national wealth?

This is not a balance of trade against Great Britain. It is a balance in her favor. She is getting richer every year to the extent to which her imports exceed her exports.

I hope gentlemen will understand me. If we send our products abroad and get nothing in return for them we would get poorer by the amount sent out. But when there has been a balance in merchandise and the coin account has been balanced between the two countries, and when it appears that there have been more imports of values (taking into consideration coin as well as merchandise) a country in that condition is prosperous, because it is getting more into it than sending out. Under these conditions the more of imports a people have the richer they will be.

Mr. HULICK. Are you going to vote for this present measure with that object in view, namely, that it will produce a balance of trade against us, after its adoption in our commercial relations with foreign countries?

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the time will come under the operation of this bill, and that in the near future, when the general balance between this country and other countries will show that our imports, including coin, exceed our exports; and in my opinion that difference will show our net income and we will get richer by the difference.

Mr. HULICK. Will the adoption of this present tariff law result in the balance of trade against this country, and do you vote for it with the expectation that that result will be beneficial to this country?

Mr. SPRINGER. I think the effect of the adoption of this bill will be beneficial, that is, that we will import more, including coin, than we export. I believe that when you take coin, as well as products, into consideration, when we get more into the country than we send out, we will be better off by the difference. That is what I mean and that is what I hope and believe will be the effect of the passage of the pending bill.

I can not understand how gentlemen on the other side can believe that our national wealth will be increased by sending out as exports more values than we get in return. The movement of coin each year must always be taken into the account. Governments do not import or export any goods. The aggregate of our imports and exports is the aggregate of the individual transactions of those who reside in the respective countries. Each trade is an exchange of products, and seller and buyer are presumed to give and get quid pro quo. If the mode of valuation were the same everywhere, and there were no interest and credit accounts between the countries to be adjusted, the trade transactions, including coin, would always balance. That is, the man in one country who sells to a customer in another any article, would get back in coin or products an amount in value equal to the value of the article that he sold and sent out.

What is called "the balance of trade" between different countries, whether it be large or small, is caused by credit accounts, by financial operations, by loans, by investments, by dividends on foreign stocks, and such like transactions. Great Britain is a creditor nation. The rest of the world owe her subjects $10,000,000,000, which have been invested in other countries. In settling trade balances the interest on this debt must be paid and it requires products to pay it. That accounts for what is called the balance of trade against her. It is really a balance in her favor, and shows the annual increase of her national wealth.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia wants to fix some limit to debate, and then the Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, this debate has run quite liberally, and has taken a very wide range; and as I am exceedingly anxious to get through with one or two amendments, so that members of the House may offer other amendments, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is too short a time.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. What time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. DINGLEY. Half an hour.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I think that the gentleman ought to yield an hour at least.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think, as this interesting proposition has been brought in, we should have a little discussion.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I am willing to agree to twenty minutes, if that will suit the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY].

Mr. DINGLEY. There are several gentlemen on this side who have not yet spoken and who would like to occupy a short time.

As this proposition in relation to the balance of trade has been launched upon us, I think we had better have a brief discussion of it.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. All these questions can be discussed at any other point in the debate. They are no more appropriate at this point than at any other.

Mr. PAYNE. But it will not take any more time to have the discussion now than later.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. The committee feels that it is taking too much time for its amendments and wants to give other gentlemen an opportunity to offer the amendments which they desire to present.

The CHAIRMAN. What time does the gentleman from West Virginia suggest?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto be ended in twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will put the question.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, before the question is put I want to say that I think we shall expedite the matter by having the discussion now. This question has been thrust upon us and I think we shall save time by discussing it now rather than by postponing it to the next amendment. There will be no time saved by putting off the discussion. I suggest that the gentleman agree to forty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto be concluded in thirty minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I object.

Mr. DINGLEY. Do I understand the gentleman from West Virginia to suggest thirty minutes, with twenty minutes given to this side?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Yes, sir; thirty minutes; twenty minutes to be allowed to the other side.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am willing if I can have a part of that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that if an agreement is made the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] or the gentleman from Maine to control the twenty minutes.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like about ten minutes.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. And I would like about fifteen.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman from West Virginia that all debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to thirty minutes, twenty minutes to be occupied by the minority. Is there objection?

Mr. MARSH. I object. If the gentleman will ask that the debate close at 1 o'clock I will not object.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in thirty minutes——

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think if the Chair will wait a moment we can arrange this matter by agreement, so as to save time. I suggest to my friend that there are several gentlemen who desire in good faith to occupy ten to fifteen minutes in the discussion of this subject, and I think we may as well have the discussion out now as later.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois (to Mr. WILSON of West Virginia). Say 1 o'clock.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I think that if the gentleman from West Virginia will ask unanimous consent that the debate be closed at 1 o'clock, one hour from this time, there will be no objection. That allows only thirty minutes to each side.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] asked for only forty minutes, and I am willing to give the other side twenty-five minutes of that time.

Mr. REED. Say an hour. Let the debate close at 1 o'clock; the time to be equally divided.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Very well; Mr. Chairman, I will agree to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this paragraph and pending amendments thereto be closed at 1 o'clock, the time to be equally divided; and inasmuch as the Chair might be embarrassed in making recognitions, if this request be agreed to and there be no objection, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from West Virginia to control one-half the time and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] to control the other half. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED. I yield ten minutes to my colleague [Mr. DINGLEY].

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I had not proposed to enter at this time upon any discussion of the question which has arisen with respect to the balance of trade; but in view of the remarks which have been made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] I desire to make a few observations.

In my remarks in general debate on Thursday last I called attention to the fact that the friends of the pending bill claimed that while it appeared on its face to reduce revenue to the extent of $76,000,000, nevertheless, in consequence of the increase of importations which would result from the reduced duties upon imported goods, there would be speedily a supplying of this revenue from increased imports.

I called attention to the fact that that would necessitate an increase of imports to the amount of $250,000,000 in the next fiscal year; that this $250,000,000 of imports, being dutiable goods, would nearly all consist of articles which we could manufacture in this country without any natural disadvantages, and that to throw into this country in a single year $250,000,000 worth of additional imports, goods which we have been accustomed to make in this country during the past few years, would inevitably result in decreasing the amount of production that would be open to the industries in this country in which such goods have been made, and also in a reduction of the opportunities for labor, and that that would result in great injury to the best interests of this country.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], in his remarks on Saturday last, when calling attention to what I had stated in my observations of Thursday, said it was a surprising statement that an increase of $250,000,000 in imports, in wealth brought into this country in a single year, would result in disaster to the prosperity of our country rather than to its advantage. I called attention in my remarks of Thursday last to the fact that this increase of imports which was proposed was to be the importation of articles which we were accustomed to make ourselves, and that necessarily if we should transfer to another country the manufacture to this extent of articles which we had been in the habit of making for ourselves, it must result in crippling our own industries and our own prosperity.

If the importation should consist of articles which we did not ourselves produce, and which we needed for our consumption, the importation would tend to increase our prosperity, which has been the inevitable effect always whenever we have had a protective era; but if the tendency was to increase the importation of articles which we are accustomed to make, and can make in this country with no greater expenditure of labor than abroad, the inevitable result would be to cripple our industries.

The gentleman from New York inquired how we expected imports to come into this country unless we were to pay for them. I replied that for the time being—temporarily, as was the case during the period from 1846 to 1860—articles which we could produce ourselves might come into the country in two ways, first, by a shipment of gold, which lies at the very basis of our currency and forms a part of our capital on which our productive industries are carried along; or, secondly, by sending abroad evidences of indebtedness; but that this was laying the foundation of disaster, and could not proceed long without bringing the country to disaster, as it did in 1857 and 1858.

Now, the gentleman from New York, as I understood, took the position laid down by Bastiat, the greatest dialectician of the free-trade school, that if we in this country give up any industries because the products of those industries can be produced abroad cheaper in money, but not cheaper in labor or service, then the labor which has been employed in those industries goes at once into other and more lucrative employments. That is the doctrine laid down by the greatest dialectician of the free-trade school. Now, the difficulty about that contention in practice is, first, that it assumes that because an article costs more in money here than it does abroad, therefore it costs more economically. That is not true. If it be true that it requires more labor to produce an article here than to produce the same article abroad, then the proposition would be economically true that its production here would be a loss.

But so long as any article costs no more in labor to produce here it can not cost more economically to produce it here than it costs abroad. The difficulty arising in all this contention is that gentlemen of the free-trade school assume that men are consumers only, not producers to the extent that they are consumers; and they make the further assumption that men pay ultimately in money for all they buy, when in fact they pay ultimately in labor or service. The question, therefore, is not the relative money cost, but the relative labor cost.

If, for example, a coat costs $1 more in money in the United States than it costs in England, and the wages of labor are $1 a day in England and $2 a day here, which is the cheaper coat, economically speaking, the coat that cost six days' labor or the coat that costs only four and one-half days' labor? Economically, the coat that costs four and one-half days' labor is cheaper than the other.

Now, what is the whole doctrine with respect to cheapness? That article is cheapest which costs the least in labor—not necessarily the least in money. We seek cheapness when it can be accomplished by labor-saving devices; that is a boon to the world. But when cheapness is secured by reducing the wages of labor, that is an evil. Why, sir, there has not been a time in recent years in this country when articles were so cheap, expressed in money, as they are now; and there never was a time when, expressed in labor or service, articles were so dear. We are living in prospect of the free-trade paradise.

Last January when it became known that there was to be a revolution in the economic policy of this country, every industry began to prepare for the evil day. What happened then? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] says that if manufacturers began to draw in their operations, they did it without cause. Now, that is not true. Let me illustrate.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The gentleman will pardon me for interrupting him; I do not think I said anything of that kind.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understood the gentleman to say that if manufacturers began to do that there was no cause for it, and they were reprehensible in so doing.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I did not use any such language or design to express any such thought.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then the gentleman will excuse me. I so understood him.

Now, what took place last January and in subsequent months? I take my own city as an illustration. Soon after it was ascertained that the Democratic party had secured in the elections not only the President, not only the House of Representatives, but also the Senate, and were to carry out the tariff policy which they had enunciated in their platform, what did manufacturers do?

It must be remembered that manufactured goods are made from six months to a year in advance of the time of consumption. Manufacturers must look forward in their business In January last gentlemen engaged in these industries began to see that the duties were to be so far reduced, as they supposed and anticipated, that there would be a larger importation of foreign goods such as we make in this country—$250,000,000 increase is what the gentleman from New York expects; and that as I understand is precisely one of the objects this bill undertakes to accomplish.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SPRINGER). The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. DINGLEY. What time?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes.

Mr. REED. I yield to my colleague five minutes more.

Mr. DINGLEY. As I was saying, in January last manufacturers began to see that they must curtail their operations. In my own city was one manufacturing corporation which had intended to extend its operations; and I may say its directory was largely Democratic. When they found what was to be, as they thought, the tariff policy of the future, they said to themselves it will not do for us to extend operations in view of the dangers that beset us, and therefore they discontinued their plans. Other operations that they intended to enlarge were of course discontinued, and the result was, following this, there began to be a discontinuance of orders by the jobbers, who thought that they would be able to obtain imported goods at lower rates, and orders were reduced.

Pretty soon there was a stoppage of the machinery, and a discharge of labor, followed by a reduction of the wages and the hours of labor. Now, it was inevitable in such a condition of things as this, commencing as it did in consequence of the distrust of the future by the threatened tariff revolution; it was inevitable, I say, all along the line, gradually, step by step, that distrust should strengthen, that industrial operations should be contracted, and that consumers would have less to expend than formerly. So that it has gone on strengthening from month to month, while there came a money panic to heighten for a time the distress. Yet this has gone on from hour to hour and will continue until it shall be known finally what will be the industrial policy of the future, so that those connected with manufacturing may be able to adjust their operations and reduce wages of labor to the new conditions that are to be imposed upon them.

It is inevitable, gentlemen, that when you bring into this country $250,000,000 more of goods, such as we have been accustomed to manufacture, taking it away from our own labor, you will cripple those industries and decrease the opportunities for employment. When the gentleman from New York says that the men who are engaged in these manufacturing operations can go into other employments, I ask what other employments they will go into next year, for example? Why, the farm is left to him, we are told. What will become of the farmer if all of the men who are engaged in manufacturing industries shall leave them and go on the farms? The result will be such an increase in the productions of the farmers as to decrease prices and bring every farmer in the country into bankruptcy. It would not only increase the farmer's products abnormally, but you would decrease the demand for those products by making those previously employed in manufacturing producers themselves instead of purchasers of the farmers.

What has been the effect industrially wherever manufacturing industries have been set down by the side of the farmer? Wherever there has been taken from the farmers the burden that is bearing down upon them in the cost of transportation of their raw products, by giving him a market at his own doors, most of the saving has gone to the farmer himself. Where the manufacturer has been set down by the side of the farmer and a home market established, there the farmer has done best. But the policy which looks to the importation of these goods, instead of their manufacture here, and that the people of this country go into agricultural pursuits and the cruder industries, would result in carrying the country back where it was a hundred years ago.

I am aware of the free-trade theory that, if we put ourselves into open competition with the world on the world's basis, if we put our high standard of living and high standard of labor in competition with the world, then if we are driven out of one industry that we will go into another where we have a natural advantage. Why, Mr. Chairman, talking about natural advantages, it is a natural advantage which every man should have in this country to work on a high-wage standard and on a high standard of living, and we contend simply that when products come into this country, made cheap by cheaper labor abroad, that those products should pay into our custom-houses a duty equivalent to the difference of wages here and abroad, the amount which has been withheld by the foreigner from his laborer and that has been paid by our producers to our laborers, in order that competition may go on here on the basis of the high wages of this country instead of the low wages of foreign machine-using countries. That is the whole sum and substance of protection. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH].

Mr. HATCH. I have been prevented by illness from taking any part in this discussion, and I will esteem it a personal courtesy on the part of the House if I am permitted to proceed for the five minutes allotted to me without interruption. I have not been physically able to make anything like a speech on this tariff bill, since I returned to the House only last Saturday. I desire to speak to the simple proposition of free wool.

I have been a practical wool-grower for twenty-four years. I have had on my farm, near the city of Hannibal, a flock of pure Southdown sheep since the fall of 1869. I sold my first wool clip from this flock in the spring of 1870, and have sold it as unwashed wool to the wool-buyers of the city of Hannibal each year since the spring of 1870. Since I have been a member of Congress, during the different tariff discussions that have occurred since the Forty-sixth Congress, I have been a very close student of all of the statistics and all of the facts and figures that have been presented, either to the Committee on Ways and Means or to this House, in regard to the effect of a tariff tax upon wool as it affected the American wool-grower.

I have not time to go into any elaborate discussion of this subject, except to state the unquestioned facts, that can be verified by a number of gentlemen upon this floor, who, like myself, have been interested every spring in the price of wool. I want it distinctly understood that I do not carry a flock of sheep upon my farm with any idea of deriving a profit from the wool clip alone, nor do I believe there is in the State of Illinois or Missouri a farmer to-day—certainly not one out of a hundred—who carries a flock of sheep upon his farm for the profit in the wool clip alone.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. That is one element of profit.

Mr. HATCH. It is the very smallest element of profit in it, and it has been made the smallest element in the profit of sheep-raising, simply because of the action of the Republican party in insisting upon a high tariff taxation on wool. [Applause on the Democratic side]. The chief value of a flock of sheep in all the older States of the Union is in the market value of high-grade mutton for food.

Ever since 1870 whenever the tariff taxation has been raised on wool American wool has decreased in price. I will publish in connection with my brief remarks the figures taken from a report, No. 501 of the Fifty-second Congress, first session, from the Committee on Ways and Means, giving the price of medium Ohio wool, in currency and in gold, in the city of Boston, commencing with March, 1866, and ending with December, 1890.

In 1870 the highest price quoted for Ohio medium wool in Boston was 48 cents in currency and the lowest 45. In 1871 the highest price was 62 cents in currency, and so on. I commenced selling wool in 1870, and I have been gradually getting a lower and lower price for my wool clip, except in two or three years in the interim, as I will show from this table, down to the passage of the McKinley tariff act. I got less for my wool in 1890 than I ever received for it before. I got less for it in 1891 than I ever received for it before, and I sold my wool clip in 1892 for less than I ever received for it before; and in 1893 I sold my wool for the highest price that wool brought in the city of Hannibal, at the date I delivered it, because my wool clip was graded as choice medium wool, and I sold it for 16½ or 17 cents a pound—the exact figures I have not at hand—the lowest price I have ever sold it for.

[The time of Mr. HATCH having expired, Mr. WILSON of West Virginia yielded to him two minutes more.]

Mr. HATCH. The point I want to make is this: All American wool, or at least the great bulk of it, is bought by the wool manufacturers of the United States. They can not make cloth in competition with the manufacturers of woolen goods in the world without an admixture of certain grades of foreign wool not grown in this country, and the higher price you make them pay for that foreign wool, the less they will pay the American wool-grower. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Sitting right in front of me now is a wool-grower from the State of Texas [Mr. GRESHAM], who has at this time 25,000 pounds of wool on hand, the clip of 1893, that he tells me he has been offered only 8 cents a pound for, and that under the operation of the McKinley bill. Put wool on the free list. You can not make it any cheaper to the American wool-grower. You can not get the price any lower.

There is not a sheep-raiser in the Mississippi Valley to-day, as far as my personal acquaintance extends with the farmers of that great section, who does not say "Put it on the free list. We do not want any tariff. We have tried a tariff until it has broken up the industry, and now let us try something else."

And now, Mr. Chairman, I do not claim and do not want to be understood as claiming that the tariff act alone is responsible for all this. Wool has gone down like every other product that the farmer raises in the United States, and in addition to this robber tariff and this depressing system that has dragged it down, is that other and more potential cause, inaugurated by the Republican party, the infamous war that has been made upon silver in the United States beginning in 1873. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

That, and its twin iniquity a high protective tariff, has destroyed the value not only of wool, but of all the farm products of the United States, until the farmers are confronted to-day with an average valuation of less than 50 per cent of what their earnings and their holdings were worth before the demonetization of silver in 1873. Their baneful influences are felt throughout the country and they are as inseparable and as closely united as the Siamese twins.

S. N. D. NORTH,
Secretary National Association of Wool Manufacturers, Boston, Mass.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. REED. I will reserve my time.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM].

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Chairman, I trust what little time I shall occupy will be in explanation of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from West Virginia; that the time for the schedule, placing wool on the free list, take effect on the 1st day of next August, to be supplemented with an amendment to be offered that the schedule relating to woolen goods shall take effect on the 15th of December or the 1st day of January. It is absolutely necessary, Mr. Chairman, for the woolen manufacturers of the country to know now exactly when this bill, so far as these schedules are concerned, will go into operation. If we could put these schedules into operation now, as some gentlemen insist, I would be in favor of doing it; but the trouble is that the manufacturers are in a state of uncertainty in which they will be from now until this bill shall pass and become a law.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BYNUM. Certainly.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Does not the first paragraph of the bill fix the 1st day of June as the day on which the bill is to go into operation?

Mr. BYNUM. I will come to that. The bill does fix the 1st day of June as the day on which the bill shall go into operation, but gentlemen know that the probabilities are that it will not be passed much before the 1st day of June or the 1st day of July.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I hope it will be passed before that.

Mr. BYNUM. I hope so too. I would pass it to-day if I could. But here is the trouble. The products for next fall's supply of manufactures are made this spring and the jobbers will not give their orders to the manufacturers so long as there is any doubt as to when wool will be put on the free list, and the manufactories are practically closed at the present time. Now, if there is any uncertainty the jobbers are not going to give their orders until they find out what time the bill goes into effect. If the act should go into operation on the 1st day of June, the jobbers would not give their orders to the manufacturers, for the reason that part of the supplies can be made after the 1st day of June. No manufacturer is going to make goods out of the wool on which he has to pay duties when the same must be sold in competition with products made from free wool; it will practically close up the manufactories from now until the time wool will go on the free list.

Now, the season is divided, as the chairman of the committee well said, so far as the manufacture of woolen goods is concerned into two periods, from January until July or August, when the supplies are made for the next fall, and from August until January the supplies are made for the succeeding spring and summer wear. The consequence is, that by postponing the time when the free-wool clause will take effect until August will be to give to the manufacturers the opportunity of getting their fall supplies out of the wool that is taxed, and extending the time until the middle of December will allow that whole product to be consumed; so that the woolen manufacturers, dealers, and the consumers will stand upon the very same footing.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will the gentleman yield to me for another question?

Mr. BYNUM. Certainly.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Then the effect of this amendment is to cause the wool-wearers of this country to wear taxed woolen goods until December of this year?

Mr. BYNUM. Certainly; if it is postponed until that time. There can be no question about that; but this question is simply this: Would you rather keep the woolen mills closed in the country for the next six months and their operatives out of employment than to postpone the benefits until that time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. But you say that they will open as soon as they can get free wool; then would not they open in June, and will not they keep closed until they get free wool?

Mr. WARNER. I would ask the gentleman if it would be possible, should the factories remain closed until June, for them to manufacture enough goods to prevent the price from going higher on account of the inadequacy of the supply when compared with the demand?

Mr. BYNUM. I do not think they would. They would manufacture some. The jobbers' orders are made and the patterns are designed and the orders taken a year ahead in the manufacture of woolen goods; and they would get, of course, a very small portion of the orders of the fall's supply. That is the whole question. I think it would be much better to extend the time rather than to have the prevailing uncertainty and loss of employment that will occur between now and the time this bill should go into operation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I hope the gentlemen on the other side will consume their time.

Mr. REED. I reserve my time.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. If the gentleman does not desire to debate, I hope we will have a vote upon this question. I do not desire debate, if they do not.

Mr. REED. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, to the amendment in question I want to say a word if I can have the attention of the committee. There are woolen manufacturers on the other side of this House, one or more of them, I think, on the Ways and Means Committee. Now, I want to make this statement, if I can have the attention of gentlemen on the other side of the House as well as on this:

Mr. GROUT. You do not expect to have any effect upon the other side, do you? [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, yes. I think that when I tell the truth it will have an effect upon any fair-minded man who wants to hear the truth. The wool produced in the United States since the 1st day of June last and now can be bought and is being bought and can go into manufactures by our woolen manufacturers as cheaply as it can be bought in Australia, with freight added. In other words, the woolen manufacturer of the United States to-day can take his orders for delivery next fall and can fill those orders by buying American wool and manufacturing it into his products as cheaply as it can be bought anywhere on this earth. Now, if I am correct about that, where is the farmer to be benefited if wool is to go on the free list by a postponing of this date until the 1st of August?

If I am correct about it, why can not the American manufacturer manufacture out of this product as cheap now as he can hereafter? In other words, gentlemen, you have discounted the fall in the price of wool by the promise to put it on the free list. That is all I want to say about that, and when I have made that statement it seems to me that it shows the impropriety of postponing the date when this schedule shall take effect until the 1st day of next December, if it is to take effect at all. The only effect, as I said yesterday, is to give the importer the increased profit, to enable him to close out what he has bought, his stock on hand, at the higher price, without benefiting the consumer on the one hand or the wool-grower on the other; and, to my mind, this amendment smells of the influence of the importer and the woolen manufacturer rather than of a sound economic policy.

Mr. Chairman, that is all I want to say upon that point, and, as I am not fond of talking generally upon an economic question when gentlemen are talking louder than I am and it is but disturbing the air, I will yield the remainder of my time back to the gentleman from Maine, and seek some other opportunity to say certain things that I would be glad to say in reply to gentlemen who hold theories upon this subject, if I can succeed in turning their attention for a short time from their own theories to listen to the theories of somebody else.

Mr. GROUT. The facts of somebody else. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has ten minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. REED. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL].

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Chairman, if we can apply to trade between individuals the terms we use concerning the trade between nations, it is doubtless true that a millionaire, who lives upon the income of invested wealth, imports more than he exports. But this fact is not the cause, but the result of his prosperity. He buys but he does not sell, and he draws interest money sufficient to enable him to pay for what he buys.

Now, suppose you enjoin upon the poor man, who not only does not have any income from invested wealth but who has to pay interest upon borrowed money, suppose you enjoin upon him the policy of the millionaire; suppose you say to him: "Buy more than you sell; consume more than you produce and more than you sell to some one else?" According to your theory you would be showing him the way to prosperity. So, when the case of England was instanced a few moments ago, and we were told that she imported every year $500,000,000 worth more than she exported, that statement conveyed to us the information that England was the millionaire nation of the world and that the rest of the world paid her, in interest upon money which she had invested, $500,000,000. In the broad sense the balance of trade is not against England.

Mr. Chairman, this balance-of-trade question does not need to be argued. It merely needs to be stated. A nation or a man at the end of the year must have received, either in goods or in money or credits as much as he has expended, or in the end bankruptcy ensues. I was interested in that passage in the eloquent speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] the other day when he said, in converting his controversy with the gentleman from Maine into a proposition which I did not think it was exactly convertible into, that it was for our interest to import goods and not money, and for this reason. He said: If we import two hundred and fifty millions of money every year, the result is that we bankrupt foreign nations, and it is our first interest to maintain the solvency of those with whom we trade; and he declared that if the world continued to export its gold to us it would become bankrupt.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is clear that if it would bankrupt foreign nations if they continued to export their gold to us it would bankrupt us if we continued to export our gold to them.

If the measure of our increase in national wealth, as our antagonists seem to argue, is the excess of our imports over our exports or our gain in foreign goods, let us so frame our laws as to make the adverse merchandise balance 1,000,000,000 instead of 250,000,000. Foreign nations will sell us to an unlimited amount for, according to the beautiful theory I have heard advanced on this floor, the more we import the richer we become, and the richer we become, of course the better will our credit be abroad.

Now I wish to say a word upon the amendment of the gentleman from West Verginia.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia resumed the floor.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SPRINGER). Eighteen minutes of the hour are at the disposal of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], and six minutes yet remain to the other side.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. That will take us beyond 1 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. Some interruptions have occurred, which have not been counted by the Chair as part of the hour.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. What time does the gentleman from West Virginia yield ot the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN]?

Mr. COCKRAN. The chairman of the committee [Mr. WILSON of West Virginia] is kind enough to say that he will not limit me except so far as the rule just adopted makes necessary; the time I may occupy will depend somewhat on the attitude of my friends on the other side.

You will observe, Mr. Chairman, that my friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] who is always entertaining and instructive, and never inconsistent except under the stress of party necessities, has done me the honor to answer with some elaboration the criticism of his speech which I made on Saturday last; and the gentleman who has just sat down [Mr. MCCALL] has carried that criticism to its logical conclusion when he asks with a candor that was refreshing and an innocence that was admirable, why an export of gold from this country would not be as dangerous for us as it would be to foreign countries if we import gold from them. I answer, if such a condition existed his criticism would be perfectly just; but a gentleman acquainted with the first elements of political economy would never have propounded a question based on such an assumption. My answer is that under no circumstances can trade be carried on where a movement of treasure in one direction is maintained for any continued length of time, provided the amount of treasure be sufficiently large to endanger the solvency of trade in the place which it leaves.

That brings me back to the proposition of the gentleman from Maine. I say, that the importation of $250,000,000 worth of goods can not occur unless you export $250,000,000 worth of goods to pay for them. You must pay for them in some form or another, because nobody has suggested in this House as a possibility in actual life the presentation, as a gift, of a large quantity of goods by one nation to another. I except from the operation of that remark the gentleman from Massachusetts, who is not bound by the ordinary rules of controversy or the ordinary limitations of common sense. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask my friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY]—and the answer may simplify this discussion—whether he accepts the new doctrine laid down by the other gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], the leader of the minority, that the value of labor, or the wages of labor, does not depend upon the law of supply and demand?

Mr. DINGLEY. I may say in respect to that, that it depends a great deal——

Mr. COCKRAN. I only ask whether the gentleman agrees with the other gentleman from Maine who made that remark?

Mr. DINGLEY. Undoubtedly my colleague [Mr. REED] and I do agree; but I desire——

Mr. COCKRAN. You do agree?

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to say that if in the term supply you include standard of wages and all the elements that refer to the conditions of men, and if you include in demand all the elements which go to enlarge industries, together with the competition of products from abroad, I would say yes. But if you mean simply that the number of persons seeking employment at a particular time and the number needed in employments at that time, coming together, alone fix wages, I say no.

Mr. COCKRAN. I am afraid the gentleman shows more ingenuity than candor. I will repeat my question and will put it in another form. Does the value of wages depend upon the competition among laborers for employment? I put it in that way.

Mr. DINGLEY. In reply to that I want to suggest to the gentleman——

Mr. COCKRAN. I do not want any suggestions; I want an answer.

Mr. DINGLEY. Very well; then I will take my own time to answer. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COCKRAN. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy; the barrenness of the answer is, I know, due to the cause which he represents. The gentleman from Maine contends that if we have an importation of goods into this country, and we happen to be engaged in the manufacture of the same goods, that importation is a national misfortune. Am I right in that? I know that the gentleman would correct me if I am in error, because he is the very apostle of truth himself.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman will proceed; I will take my own time to answer.

Mr. COCKRAN. I assume that I am stating the gentleman's position correctly. Now, if this importation of $250,000,000 worth of goods occurs, I do not believe the gentleman will dispute the proposition that they must be paid for by other goods which we export. The gentleman has told us while he was upon the floor to-day that the use of money is but to exchange commodities; and surely the importation of $250,000,000 worth of goods must be met by the exportation of a corresponding quantity, the exchange being accomplished through the medium of money, as he says; in other words, the $250,000,000 worth of goods brought into this country are met by an exportation equal in value, causing an increase in the total trade of the nation.

Now, I proceed a step further, following out the gentleman's argument. Will the gentleman dispute that if these goods be imported into this country, the importation occurs because they are produced cheaper abroad than we can produce them here? [Applause on the Democratic side.] If, therefore, we obtain $250,000,000 worth of goods in exchange for an equal amount of our commodities, it means that we get more goods by importing them than if we manufactured them ourselves. But if we obtain more goods by importation, we must manufacture more goods to meet them, to pay for them, and that means a broadening of the field of labor and an increase of production in this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If there is any gentleman on the other side who has the slightest suggestion to make, I would like to yield to him.

Mr. WRIGHT of Pennsylvania. Would you favor the importation of Chinese labor because it is cheaper than our own?

Mr. COCKRAN. You can import, and do import, cheap labor from a great part of the world under your tariff act. We want to raise the value of labor in this country by increasing its production. We want to stimulate production so that we can get into the markets of the world and command tribute from the people of every nation that finds a dwelling place upon this globe. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] suggests that if this rule be carried out to its legitimate end, it will drive people from one occupation after another, back to their original condition of tillers of the soil. He tells us that if we destroy the diversification of industries which your tariff claims to have established, and which I believe it has established, the necessary result will be that all the people of the country must go back to agriculture.

Sir, that is a libel upon this land. If it were true, the people of the world would not be flying to these shores. They do not come here looking for industrial opportunities depending upon fleeting, evanescent laws which may be amended and changed as the result of every campaign, but because God Almighty has filled the earth with wealth which labor can draw from its bosom. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is because we believe the resources of this country are practically inexhaustible: because we believe that our opportunities are not limited to tilling the surface of the soil, but because we can open the bosom of the earth and take treasures from its womb: because a day's labor can produce more in this country than it can produce anywhere else in the world, that we are opposed to legislation which, by your own confession, restricts production by making it more expensive. [Applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, I would not do justice to this subject if I failed to refer to the very important economic discovery which was made in the course of the debate last Monday, when gentlemen upon the other side declared that their policy of enriching manufacturers was justified by their belief that somewhere or other there was an agency that would take from the manufacturers a portion of their profits and distribute them among the laborers. The precise nature of this agency has not been defined. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] declared it was the trades unions that would accomplish this beneficent result.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], the leader of the Republican party, declared that the trades unions and Almighty God together would achieve it. [Laughter.] While the latter influence may be sufficiently potent to achieve the result, the first has never shown itself able to overcome human selfishness or to reverse economic laws.

Because, in the course of that debate, I referred to a strike in Pennsylvania last year, as illustrating the operations of this tariff law, it has been said that I criticised the rate of wages which these particular men obtained. Mr. Chairman, this committee misunderstood the purpose of that reference if they conceived that to have been my purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] has expired.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask that the gentleman be allowed to proceed such time as he desires.

Mr. COCKRAN. I only want two or three minutes.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] has four minutes more, which he can yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] has four minutes, and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has six.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] will have his time extended at least long enough to tell us what he knows and what he favors about the present amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, the rebuke is just. I apologize to the committee. I was following a Republican example set me by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. That is a safe thing to do. Democrats are never right unless they follow a Republican example. [Laughter.]

Mr. COCKRAN. They are always in trouble when they do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired unless it is extended. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has six minutes, and the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], four.

Mr. REED. I will yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] one-half of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] has three minutes more.

Mr. COCKRAN. I am grateful for the courtesy of my friend from Maine. I always believed him to be a gallant opponent; in this instance he proves it. I desire simply time to explain what was meant on th s side of the House by the reference to that Homestead trouble. I did not say whether those men were justified in any particular claim which they made, whether they were asking sufficient wages, whether they were contending against an unwarranted reduction, and with the evidence before me I could not assume to decide that question.

The purpose of that allusion was this: If you justify your tariff law on the ground that the trades unions will enforce a fair distribution of its fruits, then any resistance to trade unions would be criminal while they were asserting the claim to distribution of profit that you yourselves say they have a right to assert, that they will assert, nay, that they are bound to assert under the operation of a tariff law.

A MEMBER. He is not the only manufacturer under the tariff.

Mr. COCKRAN. No, he is not the only manufacturer who is trying to break down trades unions who ask for a division of the profits with them. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The tendency of these protected capitalists to break up the trades unions is just as strong as the disposition to hire the cheapest labor, and both are conditions that every candid man will admit who is a protectionist; and therefore your tariff law is in the nature of a public robbery, because they provide no adequate means by which its spoils can be divided between its immediate beneficiaries and those laborers whom they have induced to assist them in a war for high protective rates on a promise that they should share its benefits. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Does the gentleman from Maine desire to consume his time?

Mr. REED. I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman unless the gentleman from Maine yields him the time. The gentleman from West Virginia is recognized.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word, as personal reference has been made to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no power to recognize the gentleman unless the time is yielded to him by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from Maine abandons his three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine says he will not consume his three minutes.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to recall the committee to the question upon which it is now to vote. I shall not follow the discussion of the gentlemen upon the other side in their attempt to prove that the farmer is prospering under the present system. If the farmer is satisfied with his prosperity, all right. If he himself is not satisfied, I presume he will speak out when the opportunity offers. Neither shall I controvert the doctrine laid down by the gentlemen on the other side, that the object and operation of a protective tariff is to take care of capital, and then capital will take of labor—if labor can make it do so. I have always understood that that was the idea of the protective-tariff system.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I simply want to call the attention of the committee to the amendment upon which we are about to vote. The amendment which I have offered on behalf of my fellow-members of the Democratic side of the Ways and Means Committee is to fix the date when the provision for free wool shall go into effect as the 1st of August, to be followed up with an amendment fixing the day at which the reduction contained in the woolen schedule shall take effect as the 1st of December. We were just as reluctant to present this when it was introduced yesterday as the most impetuous members on this side to whom its first presentation seems to be an unwelcome proposition, but the whole question is summed up in a few words.

The great jobbers of the country, Marshall Field, Arnold Constable, and other great purchasers of woolen goods, are hesitating now, this very day, whether to give their orders for the fall trade to foreign manufacturers or to American manufacturers; and unless we fix these dates definitely they will probably give the great bulk to foreign manufacturers, taking the chances of bringing them in under the reduced tariff rates. With the dates fixed at the days we propose they will put their orders to a very large extent with the home manufacturers. Our own mills can do the usual work through the winter months and our own farmers can find a market, the only market they have, for the sale of their spring clip of wool. It is for that reason, Mr. Chairman, that we have presented these two dates and ask the committee now to vote upon them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 90, section 636, amend by inserting at the close of the paragraph, "Provided, That this section shall take effect on and after the 1st day of August, 1894."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the proposed amendment to this amendment.

Mr. BURROWS. Just a moment. I understand this is the amendment to put wool on the free list. I would like to have the paragraph read in connection with that amendment, so as to see how it would read.

The section was read, as follows:

636. All wool of the sheep, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals, and all wool and hair on the skin, noils, yarn waste, card waste, bur waste, rags, and flocks, including all wastes or rags composed wholly or in part of wool.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I should like to have the first paragraph of the bill read, which shows the time at which it would otherwise take effect.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the first paragraph of the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the 1st day of June, 1894, unless otherwise especially provided for in this act, there shall be levied and collected, and paid upon all articles imported from foreign countries, and mentioned in the schedules herein contained, the rates of duty which are, by the schedules and paragraphs respectively prescribed, etc.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the proposed amendment to this amendment, offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "August 1, 1894," and insert the words "October 1, 1894."

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. PAYNE. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 81, noes 151.

Mr. PAYNE. Tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 154; so the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, under what rule does the Chair hold that the vote on that amendment should come before the vote on the substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have the rule read.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XIX.

OF AMENDMENTS.

When a motion or proposition is under consideration, a motion to amend and a motion to amend that amendment shall be in order; and it shall also be in order to offer a further amendment by way of substitute, to which one amendment may be offered, but which shall not be voted on until the original matter is perfected, but either may be withdrawn before amendment or decision is had thereon. Amendments to the title of a bill or resolution shall not be in order until after its passage, and shall be decided without debate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. Does the Chair hold under that rule that the amendment to the substitute is not the next thing to be voted upon?

The CHAIRMAN. The rule is explicit upon the point that the text must be first perfected. If the paragraph of the bill is the text, it must be perfected; but if the proposed amendment of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee is the text, it must be perfected.

Mr. SPRINGER. The committee has refused to perfect the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia. Now a substitute is offered, and to that an amendment is proposed, which is in order. When that is voted upon, if it is not agreed to, the committee will then vote upon the substitute and then upon the original proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wants to conform to the practice that has been generally adopted here.

Mr. REED. What is the question, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The question submitted is whether the vote should now be taken on the proposed substitute and the amendment to it, or upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. REED. The regular order would be, first to perfect the amendment of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). To perfect the text. Will the gentleman from Maine please repeat his statement; the Chair did not hear it distinctly, owing to the confusion on the floor?

Mr. REED. The first proposition is to perfect the original amendment, then to perfect the substitute that is offered for it, then to vote on the substitute, and then to vote on the amendment. That is the regular course.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The question in the mind of the Chair was whether the first thing was not to perfect the text of the bill, to vote on the amendment to the text, which has not been voted upon.

Mr. McMILLIN. The rule is to vote first on the amendments that may be offered, one after another, or on that amendment which is offered to the amendment presented by the gentleman in charge of the bill. If no further amendment is offered, then, as has been stated by the gentleman from Maine, to vote on the amendments pending to the substitute that is proposed, and, when you have got the substitute clear of all amendments, then to vote on the proposition to substitute it for the original proposition.

Mr. REED. I understood that the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia was the basis; that that was the matter first before the committee, then to that an amendment was offered, then a substitute for it, and then an amendment to the substitute. It was upon that idea that I made my statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the proposed amendment of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee is the text. The question, then, will be taken on the proposed amendment to the substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "immediately upon the passage of this act" and insert "December 30, 1899."

The CHAIRMAN. That is offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS].

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. BOWERS, and it was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the substitute of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOHNSON], which will be read.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Provided, That this paragraph shall take effect immediately upon the passage of this act.

The question being taken, the Chairman declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 68, noes 89.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. WILSON of West Virginia and Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 112, noes 102.

So the substitute of Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio was agreed to. [Applause.]

The question being then taken upon the amendment as amended by the adoption of the substitute, it was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I had designed to offer an amendment fixing the 1st of December as the day for the woolen schedule to go into effect, but as our Republican friends on the other side have voted in favor of the free-wool provision going into effect immediately, I will not offer that amendment but will ask the reading of another, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 94, amend section 7 by striking out all of the section from line 21 down to the word "built," in line 25, and inserting, "That all articles of foreign production which may be necessary for the construction of vessels, including machinery and equipment;" so as to read:

"SEC. 7. That all articles of foreign production which may be necessary for the construction of vessels, including machinery and equipment, built in the United States for foreign account and ownership, or for the purpose of being employed in the foreign trade, including the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States, after the passage of this act may be imported in bond, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe," etc.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TARSNEY].

Mr. TARSNEY. Mr. Chairman, this section relates to the matter of the construction of vessels in this country to be used in the foreign trade and the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of this country. The language of the bill as reported by the committee is the exact language of the existing law, which has been carried down in the revision of what is known as the free-ship law for many years. When that law was first enacted and this language introduced into our statutes, it was in the days when shipbuilding was materially different from what it is at the present time. It was in the days when wooden ships and sailing vessels were carrying the principal commerce of the world. There has since been a revolution in the matter of shipbuilding, and there has also been some revolution in the meantime in legislation affecting it. The bill as reported by the committee, which in this respect is the provision of existing law, provides—

That all lumber, timber, hemp, manila, wire rope, and iron and steel rods, bars, spikes, nails, plates, tees, angles, beams, and bolts, and copper and composition metal which may be necessary for the construction and equipment of vessels built in the United States—may be imported in bond.

Now, many of these articles specified in the existing law and specified in the original text of this bill have, by laws heretofore enacted, been placed absolutely upon the free list. Some others of them are included in the proposed enlargement of the free list as embraced in this bill.

Now, if it was proper and wise that, in the existing law and in laws which have existed in the past, such articles as these enumerated should be permitted to be imported in bond free of duty for this purpose, and to give employment to American laborers in the construction of vessels, then it is equally important that our provision on this subject be made as comprehensive as the exigencies and demands of the industry may require. Therefore, to make this provision more specific, to take away from this measure the appearance of admitting in bond certain articles and commodities which for all other purposes are upon the free list—to clear up all ambiguity and make this provision as comprehensive as the demands of the business require, we have drafted the amendment now offered, which simply provides that all commodities or articles of foreign production that may be necessary in the construction and equipment of these ships may come in under bond and without the payment of duty.

Mr. DINGLEY. What benefit would it be to American labor to authorize the importation free of duty of a completed marine engine?

Mr. TARSNEY. If marine engines and all other commodities entering into the construction of a vessel cost a larger price in this country than abroad, if the competition of the shipyards upon the Clyde and in other places in Europe where shipbuilding is carried on is able to build these ships even for American capitalists, even those that are to sail the American flag and carry American commerce, cheaper than our ship constructors can build them, and therefore our capital instead of building ships here in our own shipyards and giving employment to our own laborers is diverted and sent to the Clyde and to the machine shops of Europe to furnish employment for labor in the construction of ships and machinery over there, taking away even that employment which the fitting up of this machinery might give by inducing the greater construction of ships in this country——

Mr. BOUTELLE. They can not put these vessels under our flag.

Mr. TARSNEY. Let me say to the gentleman from Maine that five are being built now in the State of Pennsylvania to sail under our flag.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Precisely; but they are not being built on the Clyde.

Mr. TARSNEY. I did not say that they were.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And they are not going to be permitted to import their engines from Europe.

Mr. TARSNEY. Will the gentleman from Maine give this House any sufficient reason why the shipbuilder should be permitted to import lumber, timber, wire, steel beams, and all like articles entering into the construction of a ship and not be permitted to import these other things that are necessary for building and equipping such ships?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I could give the gentleman as one answer that ought to be satisfactory to him, although it would not be entirely so to me, that under the very theory you are advocating of admitting what you designate as "raw materials" for the purpose of stimulating industries in this country you could justify the importation of iron, copper, and all the other materials in bulk or in crude form to be worked up in this country, when you could not possibly justify the importation of an entire marine engine or an electrical apparatus or the entire finished equipment of the ship. That is the difference between having all the work of manufacture done in this country and having the completed and finished machinery and equipment of a vessel imported from abroad.

Mr. TARSNEY. Are not our working people engaged in making the steel beams, manila rope, and wire rods?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Precisely so, and that is just where I take issue with the gentleman from Missouri and his party fundamentally. I take issue with you because I would not admit in that manner free raw materials.

Mr. TARSNEY. Why did you?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I did not.

Mr. TARSNEY. Why, you incorporated it in the existing law.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I did not do it myself, but if I had done so I would not be subject to the criticism of having opened wide the door to the importation of finished manufactures or a completed ship.

Let me say this to the gentleman from Missouri on this proposition, you are absolutely proposing to reverse the policy established in the United States and successfully carried into effect within the past ten or twelve years under which we emancipated ourselves from our dependence upon foreign countries for materials until within seven years past, when it was alleged on the floor of the House that we could not build a modern high-power marine engine, we have gone forward in demanding that the American Navy should be American in its materials, design, and construction, until we have demonstrated not only that we can build modern marine engines, but have actually built the finest marine engines in the world, and to-day we have afloat the fastest ships on the ocean. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TARSNEY. Now, let me say to the gentleman that he has succeeded in almost emancipating shipbuilding from the country; and let me say to the gentleman further——

Mr. BOUTELLE. What was that remark?

Mr. TARSNEY. Wait a moment. The gentleman says he did not vote for these propositions. He voted for the McKinley bill and this is contained in the McKinley bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will accept the full responsibility of approving of it. I meant to say I was not here at the particular time when that policy was originated.

Mr. TARSNEY. Did you not vote for the McKinley law?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Undoubtedly. I meant to say that I was not here when that policy was originated years ago.

Mr. TARSNEY. Did you not vote for that law?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Why, undoubtedly.

Mr. TARSNEY. Then you voted for all these things except the provisions with reference to marine engines?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Undoubtedly I voted for the existing law. What do you deduce from that?

Mr. TARSNEY. Now, I will ask you what distinction you make?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I want to say to the gentleman that since that was adopted we have gone on by our legislation in this country, by Republican votes—legislation in which I feel proud to have borne an humble, although a very persistent part—we have gone on until, in contrast with the time when the Chicago, Boston, Baltimore, and Charleston, among the first of our ships of the new Navy, were built of material, important portions of which were imported from Europe, because gentlemen like the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TARSNEY] stood up here day after day and said we could not produce those things in this country, because gentlemen on the Democratic side insisted on putting into bills that were brought into this House clauses declaring that the Secretary of the Navy should only use American materials in cases where he could get it "at a reasonable price and within a reasonable time," making that depend upon the relative cost and the relative facility with which we could obtain these materials at home and abroad—I want to say to the gentleman that it is one of the proudest achievements of the Republican policy that within the past six or seven years we have altered all that, so that instead of being absolutely dependent, as we were, upon European forges and factories for the steel plates with which to build our ships, or for the armor plates with which to protect them, for the great forgings with which to build our guns, and for the hollow steel shaftings required for modern shipbuilding—instead of being dependent upon Europe for all that, now, under the stimulus of the protective principle, under legislation which offers inducements to American capital and American skill and enterprise, to occupy this new and great field which had lain fallow since the close of the war, we have built up in this country at Bethlehem and other points the great establishments that to-day not only compete with but exceed the capacity of the Krupp establishment in Germany, or the Whitworths in England, or the Creusot works in France, or any other of the great armor-producing and steel-forging plants in the world.

I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TARSNEY], as an American citizen, if he does not feel proud when I tell him that whereas eight years ago we could not put out a single ton of heavy steel forging in this country, that to-day in the city of Bethlehem, Pa., we have an establishment with more powerful machinery than any other on the face of the earth; that in a few years we have caused the establishment of this magnificent plant; that while the great Krupp establishment at Essen has boasted of its ponderous machinery, and to-day its heaviest hammer wields a blow of but 90 tons, we have at Bethlehem, to forge American steel, to build up our American Navy, a mammoth hammer that brings down a blow of 125 tons at every stroke. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, the gentleman says we have emancipated ourselves out of our shipbuilding business. I would like to have him visit the splendid shipbuilding plants that have been erected within a decade at San Francisco, at Philadelphia, at Newport News, at Bath, and elsewhere. I would like to have him take the cars and go to Philadelphia, where he will find to-day on the stocks the largest amount of tonnage that ever was put in process of building in that city since it was founded; where he will find to-day in a gratifying condition of progress the structures of great steamships that are to be put upon the ocean under the American flag, that when they are equipped will be superior to any other vessels of their class on the waters of the globe, and that the American flag will again be restored to that supremacy on the ocean which was once the pride not only of this country, but the boast of the Democratic party in the olden days. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, the principles involved in the tariff bill now before the House have been prominent issues in every campaign for the past thirty years, and have been discussed over and over again in every town, village, and city in this broad land. And, after all, it is only a question of revenue, or, in other words, how the money needed to defray the necessary expenses of the Government shall be raised. There is no difference of opinion about the amount needed, but there is a great great diversity of opinion as to the method of raising it. The Republican party has, ever since its organization, earnestly advocated a system which would protect all classes of our people against competition from the Old World and thereby give to all an opportunity to enjoy the blessings which the Almighty in His infinite wisdom has seen fit to bestow upon this great country; that the man who depended upon the work of his hands for his daily bread should be able to provide his family with a home of their own, to supply them with the comforts and many of the luxuries of life, and to educate his children and make of them intelligent American citizens.

On the other hand, the Democratic party with equal persistency has advocated the English idea of free trade, and to that end has demanded that all barriers of protection shall be removed and our people placed in direct competition with the Old World, where it is well known that life is in many places a struggle for existence; where, at a very tender age, the work of the child is needed to help its parents earn a livelihood, the child thus growing to man's estate dwarfed in body and mind. To me the proposition to do away with the protective system—a system which has developed the greatest nation on earth—is one fraught with many perils, and should this bill become a law the result to all of the laboring, manufacturing, mining, and agricultural classes would be disastrous.

I have the honor to represent in this House a large and intelligent agricultural constituency, who are vitally interested in the measure under discussion, and whose interests are in a greater degree jeopardized by the proposed legislation than any other class of our people.

The foundation of the prosperity of the American farmer and the American laborer is the continued operation of the American factory. When the factory fires are extinguished nothing follows so surely as the enforced idleness of the laborer, and when this comes the home demand for the farmer's products is gone. Every condition in American life is affected by the question of a protective tariff, and every man under the flag receives in a greater or lesser degree its benefits. It is no exaggeration to say that under the provisions of the bill under discussion the foreign manufacturer and foreign laborer would receive these benefits, and the American farmer at the same time would be deprived of his home markets; while the factory operatives, deprived of their means of livelihood, would be forced to the farm, thus increasing the supply of agricultural products and further lowering the prices of the same.

The wool industry, which has made rapid strides since the passage of the tariff bill of 1890, under the provisions of which an increased duty was placed on foreign wool, is now threatened with extinction should this bill become a law. As evidence of the threatened extinction of the sheep industry, I have but to call your attention to the fact that in the world's greatest live-stock market, Chicago, this season there has been such a deluge of lambs that the price declined 50 per cent in less than ninety days, and lambs sold at a price less per hundred pounds than sheep, something never before known in the history of that market. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], in his able presentation of this subject, has well said:

In the case of the American wool-grower it is not within his power to reach the conditions, if such a step was desirable, which would enable him to successfully compete with the foreign producer. High-priced lands, a rigorous climate, American wages, and the cost of transportation offer an irresistible barrier to the successful prosecution of this industry in the United States under free trade. How can our flock master contend with Australia in an open market, where 600,000,000 pounds of wool are produced annually from flocks grazing on lands which are rented for a penny an acre a year? Or with the 460,000,000 pounds of annual production in South America, where lands are free and labor commands only 8 cents a day? Or with Russia's 350,000,000 pounds produced with 15 cents daily labor? Or with South Africa, Turkey, and Asia, where 10 cents a day is the highest recompense awarded in this industry? Under free trade these countries could put their wool down in our markets at a price less than the cost of production here, and the consequence would be the complete destruction of this great and growing industry in the United States. This would be attended with a sacrifice of 47,000,000 sheep, in which 2,000,000 farmers have invested $100,000,000 in capital, and the abandonment of extensive ranches with all their valuable improvements. It is idle to contend that with free wool this industry could survive.

The safety of our American institutions against foreign invasion lies not only in a patriotic citizenship which at a moment's notice would create a volunteer army of defense, but it also consists in the great natural resources we enjoy. Destroy the wool industry and what would be the result in case of a foreign war, with our ports blockaded and dependent upon foreign wool to clothe our army and our people? This is, in my opinion, one of the strongest reasons for protecting and fostering the productions of wool.

I desire here to submit the correspondence between Gen. Andrew Jackson and Dr. Colman, of Warrenton, Va., in 1824, when Gen. Jackson was a candidate for the Presidency.

DR. COLMAN TO GEN. JACKSON.

WARRENTON, VA., April 21, 1824.

DEAR SIR: Being one of the six members of the Virginia Assembly in the caucus last winter who voted for you as a fit and proper person to be supported by the people of the State for the Presidency of the United States, and having since heard that you are in favor of the "protecting duty policy," I take the liberty of desiring you to inform me whether you intend voting for the tariff bill now before Congress. I wish to have information on this subject as soon as your convenience will permit, that I may answer the Fredericksburg committee who invite my cooperation in getting up a ticket for the hero of New Orleans. In this county you have many friends, and some think your support will be better in Petersburg than in any of the contiguous counties. We are antitariff here; and candor required me to say that should you be the advocate of a measure to which our interest is evidently opposed, the zeal with which you have hitherto been supported will be relaxed.

I am, etc.,

L. H. COLMAN.

GEN. JACKSON TO DR. COLMAN.

WASHINGTON CITY, April 26, 1824.

SIR: I have had the honor this day to receive your letter of the 21st instant, and with candor shall reply to it. * * * You ask me my opinion on the tariff. I answer that I am in favor of a judicious examination and revision of it; and so far as the tariff before us embraces the design of fostering, protecting, and preserving within ourselves the means of national defense and independence, particularly in the state of war, I would advocate the support of it. The experience of the late war ought to teach us a lesson; and one never to be forgotten. If our liberty and republican form of government, procured for us by our Revolutionary fathers, are worth the blood and treasure at which they were obtained, it surely is our duty to protect and defend them.

Can there be an American patriot who saw the privations, dangers, and difficulties experienced for the want of a proper means of defense during the last war who would be willing to hazard the safety of our country if embroiled, or rest it for defense on the precarious means of national resources to be derived from commerce, in a state of war with a maritime power which might destroy that commerce to prevent our obtaining the means of defense and thereby subdue us? I hope there is not; and if there is, I am sure he does not deserve to enjoy the blessing of freedom. Heaven smiled upon and gave us liberty and independence. That same Providence has blessed us with the means of national independence and national defense. If we omit or refuse to use the gifts which He has extended to us we deserve not the continuation of His blessings. He has filled our mountains and our plains with minerals—with lead, iron, and copper—and given us a climate and soil for the growing of hemp and wool.

These being the grand materials of our national defense, they ought to have extended to them adequate and fair protection, that our own manufactories and laborers may be placed on a fair competition with those of Europe, and that we may have within our country a supply of those leading and important articles so essential to war. * * *

This is a short outline of my opinions, generally, on the subject of your inquiry, and believing them to be correct and calculated to further the prosperity and happiness of my country, I declare to you I would not barter them for any office or situation of a temporary character that could be given me. I have presented you my opinions freely, because I am without concealment, and should indeed despise myself if I could believe myself capable of acquiring the confidence of any by means so ignoble.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON.

Mr. PICKLER. From that letter there seems to be very little of Jacksonian Democracy in the majority of the Democratic party now.

Mr. BABCOCK. That is true.

Mr. POWERS. That letter was written when Gen. Jackson was for the first time a candidate for the Presidency, and four years later he wrote another to Senator Ray, of Indiana, reaffirming the same statement.

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes, sir.

The tobacco industry of Wisconsin alone brings to the farmers something over $2,000,000 yearly. Since the election of 1892 the acreage has decreased from 26,300 in 1892 to 23,200 acres in 1893. If the fear of proposed legislation would decrease the acreage in one State over 12 per cent in a single year, what would be the result of the passage of the bill? In my opinion, it would practically destroy the tobacco industry in Wisconsin, and the effect could not be different in other States. So depressed has been this industry that the crop of 1892 is still in the warehouses of Wisconsin, with no immediate prospect of sale, and with the crop of 1893 demanding storage, and no money in the hands of dealers to move it. The tariff bill of 1890 provided for a duty of 30 cents per bushel on barley, and to show the effect of the law I append the following statement, showing the imports for ten years, from 1884 to 1893, inclusive. Comment is unnecessary; the table speaks for itself, showing a falling off from 1890, when the importations were 11,327,052 bushels, to 1893, when the importations were only 1,969,761 bushels.

According to the official report of the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department the imports of barley from the Dominion of Canada for the past ten years were as follows:

Year ending June 30—	Bushels.	Value.
1884	8,593,902	$5,919,965
1885	9,964,870	6,530,827
1886	10,194,107	7,175,397
1887	10,351,893	6,170,060
1888	10,445,751	7,812,814
1889	11,325,881	7,721,475
1890	11,327,052	5,617,377
1891	5,076,471	3,221,180
1892	3,144,918	1,591,305
1893	1,969,761	921,301

The sudden falling off, beginning in the autumn of 1890, is ascribed to the fact that on October 6, 1890, the McKinley bill, which raised the duty from 10 cents per bushel to 30 cents per bushel, became operative as a law. The decrease would have been still greater had the law gone into effect a month or so sooner, for in the brief interim Canadian shippers rushed over the border fully 4,000,000 bushels of the then new crop of barley, so as to embrace the old duty of 10 cents, and thus avoid the impending duty of 30 cents per bushel. It is a matter of record that, in order to provide for the proper entry of this extraordinary influx of barley, the collectors of customs at the ports of Buffalo and Oswego kept their respective offices open until midnight of October 5.

I desire to call the attention of this House and of those interested in agricultural products generally to the proposed decrease in duties on farm products as per the following table:

Articles.	McKinley tariff.	Wilson bill.
1. Barley	30 cents per bushel	Reduced to 20 per cent ad valorem.
2. Corn	15 cents per bushel	Do.
3. Oats	do	Do.
4. Rye	10 cents per bushel	Do.
5. Wheat	25 cents per bushel	Do.
6. Beans	40 cents per bushel	Do.

Articles.	McKinley tariff.	Wilson bill.
7. Tobacco (Sumatra wrappers).	$2 per pound	$1 per pound.
8. Butter	6 cents per pound	4 cents per pound.
9. Cheese	do	25 per cent ad valorem.
10. Hops	15 cents per pound	8 cents per pound.
11. Onions	40 cents per bushel	20 cents per bushel.
12. Potatoes	25 cents per bushel	10 cents per bushel.
13. Wool	44.3 per cent	Free list.
14. Milk	5 cents per gallon	Do.
15. Broom corn	$8 per ton	Do.
16. Cabbages	3 cents per head	Do.
17. Eggs	5 cents per dozen	Do.

There are also many things in the present bill that would seem to require explanation, and the query arises why the duty on wheat and potatoes should be but 20 per cent, while the duty on rice is over 70 per cent; or in other words, on the present basis of values, why wheat should pay a tariff of about 12 cents per bushel, while rice, the product of the South, pays 90 cents per bushel.

It would seem to one looking at this bill without prejudice, that the farmer, and in fact the entire agricultural interest, had been selected to bear a greater portion of burdens than any other class. The ruling majority of the Democratic party, which has formulated this bill, comes from the South, where cotton is the staple product, and where the cry has ever been made for cheap labor and the free markets of the world.

It is not only in the proposed tariff legislation, however, that the interests of the American farmer are sought to be destroyed, but also in the administration of the great Department of Agriculture, which was created to foster and promote his interests, evidence is daily given of the hostility of this Administration to his welfare. The district which I have the honor to represent in this House gave to the country the great head of that Department the lamented ex-Secretary Rusk, who was appointed by President Harrison upon the formation of his Cabinet, and who for four years labored with untiring zeal, and with an eye single to the benefit of the American farmer; and I desire here to call the attention of this House to some of the results achieved by that Department under his administration.

1. Contagious pleuro-pneumonia, which threatened the entire cattle industry of the country, completely eradicated.

2. Losses from Texas fever almost entirely prevented.

3. The treatment of cattle on board ship regulated, and cruelty and avoidable losses prevented.

4. The danger of introducing disease with imported animals removed.

5. The prohibition against the admission of our pork, which had been enforced for years by Germany, Denmark, Austria, France, Italy, and Spain, removed.

6. From one-half to 1 cent per pound added to the value of our pork in the markets of the United States and Great Britain, when bearing the United States Government inspection certificate.

7. The triumphant refutation of allegations of contagious diseases among American cattle shipped abroad, as the result of a system of inspection of American live cattle abroad and of individual identification.

8. The sugar industry placed upon a footing which promises ultimately to supply the entire domestic consumption with a home-grown product.

9. Indian corn successfully introduced as a human food in the leading countries of Europe, with a likelihood of adding to the value of that crop, even in years of the greatest production.

10. The first steps taken toward the extension of our trade in agricultural products throughout Latin-American countries.

11. Measures adopted to effectually check the growing imports of raw cotton from abroad.

12. The saving to farmers and horticulturalists, annually, of millions of dollars, by successfully combating the depredations of diseases and insects on vegetation.

13. The wide extension of the Weather Bureau service in the special interest of agriculture.

14. The publication of the three books, viz, Diseases of the Horse, Cattle, and Sheep, have alone been worth more to the agricultural interests than the entire cost of the Department for four years under Secretary Rusk.

By a comparison of the year 1892 with the year 1889, the last year of the first Cleveland Administration, we—

Increased our exports of bacon, hams, and lard by $19,000,000.

Exported $12,000,000 more of beef products.

Exported $16,000,000 more live cattle.

Exported $150,000,000 more of cereals; namely, wheat, $115,000,000; flour, $28,000,000, and corn, $7,000,000.

Exported $2,500,000 more seed.

Exported $1,500,000 more fruits and nuts.

Exported $2,000,000 more oil cake and meal.

Increased the foreign sale of all agricultural products by $275,000,000.

And what, let me ask, is the farmers' department of this Government doing under its present head? Instead of expanding and continuing the efforts inaugurated by Secretary Rusk to elevate the American farmer and promote his material interests, a system of false economy has taken the place of the intelligent and progressive policy maintained for the four years of President Harrison's Administration. Meat inspection, the keystone to the successful raising of the foreign prohibition of our meat products, has been curtailed, sugar experiments practically abandoned, preventive measures against the recurrence of pleuro-pneumonia withdrawn, and the work of the scientific divisions of the Department contracted. The cry of "paternalism" is interposed when a proposition is made to expend money in researches in the interest of agriculture, and this great wealth-producing class are continually taunted with being, in a sense, mendicants, asking for alms from the Government to whose prosperity they contribute so much. It is pleasing to note that the farmers' organizations of this country will not permit this treatment of their great interests to go unrebuked, and this seemingly studied attempt to belittle their work in adding to the greatness of their country to go unnoticed. [Applause.]

Mr. FITHIAN. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of every method of restoring our foreign carrying trade and building up our merchant marine except by the payment of subsidies. The last census report shows that in 1856 the values of the imports and exports coming into and leaving our ports on foreign vessels amounted to $159,336,576, while the values of the imports and exports carried on American vessels were $482,268,274, the per cent carried on American vessels being 75.2. In 1866 the values of the imports and exports carried on our vessels had shrunk to $325,711,861, while the imports and exports carried on foreign vessels had increased to $685,226,691, the per cent carried on American vessels being 32.2.

In 1876 the values of the imports and exports carried on American vessels were $311,076,171, while the values of the imports and exports carried on foreign vessels were $813,354,987, the per cent carried on American vessels being 27.7. In 1886 the values of the imports and exports carried on American vessels were $197,349,503, while the values of the imports and exports carried on foreign vessels were $1,073,911,113, the per cent carried on American vessels being 15.5. For the fiscal year 1893 the values of the imports and exports carried on American vessels were $197,765,507, while the values of the imports and exports carried on foreign vessels were $1,428,316,568, the per cent carried on American vessels being 11.5.

I am in favor of giving the shipbuilders of the United States free raw materials; and I believe the shipbuilders of this country can and will successfully compete with the shipbuilders of Europe, because they have said repeatedly before committees of Congress that if Congress would give them free raw material they would compete with the shipbuilders of Europe and build ships as cheaply in this country as any country on earth. In 1869 Mr. John Roach, then a prominent shipbuilder, said before a committee in Congress:

> America has lost her commerce, and what has she obtained in exchange for it? Simply the right of a few men to charge $9 per ton in gold on the importation of pig iron. Pig iron is the basis of all other metals connected with the making and repairing of ships. There has been a revolution in shipbuilding, and iron is the material from which they are now built. The high cost of iron produced by the tariff upon it is one of the principal difficulties our commerce has to contend with. I did not come here to ask a bounty. I came here to tell you that while all other articles of American produce are protected to a great extent there is no protection for American ships. If Congress will take off all the duties from American iron, reducing it to the price of foreign iron, then we are prepared to compete with foreign shipbuilders. The labor question is misstated; we are prepared to meet that difficulty, and to ask no further legislation on the subject.

Later, Mr. Charles M. Cramp, now the greatest shipbuilder in the United States, said before a committee in Congress, in answer to the question as to the amount of duty that was levied upon shipbuilding materials, that that duty was—> about 40 per cent, and if our shipbuilders could be relieved from that they could compete successfully with foreign builders. The difference in the cost of labor would be overcome by the superiority of American mechanics. Wooden ships will no longer be built, since iron ships are superior in every respect.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McDANNOLD. I ask unanimous consent that the time of my colleague be extended five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. FITHIAN. The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries in this Congress has prepared and submitted to this House a report in favor of allowing ships built in foreign countries to be brought into this country and the American flag placed upon them, and to be sailed as American ships; and whenever that goes into effect, so soon will the commerce of America be carried on American ships, and no sooner.

We have resorted to the expediency of subsidies time and again. Bill after bill has been passed by Congress giving ships subsidies for the purpose of restoring, as claimed by subsidy advocates, the carrying trade of the United States. In the Fifty-first Congress, when the Farquhar proposition was introduced, the object of which was to give to all classes of ships, both sail and steam ships, a certain subsidy per mile, when that proposition was defeated and what was known as the ocean mail subsidy enacted, the advocates of that proposition claimed that it would be of great benefit and of great advantage to American commerce, because it would build up our foreign carrying trade, that was gradually dwindling year by year to nothing. That expedient has been tried. That law has been in operation since its passage in the Fifty-first Congress, and yet we find that the statistics every year show that the foreign carrying trade is dwindling down until it is now almost nothing.

In 1891 it was 12 per cent, and in 1893 it had dwindled to only 11 per cent, and unless a free-ship bill is passed, giving to the American people the right to go into the markets of the world and buy their ships where they can buy them cheapest, and place the American flag upon them and sail them as American vessels, you will find that the per cent of our foreign carrying trade will continue to dwindle until it will amount to absolutely nothing.

In this connection I desire to call the attention of the committee to a statement made by an eminent gentleman who now occupies a seat in the other branch of this Congress, Senator SHERMAN, of Ohio. He said:

> Since we can not build these vessels within 20 or 30 per cent of the cost in England, why not admit them? Why not admit them duty free, raise the American flag upon them, put American officers upon their decks, and have American lines instead of British lines? Why, sir, if that bill should pass, authorizing foreign ships when owned by American citizens to be used for the present, for three years under the American flag, one-half the lines between New York and England would be American lines in sixty days.

And Senator MORRILL, the venerable Senator from Vermont has said:

> Is it practicable to recall our shipping? I think it is, and by the simplest process. Not a dollar of subsidies. Give us cheap materials and we will do it. Give us the ground on which we stand, so that we shall have our materials just as cheap as they can be afforded elsewhere, and then all these shipyards and all that skilled labor will be at work at once, and you will find that we shall restore the balance of the shipping interests on the ocean that now stand against us.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, my apology for addressing the House so soon after taking my seat must lie in the necessity of the occasion. On the banks of the Delaware, in the district which I represent, we have founded an industry which is a glory to the workmen of our country. We challenge competition with any nation of the world, to such an extent that the nations of Europe have sent their experts to examine into the system of shipbuilding which takes place on the banks of the Delaware, which may be called the Clyde of America. We have sent and borne the flag of our country into foreign parts, and now you propose to strike down this industry by allowing finished machinery to come into competition with our home production.

Come with me, gentleman, to the land where the City of New York, which bears our flag, has gone, the newest republic of the western continent, and I will demonstrate to you what will be the result if you pass this amendment to this bill. Brazil buys her ships—has them built on the Clyde. Brazil imports her machinery and puts it in; and now that her navy is called into requisition, where does she stand? Her great men-of-war—none better exist—lie in the harbor of Rio helpless, because she has not the shipyards or the works to repair the damage that takes place by the terrible results of war. Do our Democratic friends mean to pull our country down and put it on a level with the South American republics?

Do you mean, gentlemen, to take away the pride of the American nation and haul down our flag, as you did in Hawaii? [Applause.] Or do you mean to let it fly and float all over the world and protect our interests? There are 7,000 workingmen supported by charity in the city of Philadelphia at this time. The day before I left my home to take my seat in this honored body, a circular such as never before darkened the doors of the City of Brotherly Love was delivered by the postman at every house. It came from the committee of citizens' relief, saying that it was necessary for the people of Philadelphia to contribute $10,000 a week in order to keep alive—whom? paupers?

No; but as good, honest, hardworking American mechanics, skilled and unskilled, as any nation ever produced in the world, who had reached perfection in their respective arts, and who had been supporting and educating their families under the beneficent influence of the glorious doctrine of protection. [Applause on the Republican side.] And yet, now, having threatened our cotton mills, having threatened our woolen mills, you would, by this bill, go further and take away the ship-building interest, which we claim belongs not to Philadelphia, not to Pennsylvania, but to our country from one end to another, for you can not do without it. [Applause on the Republican side.] In addition to this you are striking not alone at the actual yards, but you are striking at the plants which have grown around them, at Bethlehem, at Midvale, and at other places, to supply the necessary elements and materials of the ship-yard.

Pause, my Democratic friends, before you take away the protection necessary to maintain our American interests in foreign lands. You are reaching out in a foreign policy; you must have a navy to enforce it. Strike down our ship-yards, the only yards that amount to anything in America, and you are helpless before England or any other nation from which you must procure your ships and your supplies. This is a matter of patriotic necessity. If we wish to maintain our supremacy on the seas and to hold our heads up among the nations of the earth, we must have a navy that can enforce our mandates and protect our commerce. You can have no extension of commerce whether with free materials or free finished machinery, unless you have a navy that can protect it in every quarter of the world—a navy able to say that our flag shall be protected wherever it may float. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I undertake to say that the continuance of our present system of navigation laws, indorsed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS], is the greatest outrage ever perpetrated upon any free people under God's sun. What has been the result? They have compelled the American people to pay annually more than $150,000,000 to the owners of foreign ships. They have reduced our carrying trade, which formerly was carried in American bottoms, from 87 per cent down to about 11 per cent. Whereas under Democratic rule the sails of your commerce whitened every sea and the flag of your mercantile marine was saluted with honor in all the ports of the civilized world, to-day the American traveler sailing the ocean will seldom see the American flag, unless upon some ship of war or solitary transport. Such has been your system of navigation laws supported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and at the same time put into the pockets of our own people more than $100,000,000 of that now sent abroad.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, I wish to ask him whether there has been any change in the navigation laws? Are they not precisely the same as they were at the time he speaks of, when our foreign commerce was so prosperous?

Mr. TERRY. There has been substantially no change in the navigation laws themselves, but there has been a change in conditions; and your navigation laws have not been changed to conform to those conditions. As the result of this system of laws, which ought to have been abolished long ago, you have given your foreign trade almost entirely to foreign bottoms——

Mr. FITHIAN. Iron ships have taken the place of wooden ships.

Mr. TERRY. That is it. When England found that under her old system of legislation we were getting the advantage in foreign commerce, she modified her navigation laws, just as we ought to do now under the changed condition of things. By such a change of policy we would build up a carrying trade, as England has done, and cheapen freight upon our farm products.

Gentlemen speak of the glory of the American flag; yet they have deliberately by their laws stricken it down upon the highway of the nations. I am in favor of the proposition advocated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TARSNEY], looking to the restoration of the American flag to its former glory upon the seas.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] and advocated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TARSNEY] proposes to admit free of duty completed marine engines and other completed machinery for steamships. The law as it stands now, and has stood for many years, allows the free entry of all materials necessary for the construction and equipment of vessels to be employed in the foreign trade.

Mr. TARSNEY. That statement of the gentleman is a little too broad. The proposition is to admit those articles specifically enumerated in the law.

Mr. DINGLEY. And that embraces about everything?

Mr. TARSNEY. No, sir; it comprises probably all things required in the old days——

Mr. DINGLEY. Carrying out the principle of admitting materials in the proper sense of the term, is the gentleman willing to limit the amendment to the only things not already covered—materials for the construction of machinery?

Mr. FITHIAN. And repairs?

Mr. DINGLEY. Materials for repairs are now covered by the law.

If this amendment is intended to apply to materials, properly speaking, that is one thing. The law now admits free of duty nearly all materials for the construction and equipment of vessels except materials for the construction of marine engines and machinery. Now, if the intention of the amendment is simply to extend the policy which has prevailed for so many years of admitting free the materials for the construction of the hull and for the equipment and machinery of steam vessels for the foreign trade, then, of course, it is in the line of what we have been doing for a great many years. But the gentleman's amendment provides, I understand, for admitting free of duty completed marine engines and all the completed machinery necessary for steamships.

That is something more than the mere admission of materials. If the gentleman intends only to cover materials in the proper meaning of the term, he should modify his amendment so that such limitation may not remain in doubt.

Mr. TARSNEY. In order that there may be no misunderstanding I will state to the gentleman from Maine that I would be in favor of admitting the entire ship free——

Mr. DINGLEY. Ah!

Mr. TARSNEY. And being in favor of admitting the entire ship free, I am in favor, and that is the purpose of this amendment, of admitting every part of it free.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then when the gentleman talks about being in favor of the free admission of materials for vessels, he means that the completed vessel—the completed marine engine and other completed machinery—should be admitted free of duty. Let us understand each other.

Mr. TARSNEY. I want every raw material or every completed engine which constitutes a component part in the construction of a vessel to be admitted as lumber and hemp and iron and other things entering into the construction of ships have been admitted for years.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, it has been for a long time the policy of this country to admit free of duty materials intended for the construction or manufacture of any article for export. The effect of this is to give what is called free raw material when you wish to construct an article intended for export. It has been extended for many years to the construction of and equipment of vessels that enter into the foreign trade on the ground that that was in the nature of an export, and on the theory that coming as they did in competition with foreign vessels, it was but an act of justice that they should have their materials in the same manner as materials for making articles for export.

In the line of the policy that existed for so many years, if the amendment should be modified so as to add material for the construction of the machinery which would enter into the construction of a marine engine, o course it would not be any variation of the policy. But the gentleman avows that his purpose is not to do that. He wants the engine and machinery constructed abroad, instead of here, without furnishing any labor to our American laborers. If you admit the materials which would enter into the construction of marine engines and machinery free of duty into this country, then the engine and machinery could be built here by our labor. But you propose to have it constructed abroad. That is your proposition, if I understand it; and if that is not the intention you should modify your amendment.

In order to make it perfectly clear what is intended, Mr. Chairman, I will offer an amendment which will make it in line with our previous legislation on this subject.

I am not going to enter into a discussion of the free-ship question to-day, for that is not involved in the amendment. It is not a proposition to admit the complete steamship free of duty.

Mr. TARSNEY. Not at all.

Mr. DINGLEY. That will come up on another bill before the House. This is to admit free of duty the completed marine engine and the completed machinery of the ship, which is practically a proposition providing for the construction of marine engines and of the machinery of steamships abroad and to be sent into this country. That is not in line with the policy which serves to encourage our own industries. There is no country in the world which is building better marine engines than our own at this time.

Mr. TARSNEY. Then there will be no fear of the operation of this law.

Mr. DINGLEY. A few years ago we were not building marine engines to any extent in this country, while to-day we are building the very best that are built in the world; and if they do cost something more than the foreign engines it is because our labor receives more. But the building ought to be done here, and not abroad.

I offer an amendment to the amendment, so as to make it simply a material proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the words "all vessels, including machinery and equipments," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "equipment and construction of machinery of vessels."

Mr. DINGLEY. That makes it simply a material proposition. Under the law already existing, and which has been in force for many years, it admits the materials for the construction of the engine, but not the completed engine itself.

Mr. TARSNEY. We understand the amendment. If the amendment I offered is adopted it will admit the finished engine.

Mr. DINGLEY. Precisely. My amendment provides for having the work of building the engine done here; yours for having it done in Great Britain.

Mr. FITHIAN. If our American workmen could have the material here they could build as cheaply as in Europe.

Mr. DINGLEY. But you do not propose to admit the material; you propose to admit the completed machinery and engine.

Mr. FITHIAN. I propose to admit the material for building the machine and also everything else free.

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, but we can not build marine engines if placed in open competition with the cheaper labor of Great Britain in that way. It is simply a proposition to transfer the building of marine engines from this country to Great Britain. That is all there is to it. If you want to do that, go ahead.

Mr. FITHIAN. You are talking about labor, when the shipbuilders of this country have said that if they could get material free they could build as cheaply in this country as in any country in the world—that the labor question was misstated.

Mr. DALZELL. But this is not material.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman let us know whether he wants these engines built here or not? That is the whole question.

Mr. FITHIAN. We want ships built here.

Mr. WALKER was recognized.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], and will recognize the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] later.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, there has been no epithet that could be applied to manufacturers, no criticism or depreciation of their character, their patriotism, and their intelligence, within the technical lines of parliamentary law, that has not been visited upon them, both upon those manufacturers who are representing their constituents upon this floor, and all the other manufacturers in this country; and I, for one, protest against the further conduct of debate in that manner.

Let me say here that this proposition of the Ways and Means Committee, that protection is a robbery, but that they propose to continue this robbery to a degree only, rises to the same level of morals that they rise to in political economy when they propose to take off half of the protection now and five years hence the other half. It rises to the same dignity in morals and in political economy that it would in surgery if a physician proposed to amputate a man's leg four inches to-day, four inches a month hence, and four inches at the end of another thirty days, and so on, in order that he might be saved the pain of taking off his whole leg at one time. [Laughter.]

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, to you, and to the House through you, that there is not a manufacturer in this country who does not demand absolute free trade now and once for all, rather than to take it by piecemeal. It is better for the manufacturer. He cares nothing whether you have a tariff or do not have a tariff, except for the size of the market, and it will simply reduce the wages of the workingmen, and will not affect the manufacturers who are left by the smallest fraction. This question of protection is one of wages and wages only, and is proved conclusively to be so by the fact that the profits of manufacturers, which are public and known, are not as high as the profits in banking, railroading, and other general industries in this country.

Now, when I put to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] the question whether he would favor bringing into this country free of all charge, and present as a gift to the people, depositing on their doorsteps in the morning so that they might take it into their houses, every dollar's worth of woolen goods that they would need to use for a year, and every dollar's worth of cotton goods they would need to use for a year, and thus throw out of employment and leave to starve or to seek other occupations the men, women, and children engaged in the cotton and the woolen industries, what reply does the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] make? What conclusive answer does he give to that question? What does he say, that shall settle all controversy and leave the answer clear to the minds of every member of this House?

He sleeps on it from Saturday till Sunday, and between his devotions on Sunday he says to himself, I will say, "The gentleman from Massachusetts is not bound by the ordinary rules of controversy or the ordinary rules of common sense." That is the conclusive answer that is made by this orator from New York, much of whose oratory, when he gets into a difficult position and can not answer, consists in pounding his desk to make so much noise as to drown his voice. [Laughter on the Republican side.] He sleeps on it again until Monday morning, and on Monday he whispers to his friends on the other side of the House. "I will fix him, I will answer him conclusively." [Laughter.] "The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] is not bound by the ordinary rules of controversy or by the ordinary rules of common sense." [Laughter.] "He is a manufacturer, and a man who has been said by one of the members of the Committee on Ways and Means to have his hands in the pockets of all the workingmen, taking out of them their money to make himself rich." That is the conclusive answer this great orator from New York makes to my question.

A MEMBER on the Democratic side. Is it true?

Mr. WALKER (continuing). On the Democratic side they cheer the gentleman whether he sits up or sits down, whether he stands up or stands down, on his head or on his feet. [Laughter and applause.]

Monday morning he repeats it, Tuesday morning he presents this delicious, this conclusive answer, this great discovery in political economy; and then this morning, after having enjoyed the luxury of it by telling it over and over to his personal friends, he comes in and tells it to the House, "Mr. WALKER is not bound by the ordinary rules of courtesy and the ordinary rules of common sense."

Mr. COCKRAN. Will you allow me for a moment?

Mr. WALKER. Yes, I will.

Mr. COCKRAN. I merely desire to say that the gentleman is mistaken as to my saying, "Mr. WALKER is not bound by the rules of courtesy." That would be an absolutely improper remark, and an unfounded remark.

Mr. WALKER. "Controversy."

Mr. COCKRAN. As to that, I can not do violence to the truth of history. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. O'NEIL in the chair). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALKER. He has furthermore a conclusive answer; and you will find that when he——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COCKRAN. I move to strike out the last word, and yield to the gentleman five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. WALKER. I do not think that that will do.

Mr. COCKRAN. May I ask indulgence of the committee to permit the gentleman to proceed longer?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has been extended.

Mr. WALKER. Now, then, when the gentleman gets on his feet again I hope he will do something besides pounding his desk. [Great laughter.]

Mr. COCKRAN. Would you rather I pound you? [Laughter.]

Mr. WALKER. Yes; I think it would do better service to pound me, for it never hurt me to be pounded. [Great laughter.] I have had my share of it in this House and have given some. I never take any exception to being pounded by great or small, even by a man who rises so much higher than the manufacturers as the gentleman from New York.

It takes genius and overpowering intellect to make so conclusive an answer as that: "Mr. WALKER is not bound by the ordinary rules of controversy or the ordinary rules of common sense." [Renewed laughter.]

Another great economic proposition which he puts to the House, and that is, when anybody replies to him he will quote about four words at the beginning and about four words at the end, putting in about three in the middle and adding about two, and then he will say, "That is what he said." [Great laughter.] "Is there any gentleman on this floor that will say that that is not the proposition the gentleman makes?" [Renewed laughter.] "I gave him time to answer every time," but every time he answered he adds further to the misrepresentation. He is as unfair a man in controversy as I ever discovered. [Laughter.] Then he says, "Will not a day's labor produce more here than it will produce in England or France or Germany?"

That is consistent with the fairness of the gentleman. That is in accordance with the gentleman's fairness of debate and of stating a proposition. Why did he not include "with the same appliances"? Then his question would have been a fair question. "A day's labor with the same appliances." Do we produce here more than they produce in England France, or Germany with the same appliances? No! I tell you, no. I tell you that I have seen more than a hundred workingmen in my district who had worked at the loom and at the anvil and the forge in England and in France and in Germany, in my office, and they gave me the yards and feet and pounds they produced in Europe; and they produced just the same there as here, "without variableness or shadow of turning." They have the same machinery there. They take our machinery as fast as we can produce it.

I say, "No." I say there is, possibly, a small margin. We are about five years ahead of them on the general average. We are about five years ahead in economics, and at the end of each five years there is nothing that can not be bought here cheaper than in Europe at the date just five years previous. With the exception of steel and iron, by the Bessemer process particularly, and in other inventions of steel and iron, the gentleman can not mention to me a solitary thing that has not been cheapened first here and then the machinery taken there. Then, again, the gentleman [Mr. COCKRAN] says, "The value of wages depend upon the competition in employment." I suppose that this great economic authority, who has his desk piled sky-high with musty volumes, so old that they are out of date, to quote from—I suppose what he meant to say was, "Does the 'cost' of wages depend upon the competition for employment"?

I tell him no. I tell him no! [Laughter.] And when I have time, which you will not give me now, I will conclusively prove it to you. I tell you it was never known since the world began that you could crowd the wages of workingmen down. They will starve, their wives and children will starve with them, but they will never go down. When it comes to that the countries will decay first. Workingmen will go down a little, but I mean they will never go down substantially, and when I come to have the ear of this House for an hour I will show you why. Never have wages gone down in this country substantially. In 1844 they were ninety eight and they went down to ninety-two, and it took sixteen years to get them back to one hundred, just two points higher, through all those years of agony. It was precisely the same from 1873 to 1878. Thousands upon thousands of the workingmen walked our streets. Tramps were on all our roads. Nearly all the States of the North passed laws concerning tramps, because American workingmen would not go down in their wages.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I would like five minutes more.

Mr. COCKRAN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to continue for five minutes. I would like to have him explain the distress between 1873 and 1878, during a high-tariff period.

Mr. WALKER. That explanation is exactly what I will give the gentleman if I can have time. Does not the gentleman remember that our tariff was paid in gold, that from 1873 to 1879 it took a large premium on gold to pay the tariff? Does he not know that we paid for our foreign goods in gold, and that that formed a large element also in the price of the goods, even between 1873 and 1879, though it had been a great deal larger before; so that the economic result was that the tariff was being practically reduced as the price of gold went down, and that made the panic of 1873 chargeable as a result of a practical reduction of the tariff. And you never knew a hard financial crisis, long-continued industrial depression in this country, that it was not under a Democratic free-trade tariff; as in 1837 under the sliding downward tariff of 1832; that of 1857 under the tariff of 1846, from 1873 to 1879, under the resumption of specie payment, the economic equivalent of a tariff reduction; and now, in 1893, it comes because you threaten the tariff so that manufacturers do not dare operate their factories, nor the jobbers buy goods, or retailers of jobbers, and therefore men can not find employment.

Mr. BLAND. Does the gentleman admit that the tariff goes up as the premium on gold goes up, and down as the premium on gold goes down?

Mr. WALKER. It does, in our currency, when there is a premium upon our money.

Mr. BLAND. Then, did you vote to increase the price of gold in order to increase the tariff?

Mr. WALKER. No, sir; because the tariff is not now payable in gold, and the gentleman from Missouri ought to know it. He ought not to undertake to deceive this House or to impose upon its members or the country by any such question as that. He knows better.

Now, I want to say to this committee that trade is not between countries. Trade between countries! What an economic statement that is for a gentleman of so much mental and physical eloquence as the gentleman from New York! [Laughter.] Trade is always between individuals, between factories, and it is to-day just as though all the factories in the world were operating in this country and were situated end to end and the workmen in them elbow to elbow at their varying wages.

[Mr. COCKRAN here made a remark in an undertone.]

Mr. WALKER (to Mr. COCKRAN). Oh, you will not get me mad. I do not get mad. Ask your questions. I do not ask sympathy from you or any other man. [Laughter.]

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I was simply remarking in an undertone to a gentleman beside me that I was slowly but surely getting mad, but I did not expect the gentleman from Massachusetts to hear the remark.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman's facility in transferring the application of his statements is equal to his facility in pounding his desk for eloquence. [Laughter.]

Why, do you know what the balance of trade was through all our free-trade times and all our protectionist times? What does it signify? Let the gentleman tell if he can. He is smarter than I am. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, I want to make the distinction between the gentleman from New York and the class that he represents, on the one hand, and this "robber baron," this "American shark," on the other hand, as prominent and distinctive as I can, and I take my place with the shark. [Great laughter.]

Why, sir, does not the gentleman know that if we import $250,000,000 worth of goods, it is a physical necessity under the laws of labor and economics that the 1,000,000 of people who would manufacture those goods, reckoning all workers at $250 a year, must necessarily be thrown out of employment; and it would take a whole generation for them to be relocated in other employments? But the gentleman's sole and exclusive answer to this statement rises but little above the dignity of his answer to my proposition about "shutting up the woolen factories;" which is, "I say so; Tom says so; Dick says so; and these gentlemen have PH. D., D. D., or LL. D. after their names; and therefore what they say is true."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COCKRAN. I will ask a moment, gentlemen of the committee, for a little colloquy with my friend.

Mr. WALKER. Certainly; that is what I am looking for. [Laughter.]

Mr. COCKRAN. On behalf of my friends on this side of the House, and I may say on behalf of human nature generally, I want to protest most solemnly against the classification which the gentleman has made of himself. If there is anything that looks like a "shark" in the composition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I have yet to discover it. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts stands—in appearance at least—for everything that is benevolent and good-natured. The result of this discussion tends to place him in a position before this House such as he never occupied before.

Mr. WALKER. Oh, you do not know; you have not been here all the time. [Laughter.]

Mr. COCKRAN. If I have missed any occasion when the gentleman has participated in debate, my loss has been great indeed.

Mr. WALKER. No doubt. [Laughter.]

Mr. COCKRAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I understand that the grievance of the gentleman so far as I am concerned——

Mr. WALKER. Oh, I have no grievance; you have done me a service.

Mr. COCKRAN. I am delighted, Mr. Chairman, that now we are quits. I may say——

Mr. WALKER. I do not wonder you call "quits." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw that. We are not quits. I am doubly indebted to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Order must be restored on the floor.

Mr. COCKRAN. If I understand the ground of the gentleman's criticism it is that when he propounded to me the question as to what would happen in this country if $250,000,000 worth of goods were given to the people of this nation as a present——

Mr. WALKER. Cotton and woolen goods; be right for once in your life.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York must not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. COCKRAN. Oh, I hope the Chair will make an exception in the case of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I say that the ground of the gentleman's criticism was that when he asked me what the effect of a gift of $250,000,000 worth of cotton and woolen goods to the people of this country would be, I answered the gentleman was not bound by the ordinary rules of controversy or the ordinary limits of common sense. Now, Mr. Chairman, there may have been some doubt as to the propriety of that remark before the gentleman last spoke. But when he has occupied the attention of the committee to make the statement that if those $250,000,000 worth of goods were landed in this country, every man's share being deposited at his doorstep, so that every person who chose might take his portion into his house, it would plunge the people of Massachusetts into destitution, he has justified anything that I may have said. What, may I ask, would the men who had taken their share of this $250,000,000 worth of goods do with them? How could they be in want while they had their portion of this gift of $250,000,000 worth of goods?

Mr. WALKER. What would become of the men who ought to have been engaged in the making of those goods?

Mr. COCKRAN. Are we to be told that the manufacturer would be so potent as to rob the laborer even of his share of this gift? [Applause.]

A MEMBER. The laborer could not eat cotton.

Mr. COCKRAN. A gentleman who sits behind the gentleman from Massachusetts, says the laborer could not eat cotton. Surely the gentleman would starve if the rule invoked by him were universal; for I am not aware that he produces anything edible or even tangible.

When a person obtains $250,000,000 worth of any kind of goods he can purchase other goods with them; I presume the gentleman from Massachusetts will not deny that.

Mr. WALKER. We were speaking about their using them, my friend, not selling them.

Mr. COCKRAN. Well, if they were limited to using them the goods certainly would not be a gift, because a gift implies the right of the person who receives it to dispose of it as he chooses. [Cries of "Oh!" "Oh!" on the Republican side and laughter.]

Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts has made another criticism, and I want to apologize to him again. He finds ground for criticism in the fact that I have quoted a great number of books. I acquit the gentleman of any charge of even consulting one book. [Laughter.] But when he explains that the panic of 1873 came upon us because the tariff was reduced through the fall in the premium on gold, I would like to ask him why the Republican party in 1883 reduced that tariff still further?

Mr. WALKER. That was ten years afterward, was it not?

Mr. COCKRAN. Are you willing to admit, then, that in the progress of events a tariff should be reduced in amount?

Mr. WALKER. A tariff is a purely business arrangement, that may need altering as any other business arrangement may need altering, and the Republicans reduced the tariff in 1883 to reduce the revenue, as they did again in 1890 to reduce the revenue. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COCKRAN. Now, I can take leave of the subject on that statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts. He declares that in 1890 the tariff was reduced by the passage of the McKinley tariff act. If that statement comports with the sense of this House, then the gentleman has made a valuable contribution to the discussion. The fact of the matter is, however, that law made an actual increase in the tariff rates. It operated to remove this country still further from that reduction of duties which the gentleman from Massachusetts now declares should be a result of the continuance of the tariff system. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, the bill and amendment as I understand it are for the purpose of letting in machinery and things that go into the construction of machinery, and also things that go into the construction of ships. What for? Presumably for the purpose of cheapening the cost of producing ships. The gentlemen on the Republican side are always making their argument from the standpoint that they want to protect the American laborer and to protect the American farmer. The American farmer and agriculturist, as I have had occasion to suggest before, are nearly one-half of the population of this country. A large part of the products of the farmer must seek a market in foreign countries. Anything that tends to cheapen the means of transportation tends to increase the profits upon agricultural products.

Mr. Chairman, for what have we spent millions of dollars in the opening up of the waterways of this country through the lakes and rivers if we can not avail ourselves of cheap transportation by securing the building of cheap ships in this country? What avail is it, Mr. Chairman, if we are going to put up a tariff that shuts us off from building up a commercial marine to reap the advantages of all of those waterways that lead to the sea? Under your protective tariff system we have destroyed our merchant marine and given a hundred millions of dollars every year to foreign ships that carry our commerce.

We can build ships and navigate them more cheaply than any other nation in the world.

It surprises me that the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Maine, who are always posing as friends of labor, should oppose this righteous reduction in the cost of building ships. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, these people are not friends of labor. To prove this I want to have read a letter written by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, showing that he is not the friend of labor, showing besides that he does not understand the principles of this Government, and showing further that he has forgotten a lesson that was taught by his forefathers and the battle that was fought for the right of petition by the people of this country. I ask to have this letter read by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, January 12, 1894.

GENTLEMEN: I have received the resolutions beginning, "Resolved, That we, the Central Labor Union of Worcester, Mass., etc., heartily indorse the Wilson bill, although only a modicum of the relief demanded."

Allow me to say to you that I shall not present these resolutions to Congress, because I do not believe that they express the opinions of a majority of the members of the Central Labor Union of Worcester.

I do not believe a majority of members of the union are in such besotted ignorance of economic law and present economic conditions, or what has brought idleness, hunger, and suffering to a very large proportion of the working people of Worcester and the country, and, I fear, in too many cases will bring death to your fellows or members of your families, as to deliberately adopt such resolutions, fully understanding their significance.

I believe if the majority of the members of the Central Labor Union have deliberately adopted the resolutions you sent me, that they were imposed upon and deceived by mercenary and unprincipled emissaries.

In behalf of the wage-workers, who form a very large majority of the people who elected me to the Fifty-third Congress, I repudiate and denounce this action as traitorous to their cause.

Regretting your want of intelligence. If you honestly believe the interests of workingmen will be advanced by the adoption of the Wilson bill, I am proud to be the servant of every intelligent and honest workingman in the Third Congressional district of Massachusetts.

Very truly, yours,

J. H. WALKER.

To Mr. MICHAEL O'DEA, President,
Mr. DONALD SMITH, Secretary,
Central Labor Union, Worcester, Mass.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, if there is any evidence in that letter, or anything that goes to prove that the workingmen of that city and State did not understand what they wanted, I think if there is any evidence of their ignorance or misunderstanding of who should properly represent them, it has been clearly proved while we have been listening to the explanation of economic laws delivered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER]. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] has expired.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] whether he believes that all trade should be free?

Mr. SIMPSON. The gentleman asks a very proper question, whether I believe that all trade should be free. I certainly do believe that all trade should be free. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Well, then, I would like to ask the gentleman why, in his own town of Medicine Lodge, the city has by ordinance provided that peddlers shall pay a license of $3 per day for trading in that city? The mayor of the city has sent me this dispatch:

We have a city ordinance providing that peddlers pay a license of $3 per day for trading in our city. Ordinance is popular.

Now, why is it that the people of his town believe in having their home market for themselves, rather than giving it free to the traveling peddlers who come there? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SIMPSON. The only way I can explain that to the gentleman is, that that town gives a Republican majority at every election. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see to what this principle of protection will lead us if carried to its logical conclusion. In olden times in England they had a large tax upon window glass, and it was said then, "If you abolish this tax upon window glass and enable the people to have cheap window glass so as to admit the sunlight of heaven, you will destroy the industry of making tallow candles, and thereby drive a large part of the community out of business and deprive them of that means of making a living." [Laughter.] That is the doctrine of protection carried to its last conclusion.

Now, I speak in favor of this bill, and in favor of this particular amendment, because I believe that a large portion of the community will be benefited by admitting free of tax or duty the materials which go into the construction of ships, thereby cheapening the means of transportation to carry the goods that labor produces to foreign countries and to different parts of our own country, and that thereby a large part of the community will be benefited.

I do not take that narrow view of the question which is taken by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] whereby he would benefit the few who produce these articles.

I am looking out for the interests of the consumer; and if I had my way and my vote would bring it about I would extend this not alone to the ships that sail upon the ocean between our country and foreign countries, but I would extend it to every ship in the coastwise trade and every ship that sails upon our inland seas, so as to cheapen the means of communication and transportation on every waterway in the United States. Why, we have in our coastwise and in our inland trade, I suppose, one hundred vessels to every one we will have upon the ocean trading with foreign countries, and larger benefits would come by extending this measure so as to reach not alone the ocean-going steamers on the Atlantic and Pacific, but those that sail on the lakes and rivers and in the coastwise trade of this country.

That is all I wish to say, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. TARSNEY. Mr. Chairman, in consideration of the fact that time is passing, and the time allotted for the consideration of this entire measure is so short, in consideration of the fact that there are more important matters to discuss than the pending amendment, I now ask unanimous consent that a vote be taken upon the pending amendment to the present paragraph.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Let us have a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will first be taken upon the amendment to the amendment. The Clerk will again report the amendment, and then the proposed amendment to the amendment.

The amendment and the amendment to the amendment were again read.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, this simply limits the amendment to the materials for the construction of marine engines, whereas the other amendments admit the completed marine engines and the machinery.

Mr. TARSNEY. That is right.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, on page 46, line 23, Schedule K, relating to wool, an amendment to incorporate in this bill the existing law as to wool. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

375. All wools, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals shall be divided for the purpose of fixing the duties to be charged thereon into the three following classes:

376. Class one, that is to say, Merino, mestiza, metz, or metis wools, or other wools of Merino blood, immediate or remote, Down clothing wools, and wools of like character with any of the preceding, including such as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Buenos Ayres, New Zealand, Australia, Cape of Good Hope, Russia, Great Britain, Canada, and elsewhere, and also including all wools not hereinafter described or designated in classes two and three.

377. Class two, that is to say, Leicester, Cotswold, Lincolnshire, Down combing wools, Canada long wools, or other like combing wools of English blood, and usually known by the terms herein used, and also hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals.

378. Class three, that is to say, Donskoi, native South American, Cordova, Valparaiso, native Smyrna, Russian camels hair, and including all such wools of like character as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Turkey, Greece, Egypt, Syria, and elsewhere, excepting improved wools hereinafter provided for.

379. The standard samples of all wools which are now or may be hereafter deposited in the principal custom-houses of the United States, under the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be the standards for the classification of wools under this act, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall have the authority to renew these standards and to make such additions to them from time to time as may be required, and he shall cause to be deposited like standards in other custom-houses of the United States when they may be needed.

380. Whenever wools of class three shall have been improved by the admixture of Merino or English blood from their present character as represented by the standard samples now or hereafter to be deposited in the principal custom-houses of the United States, such improved wools shall be classified for duty either as class one or as class two, as the case may be.

381. The duty on wools of the first class which shall be imported washed shall be twice the amount of the duty to which they would be subjected if imported unwashed; and the duty on wools of the first and second classes which shall be imported scoured shall be three times the duty to which they would be subjected if imported unwashed.

382. Unwashed wools shall be considered such as shall have been shorn from the sheep without any cleansing; that is, in their natural condition. Washed wools shall be considered such as have been washed with water on the sheep's back. Wool washed in any other manner than on the sheep's back shall be considered as scoured wool.

383. The duty upon wool of the sheep or hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals which shall be imported in any other than ordinary condition, or which shall be changed in its character or condition for the purpose of evading the duty, or which shall be reduced in value by the admixture of dirt or any other foreign substance, or which has been sorted or increased in value by the rejection of any part of the original fleece, shall be twice the duty to which it would be otherwise subject: Provided, That skirted wools as now imported are hereby excepted. Wools on which a duty is assessed amounting to three times more than that which would be assessed if said wool was imported unwashed, such duty shall not be doubled on account of its being sorted. If any bale or package of wool or hair specified in this act imported as of any specified class, or claimed by the importer to be dutiable as of any specified class shall contain any wool or hair subject to a higher rate of duty than the class so specified, the whole bale or package shall be subject to the highest rate of duty chargeable on wool of the class subject to such higher rate of duty, and if any bale or package be claimed by the importer to be shoddy, mungo, flocks, wool, hair, or other material of any class specified in this act, and such bale contain any admixture of any one or more of said materials, or of any other material, the whole bale or package shall be subject to duty at the highest rate imposed upon any article in said bale or package.

384. The duty upon all wools and hair of the first class shall be 11 cents per pound (48.86 to 66.96 per cent), and upon all wools or hair of the second class 12 cents per pound (43.60 to 91.68 per cent).

385. On wools of the third class and on camel's hair of the third class the value whereof shall be 13 cents or less per pound, including charges, the duty shall be 32 per cent ad valorem (32 to 64 per cent).

386. On wools of the third class, and on camel's hair of the third class, the value whereof shall exceed 13 cents per pound, including charges, the duty shall be 50 per cent ad valorem (50 to 100 per cent).

387. Wools on the skin shall pay the same rate as other wools, the quantity and value to be ascertained under such rules as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered brings before the committee in distinct shape the question of free or protected wool. The proposition I have offered is to embody in this bill existing law in regard to wool. The committee have offered in their bill to put wool on the free list. I desire to say that that proposition has been incorporated in the committee's bill, not in obedience to any public demand, but in the face of general and almost universal protest.

Mr. Chairman, I will wait until gentlemen will yield the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appeals to gentlemen to cease conversation, or retire to the cloak room. Gentlemen in the aisles will cease conversation.

Mr. BURROWS. I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that the proposition for free wool incorporated in this bill by the committee has not been asked for by any petition from any source except the one I hold in my hand, while it has been protested against almost universally. The only petition presented to the Committee on Ways and Means in favor of free wool from any portion of the United States is the petition of the Thurman Club of Columbus, Ohio, signed by the president and secretary of the club. I will not stop——

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen in front of the Chair, on the right, will please restore order.

Mr. BURROWS. I will not stop to read the resolutions adopted by this club, except in the first resolve they ask for "free wool, free coal, and free sugar." They must have forgotten, for the moment, we have free sugar now. But that is the only petition addressed to the Ways and Means Committee demanding free wool. I have before me a petition or remonstrance, or rather remonstrances, against putting wool on the free list; and I do not at this time, possibly not at any time, propose to enter into any discussion of the question, but I desire to have the Clerk read the petition and remonstrance, without reading the names, of 376 citizens of the State of Texas, presented by Mr. ABBOTT of Texas, in opposition to free wool, coming from his State, where they have over 4,000,000 head of sheep and the largest sheep-growing country in the United States. Although gentleman on the other side will not listen to debate, I trust they will hear the voice of their constituents. I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To Hon. Jo Abbott,
Congressman, Sixth Congressional District, State of Texas:

We, the undersigned voters, respectfully request that you use your utmost influence to prevent a reduction of tariff on wool, for the following reasons:

First. That Texas alone owns about 4,000,000 sheep, or about one-tenth of all the sheep of the United States. Of this Bosque County alone owns about 82,000 head, bringing into our country every year a revenue from sales of wool and mutton about $140,000,000, which is expended at home for feed, herding, shearing, salt, shedding, lease of lands, etc.

Second. There is a vast amount of rough lands in this State now being utilized by the sheep industry, paying a good revenue, as the lands thus used increase their taxable value, which otherwise would be comparatively useless.

Third. That the agitation of a reduction on the tariff of wools, heretofore and now, has caused this product to drop from 18 cents and 20 cents to 6 cents and 8 cents per pound, in fact no sale at all, and the value of sheep in proportion.

Fourth. Taking into consideration the great number of men who are engaged directly and indirectly in this industry, and the vast amount expended annually among all classes of people, we think sufficient for setting forth the above reasons, as the herewith appended signatures of all classes will show.

We sign this regardless of party affiliations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask the indulgence of the committee for a few minutes.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask the Clerk to read a remonstrance from the State of Indiana, signed by a large number of her citizens.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable members of the Fifty-third Congress of the United States:

Whereas as the result of a general belief that the tariff on woolen goods will be reduced and wool put on the free list, the price of wool is now below the cost of production; and

Whereas we believe that if wool is put on the free list and the tariff on woolen goods materially reduced, the price of wool will be still lower; and

Whereas we can not afford to raise wool in competition with free wool raised in other countries like Australia, where the wool-grower rents land from the government at a less rental than we pay in taxes on our land, and receives government aid and encouragement; and

Whereas the lands of these United States are well suited to the raising of sheep, provided that we can get a fair price for our wool and mutton; and

Whereas we believe it is to the best interest of this country to prevent the slaughter of a large proportion of the sheep of this country, which will be the certain result of a further reduction in the price of wool:

We the undersigned farmers and wool-growers, irrespective of party, do hereby petition and beg that your honorable body will make no change in the present tariff affecting the wool and woolen schedule now in force.

Mr. BURROWS. I also hold in my hand several remonstrances from the State of Oregon. I desire to have read also a remonstrance which I presented a few days ago signed by 1,100 citizens of the State of Texas, protesting against free wool, and I trust gentlemen on the other side will listen to it.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that the reading of these different remonstrances may as well be omitted, as they all seem to be in the same form.

Mr. BURROWS. This one is not in the same form. Let the remonstrance be read, Mr. Chairman.

The remonstrance was read, as follows:

To the honorable members of the Fifty-third Congress of the United States:

We, your petitioners, wool-growers, merchants, and business men of West Texas, regardless of party, would respectfully represent as follows:

As a result of the general belief that wool will be put upon the free list, its price has fallen within the last twelve months from 15 cents to 6 cents per pound, and the value of our sheep from $2.50 to $1 per head.

Under a free schedule, foreign wools of a character competing with those grown in this section could be laid down in Boston to-day for 30 cents per scoured pound.

Allowing 70 per cent for shrinkage, our wools in same market would be worth 9 cents per pound in the grease, and deducting freight, scouring, and marketing charges, will leave to the grower a net value of 5 cents per pound, at least 5 cents a pound below the cost of the most economical production.

It is our belief that if wool is placed upon the free list there will be no material advance in the values above submitted.

Wool-growing is the prominent industry of West Texas, and the continuance of the present range of values for our main product, which may be fairly looked for under free wool, will bring ruin to the sheep industry in Texas and widespread loss and disaster to the mercantile and other interests dependent upon its prosperity.

There are two hundred thousand persons in West Texas alone almost directly dependent upon the wool interests.

With free wool one hundred thousand of them will be obliged to seek a living and occupation elsewhere.

In view of these facts, we your petitioners, beg that your honorable body make no material changes in the wool schedule now in force.

[Eleven hundred signers.]

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, as I said in the beginning, I have no desire to debate this question, because I know that anything we might say on this side will be of no service to influence the vote on this question, but I thought that gentlemen on the other side would perhaps be glad to hear from their own constituents, and therefore I have presented these large petitions from the State of Texas, from the people that gentlemen are sent here to represent, protesting against free wool. The majority of this House propose, very properly perhaps, urging the admission of New Mexico as a State into the Union. But they couple with that now, in this proposition, the destruction of her chief industry, and it may be a question whether she will appreciate their efforts to bring her into the Union as a State with her industries destroyed.

I ask the Clerk now to read a letter from a former member of this House, a delegate from the Territory of New Mexico, as to the effect that free wool will have upon the industries of that Territory.

Mr. SPRINGER. A Republican delegate?

Mr. BURROWS. I do not know, and I do not care whether he was a Republican or a Democrat. I ask that this letter be read.

The letter was read, as follows:

WAGON MOUND, N. MEX., December 10, 1893.

SIR: Knowing that you are a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and that your committee has now under consideration the McKinley bill, with a view of reducing the tariff on foreign wools under the free-tariff doctrine; and I being a wool-grower, for the last forty years a citizen of this great country, which offers protection to its citizens when asked for; I now, as such citizen and wool-grower, ask that our native wools be protected, and that the McKinley bill be left to stand such as it was originally, for the following reasons:

1. That already, with the present agitation of free wools, this section of the country has placed the sheep-growers in a state of bankruptcy.

2. That we can not grow and sell our wools here as cheap as foreign wools when they are almost as good, because our labor is 50 per cent higher, and our freights to Eastern markets are 300 per cent higher than those on foreign wools are, when the distance of transportation of ours is not half as far as the transportation of foreign wools.

3. Our wools here only netted us 10½ cents per pound this year, on account of the free-trade agitation, against 21 cents per pound last year, under the firmness of protective tariff supported by the McKinley bill.

4. If our wools are placed on the free lists to compete with foreign wools, our wools will be worth on our farms, after paying all expenses, from 3 to 5 cents per pound, and that will compell every sheep-raiser to give up the wool industry, and that will cause our country in a very few years to even have our mutton shipped to us from foreign countries; and that, of course, would be a very nice protection to our citizens and country.

5. It has been stated that wool growing east of the Mississippi on high-priced lands under free wool might cease to be an industry; but that in the Rocky Mountain region the industry would thrive under free wool.

In the Rocky Mountain region as well as east of the Mississippi the wool will cease to be an industry under free wool, because our Rocky Mountain lands are every day being taken up for agricultural purposes and the sheep range is thereby being limited, so that in a short time on account of the rise in price of lands the wool will cease to be an industry under free wool in the Rocky Mountain region as well as east of the Mississippi.

6. Sheep of all kinds have this fall been shipped to the Eastern markets to be slaughtered by the millions, irrespective of quality, caused by the agitation of free wool and the great decline in the price of wool this year. Raisers refused last year for their one and two year old wethers from $1.75 to $2.75 per head, respectively, on account of the good price that their wools were bringing them under protective tariff. To-day the same sheep are being sold by the millions from 75 cents to $1.50 per head. This great decline has been caused by the free-wool agitation, placing thereby all the sheep-raisers almost in a state of bankruptcy, because to sell their wools this year at from 7 to 9 cents per pound and their wethers at from 75 cents to $1.50 per head against 17 to 22 cents per pound for wool and from $1.75 to $2.75 per head for sheep last year, they could not this year meet their obligations with their banks and merchants which they had incurred in anticipation of their getting last year's prices for their wools and under protective tariff. I can safely say that the scare is such that in the Rocky Mountain region one-half of the sheep have been shipped to the Eastern markets so that they be slaughtered, fearing that wools will be placed in the free list.

7. Under the Constitution of the United States of America, being the most sacred document which we own and of which we are so proud, being that it surpasses those of all other nations under the sun, its citizens are offered protection in all their branches of industry, and for that one reason alone those representing our nation in the national Halls should see that their citizens and their industries be protected as promised by our Constitution and not let a few of those which are more pledged to money by means of aiding foreign industries thereby enriching themselves and working against the interest of the American people in general and against our Constitution in particular. While I think unwise parting from the wool industry entirely until the present free-wool tariff fight is over, still there are hundreds of small wool-raisers that are leaving the wool industry drop entirely by selling their sheep in order to pay up for what they bought and the expenses they incurred at the beginning of the present year in anticipation of their getting last year's prices for their wool and sheep.

8. Wool can not thrive in this country without protection, in order to compete with Australian and other foreign wools, because the cost of keeping our sheep in this country is twice as much as the cost of keeping them in Australia. There the government fences their lands, sinks their wells, and leases them to sheep-growers for less money than what we have to pay for taxes alone in this country on our sheep. I find already that in freight rates alone from the Rocky Mountain region to our Eastern markets our rate is from 2½ to 3 cents per pound, against one-fourth of a cent per pound from London to our same Eastern markets. That alone I consider a great injustice against the wool-grower of the United States.

9. Should the McKinley duty of 11 cents per pound be taken off of foreign wools and with the reduced freight which they now have in their favor, they could well afford to sell their wools in our own Eastern markets say at 10 cents per pound, and at that price it would leave them a fair margin. While if our native wools should bring the same amount per pound after paying all expenses it would almost starve the raiser, and force him to step out of the industry; because at such prices per pound we can not possibly raise our sheep and make it a self-sustaining business. It costs us from 10 to 15 cents per head to take care of our sheep in this country without the 10 to 15 per cent loss of sheep per year, and the enormous tax rates which are imposed upon all the taxpayers in this country.

10. In 1892, and up to the time of the present movement of the free wool agitation, we did not have to go outside of our Territory to find buyers for our sheep, but there were more buyers than sellers here, and paying us the prices stated to you before; now we have to ship them East to be sold for almost nothing because there are no buyers here; they have all been scared away on account of the free wool agitation. No buyer seems to have confidence in the coming Congress, and fear that the foreign wools will be placed on the free lists, therefore are anxiously waiting the action of the coming Congress before investing in sheep or wool, thereby retarding the industry.

11. The future prospect of free wool has caused one-third of our wool-growers to go into bankruptcy, who were previously solvent, and prosperous and solvent, and perhaps force as many more before the end of the present year is out, all caused by the free-wool agitation, thereby causing thousands of men to be thrown out of employment and perhaps compel them to become common beggars.

12. Sheep heretofore have been paying the running expenses to their investors; this year they have fallen way behind of their doing so, even going as far as to place raisers to be compelled by their creditors to sacrifice their sheep in order to pay up their debts, because the wool industry this year did not bring the usual prices but instead brought only one-third.

The present Administration, in my opinion, seems to be inclined to protect foreign industries in our country in order to demoralize ours and compel our citizens, instead of protecting them, to compel them to leave for a foreign one as the last resort to save themselves from starvation.

Hoping, sir, that my few opinions from experience will be of some service to you, knowing that you are in favor of protecting home industries, and wishing you success in the present free-wool fight, I remain, sir,

Very respectfully,

TRINIDAD ROMERO,
Ex-Member to Congress from New Mexico, and late United States Marshal, New Mexico.

Hon. J. C. BURROWS,
Member of Ways and Means Committee, Washington, D. C.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask indulgence to present one other remonstrance which is not long.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURROWS. I have a large number of remonstrances from New Mexico, and the sentiment of the people there, so far as I have been able to ascertain it from letters and from other communications, is almost universally against putting wool on the free list.

This may suggest to gentlemen on the other side that by admitting New Mexico as a State they will gain no political advantage if they are going to destroy one of her chief industries.

I also hold in my hand a remonstrance from the Territory of Utah. You propose to admit her into the Union, but before that act is consummated, you propose to destroy one of her great industries, and that may affect the political character of that would-be State. I ask to have the remonstrance read.

The remonstrance was read, as follows:

The woolen industry in this Territory prior to 1893, was in a prosperous condition, and the growers were doing fairly well. The effect of the free-wool agitation for the last six months or more has been demoralizing to the sheep-raiser and our Territory.

There are many reasons why wool can not be produced as cheaply in this section as in foreign countries. We pay for herders from $35 to $50 per month, shearing costs from 4 to 7 cents per head, transportation by rail is from seven to nine times higher than by water, which the other wool-producing countries enjoy, and the average annual loss to our flocks, caused by rigid winters and wild animals, reaches at least 10 per cent. The average yearly cost of running 2,500 sheep, the usual number in a flock, is about as follows:

To 2 herders, at $35 per month each	$840.00
To board for same, $15 per month	180.00
To shearing, at 4 to 7 cents, say 5 cents	125.00
To sacks and twine and sacking wool	32.20
To dipping, twice a year, 5 cents per head	125.00
To taxes, $2 per head assessed valuation	50.00
To five horses	175.00
To camp equipment	150.00
To 2 tons oats, winter feed, and freighting, same	60.00
To loss by wild animals and poverty, 10 per cent, 250 sheep, at $2 per head	500.00
Total	2,237.20

CREDITS.

By wool off 2,250 sheep, 6 pounds per head—13,500 pounds at 8 cents per pound (present price for best wools)	$1,080.00
By increase 35 per cent or 787 lambs, probably worth $1 per head	787.00
		1,867.00
Loss due to anticipated Democratic legislation, not counting owner's time or interest on capital invested		370.20

Wools netted us 60 per cent less this year than any previous year.

If wool is placed on the free list, and prices fall to present London prices, or free-trade level, our wools would bring us, on the farm, from 3 to 6 cents per pound.

If wool is admitted free of duty it will not be possible for the industry to exist in this Rocky Mountain region. The prospect has demoralized business to such an extent that in many cases growers are bankrupt.

Thousands of sheep have gone to the markets to be slaughtered because of the low price of wool. Growers were compelled to part with part of their flocks in order to meet obligations, the price obtained for wool this season not being ample to pay running expenses.

It will be utterly impossible for us to compete with the foreign wool producer, if the tariff is removed, for the reason that in Australia sheep graze out all the year, the pasture is better there in winter than in summer, the government fences the lands, sinks the wells, and leases the lands in large tracts for less money than we pay in taxes alone.

If the present McKinley duty is removed, wool-raising in the Rockies will go "Democratic."

According to good authority, the scoured cost of wool in the average suit of clothes would be about 75 cents cheaper under free trade than protection. It is plain that this small reduction would not nearly offset the 11 cents per pound reduction on wool, therefore the object of cheapening clothing for the masses by removing the tariff on wool would be defeated, and this great source of labor and revenue destroyed.

The average price of sheep in 1892 was $2.75—this year $1.25—caused by low price of wool.

The demand for sheep last year was good and more than the supply. The reason for this change—the Chicago Democratic platform.

There has been a material reduction, during the season, in the number of sheep, spring losses were extra heavy, and thousands have been marketed in Omaha, Kansas City, and Chicago.

The free-wool prospect has virtually bankrupted 75 per cent of the growers in these parts, and a large proportion of the business houses are much affected through the inability of the sheep men to meet their obligations.

Wool has paid the running expenses heretofore and has failed for the first time this year. Flocks have had to be reduced to satisfy creditors.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I thought I would not trespass further upon the committee, but, if they will indulge me, I will ask to have read a communication from the State of Nevada, in which the matter is presented so clearly that I am sure gentlemen on the other side will be interested in hearing it read.

Mr. SPRINGER. There need be no objection to printing the names signed to that petition, as it would be easy to print the names of the whole population of Nevada. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURROWS. Whatever criticism the gentleman from Illinois desires to make upon the people of Nevada of course lies with him. I have nothing to say about it.

Mr. CRAIN. Is the gentleman from Michigan going to have the names of those Texans who signed that memorial from Texas published in the RECORD?

Mr. BURROWS. I did not ask it, but I should be very happy to have it done if the gentleman from Texas will make the request.

Mr. CRAIN. I do.

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] asks that the 1,100 names signed to one of these remonstrances from Texas, and also the 275 names signed to the remonstrance sent to the Hon. Mr. ABBOTT, be printed in the RECORD. I trust there will be no objection.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. I feel constrained to object, Mr. Chairman. This is unusual, and it is not proper to encumber the RECORD in this way.

Mr. BURROWS. There is no objection on this side to printing the names of these distinguished Texans.

Mr. CRAIN. I want to see how many of them are really engaged in the sheep-raising business.

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman can examine the petition itself and ascertain that fact.

The remonstrance was read, as follows:

RENO, NEV., November 30, 1893.

DEAR SIR: If it is ever true that a protective tariff is useful in the building up of infant industries it is true to-day of the wool business of this poor State.

Nevada's chief industry has been mining, with the cattle product second in importance, but the growth of the sheep business has brought it forward so rapidly that it must soon be second and perhaps first, if the conditions which have obtained heretofore could be depended upon. The country is well adapted to the health and security of the animal, at least as well as to anything, and the conditions are conducive to excellence in quality of both wool and mutton, so that under the fostering hand of an intelligent and kindly policy this gentle and useful friend of the human family has multiplied in this distant region so recently given over as being unfit for anything but the wild beast and savage hunter, filling the mountains with herds and building up villages, or adding to the prosperity of those already built, and contributing to the forces that were supporting American civilization in this corner of the Union.

This state of affairs continued until the election of 1892 aroused the fear that the tariff was to be reduced or removed, resulting in a slump in prices of both the animal and its products, which has wiped out the accumulations of years and left the flock-owner with what he had outside of his bands, either in property or debts. There is simply no profit left in the business, and that renders the capital invested virtually dead, there being no sale for stock sheep and less than usual for mutton.

Our last year's markets were such as to give us a living show by good management and ordinary luck in weather and crops to make a reasonable profit. Mutton was worth from 7 to 9 cents per pound, and there was a demand for all that was right and prime. In October, 1892, we could get in San Francisco for our unscoured wool from 15 to 17 cents per pound, and fall wool brought us 12½ cents. Soon after there was a drop of 5 cents in two weeks on wool and almost no sale, while the fall wool can not now be sold for more than from 2 to 4 cents there. Mutton has now clogged the market at from 4 to 5 cents, and every one would sell if there was a buyer.

We simply can not compete in these mountain regions with the grower of the Southern Hemisphere, and I doubt if we can undersell those of Ohio or New England. The vast territory open in the south temperate zone lies at a lower altitude and is not subject to the fierce storms, to the intense cold and sudden changes that threaten us here and necessitate costly provision in the way of food and attendance. Their land is not worth a tenth as much, taxes are lower and wages greatly below ours; supplies can be laid down for less than half, while not one-quarter the quantity is required for men and horses to look after the stock. Where fences are built for the ranges by the Government or the landowner, there is little need of herders. We require one for every two thousand sheep, and one man additional with two horses must always be in attendance to carry provisions, salt, medicine, clothing, etc., and to move camp when it is necessary to find fresh pasture, which in this kind of feeding ground is an average of more than once a week all the year around. These men cost for wages an average of $40 per month and found. It costs us 7½ cents per head to shear, making 15 cents a year, as the climate makes it necessary to clip twice a year.

We are forced to rent feeding ground from the railroad company or other landowners at an average cost of 10 cents per head per year. We run in the Sierra Nevada mountains or in the high ranges in the center and eastern portions of the State in summer and on lower ground in winter, reaching by means of moisture provided by the first snowfall feed which we can not reach in summer on account of the lack of water for our animals to drink. The lands are unfenced and can not be as it is an untimbered country. We are taxed heavily to support the governments of the State and counties and in some places we have to pay a 5-cent license per head. This is imposed under the plea that sheep destroy the roads and we have to pay it. We are safe in saying that it costs an average of $1.25 per head to run sheep in Nevada and Eastern California. The men who have spent less on their stock have lost money by their frugality and are broke to-day. Sheep must never be allowed to get poor here as a change in weather may catch them any day which will cause a heavy mortality and at the same time ruin the hopes of marketing what survive.

The wool fiber is also injured whenever the sheep lose health or strength. The only way to succeed in this mountainous district is to pay great attention to the health, nourishment, and general care of the animals. They require salt regularly and doctoring carefully and frequently, close watching to protect them from wild beasts, and the greatest judgment in driving to prevent their piling up in close places or breaking over dangerous ground in case of panic. No other breeding ground in this or any other country has such losses in increase as we do. It is impossible to calculate upon any certain kind of weather at any certain time of year. We range at an altitude running from 4,500 to 11,000 feet, and be as careful as we may, the lambs are as likely to drop on a bleak, raw, windy day as on a warm one. The loss in such a case can not be foretold, but it exceeds any our brethren with warm sheds, comfortable stacks, or lower altitudes ever experience.

With free wool we could not have 1 cent profit per fleece. We ship 70 pounds of dirt with every 30 pounds of wool, and if we could figure on getting 30 cents per pound in New York for scoured wool it would leave us 13 cents per head for running our sheep. That is, if we could bring each sheep to the shearing pen for 13 cents it would cost us 17 cents per pound to get our wool clipped, washed, and freighted to New York. You can easily see that we would lose heavily under such figures. If 30 cents is to be the free-trade figure there is no hope for sheep-raising, at least in Nevada.

The theory that with free wool only the long staple now imported to mix with our common wool would come, and that it could be handled so cheaply that the demand for our wool to mix with it would compensate us for the loss in price or prevent any such loss, is infantile. The man who can raise long, fine wool can raise short, cheap wool still more cheaply, and if he could send it to America without duty he could afford to throw his mutton to the dogs or feed it to the hogs and then knock us out, with our high wages, our costly pastures, and our high rates of freight. I guess a man who can paint a good picture can paint as poor a one as anybody, and it is so with sheep-raising. Common sheep and common wool will grow wherever the finer breeds can be raised, and the only reason the common wool has not come in is because of the tariff.

Nevada has sent to the shambles 35 per cent of her flocks, and would have sent twice as many if the markets within her reach had not been loaded.

We can expect an average of, say, 6 pounds of wool per year per head, or, say, counting the first year light, a yield of 20 pounds in four years. The animal will cost 25 to care for, and if mutton is a good price, say 6 or 7 cents per pound, we could make a fair profit with unscoured wool at 15 cents per pound. Any less than that will leave us nothing for interest on our investments; nothing for our own time, risk, or personal experience; nothing but wages for the men, taxes, grocery bills, etc.

We pay the heaviest freight bills in the United States and perhaps in the world, considering the long distances. Shipping in the grease, we pay an average of $1.50 to San Francisco and $2 per 100 from there to New York. The wool carries 70 per cent dirt, and that runs our freight up to over 11 cents per pound as against a cent or half a cent in steam barges or clippers from the antipodes. You will see, therefore, that with the duty of 11 cents removed our business is ruined irretrievably and our occupation gone.

The pretense that the poor man would receive the benefit is on a line with the other humbuggery of the free traders. A hat will not weigh over a quarter of a pound and part of that is cotton. It costs from a dollar to five to the wearer. How much will he save if the duty on wool is removed and the raw material is put into the factory for 3 cents less? If the wool was given to the manufacturer the hat would not be sold for any less to one man in a hundred. The poor man's suit of clothes, generally half cotton, weighs from 3 to 7 or 8 pounds. Could the clothing man be found who would give him the benefit of a reduction in the tariff? Not in the Democratic party.

Half the value of every sheep in Nevada has been cut off by this agitation of the tariff. One year ago there was ready sale at $3 while now no one will buy at $1.50, and it is doubtful if they would at $1. As fast as the butcher is ready sheep are being forced upon him and this will continue until the poor man's mutton costs him more than he will save on his cheap suit of clothes. Then those of us who are here will resume our profits. When about one-tenth the sheep are here that formerly thrived those who own them can command a price for mutton that will make a profit whether they sell wool or not. We can not say that any wool-grower in Nevada has been bankrupted by the fall, for the reason that we have not gone into the market since the drop. We are just preparing to market this year's increase, or try to.

Indeed, the State of Nevada has come through the distress brought upon our formerly happy land by this fateful Administration without a man closing his doors or a bank asking for time on a single draft, but there is no prospect in store and the wool men will be forced to the wall by the prices at present ruling. It will not help us to advise us to hold. We can not do so any more than other business men can run at a loss. We simply can not live and we do not intend to try. We will be entirely closed out in two years from to-day if there is not a change for the better.

The wool clip, with the increase, has paid all expenses heretofore. This year nearly every man has been forced to encroach upon his standard stock to keep alive. He has generally owed some money rather than having a reserve laid up and had to sell to get means to run on.

The sheep industry is a regular step in State growth. It follows the cattle ranger who usually owns no land and does little if any farming. Our flocks require hay and shelter, which necessitates the ownership of land and leads to more systematic husbandry. The loss of the wool industry cuts off Nevada's hopes to some extent in this direction and tends to return her to the cowboy and the coyote. The increase in the sheep industry has been felt in every town in the State. The expenses were all local and benefited every branch of trade. All wages went to the nearest village, for the sheep-herder and shearer know of no use for money except to spend it, and it goes freely.

Nevada has suffered more than any State in the Union by the decline in silver, which nine out of ten men here believe to have been caused by hostile legislation. When Mr. Cleveland began his attacks upon it with the Warner letter it was worth about $1.11 per ounce, and he has never ceased in his efforts to reduce it until it has gone below any price ever known in the history of mankind, and the profits of mining have entirely ceased.

Similarly no State in the Union will suffer in proportion to population from Mr. Cleveland's persistent attacks upon wool. It will deprive her of an industry which was doing much to replace the loss occasioned by the depressed condition of mining and to lead men to an understanding of the capacities of the State in other directions. There is room here for many hundreds of bands of sheep, and there is a certain profit when intelligence and industry are combined. There are so few things possible in Nevada at present, and there are so many reasons for the uplifting of every weak sister in our Union, in order that our institutions may flourish and the genius of the Republic be maintained, that every true patriot must regret any act or accident which keeps us down, but there seems to be an animus in the Democratic breast which marks us for the slaughter at every opportunity.

This is Thanksgiving Day, the appointed time set apart by Mr. Cleveland as President for prayer for ourselves and for all our kind, for praise to the Giver of all good, for gentle thoughts for friend and foe alike, but I can assure you we feel anything but thankful to the President of this Republic either for his efforts or disposition toward us or our State.

Pardon the length of this letter and accept our thanks for the interest you manifest in our welfare.

With much respect, we remain,

Hon. J. C. BURROWS, Member of Congress.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BURROWS. I will not ask the further indulgence of the committee at this time. These are only a few of the protests which I might have read against free wool. I have in my desk protests from thirty-four States and Territories against putting wool on the free list; and from no State or Territory have we a petition that it be made free, except the petition presented to the Committee on Ways and Means, as I said before, in favor of free wool, from the Thurman Club of the State of Ohio.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I am moved to say a few words by reason of the fact that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has just had read a number of remonstrances against the passage of the Wilson bill, so far as it concerns the question of wool. One of those remonstrances appears to have come from the State of Indiana. I have information that Republican politicians in that State have been busily engaged in circulating these remonstrances amongst the farmers, urging them to sign the remonstrances with the view, if possible, of inducing this Congress to refuse to change the existing rates of duty upon raw wool and upon woolen manufactures.

If these remonstrances which have just been read mean anything, they are meant to impress upon this House the idea in the minds of the signers, that the laying of this tariff upon wool by the McKinley law makes better prices. If that be true, it is but a result of the system of education which our Republican friends entered upon with the farmers in 1888, in 1890, and again in 1892. If I am mistaken in my notion that the object of the gentleman from Michigan in having these remonstrances read was to make this fact appear I will be glad to be now corrected. [Pauses.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me strange, and it always did, that in every political campaign when the question of tariff is an issue, our high protection friends should go before the farmers and insist that the McKinley bill protected and benefited them. How? By placing a high tariff upon wheat in order that the farmer could get more for his wheat; by placing a high tariff on wool in order that he could get more for his wool; by placing a high tariff on barley and rye and all agricultural products in order that the farmer might get better prices for them. In that way the farmer has been asked to believe that he was receiving benefits from protection. Yet before the close of such an argument, in the face of that farmer audience, the Republican orator would tell them that laying a high tariff upon manufactured goods had had the effect, the necessary effect, of reducing the prices of the things that the farmer was to buy.

Now, what is the fact about this McKinley bill; and what did JOHN SHERMAN, Senator from the State of Ohio, who is thought to be an authority upon the question of a protective tariff, say when this very McKinley law was under discussion in 1890? I desire to have read from the Clerk's desk, as applying to this question of the wool tariff and its effect on the price of wool, what Mr. SHERMAN said on the 29th of August, 1890, as appears on page 10124 of the daily RECORD of the first session of the Fifty-first Congress. I do not introduce this for the purpose of indorsing it; I introduce it for the purpose of putting it in the RECORD alongside of the remonstrances which have just been read by the Clerk of this House.

Before the Clerk begins to read, let me call the attention of members of the Committee of the Whole to this fact: The question of the wool tariff was then under discussion; Mr. SHERMAN was upon his feet addressing the Senate in favor of the passage of the McKinley law; the question of the wool tariff of 1867—probably the highest tariff upon wool, if I am not misinformed, unless the McKinley law be an exception, that we have ever had in this country—came up; and the question was put to Mr. SHERMAN directly, as the Clerk will read, as to the effect of the tariff of 1867 upon the prices of wool as realized by the American farmer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. BURROWS. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will have such further time as he may desire.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. All I desire is time to have this extract read.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman will have five minutes additional.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the extract sent to the desk by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DANIEL. Before the Senator takes his seat, will he be kind enough to tell us what was the effect of the tariff of 1867 on the price of wool to the farmers?

Mr. SHERMAN. It varied more or less by the season, but I do not think there was any very radical change. If anything, there was a decline. My observation is, as a rule, that a rate of duty put upon any kind of production, whether a production of the farm or a production of the workshop, inevitably tends to lower the price. I have no doubt about that; but any duty whatever put upon any form of industry tends to encourage it and increase it either in its manufacture or production. Whatever may be the source of production or the mode of production, it naturally tends to lower the price; and that is what we desire. We on this side of the Chamber desire as much cheap food and cheap articles and cheap goods as anyone else.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. That is all I care to have read of the remarks of Mr. SHERMAN. I read those remarks about the time of their delivery in 1890; and they have never passed from my mind from that time to this; so that when the question came up in this Congress, I recollected the date of those remarks, and sent for that copy of the RECORD. I desire Senator SHERMAN'S language to go into the RECORD along with the remonstrances signed by these wool-growers and sent here asking us to perpetuate upon them a system which, if Mr. SHERMAN knew what he was speaking about, has had the very effect which they now profess to apprehend from the passage of this bill.

Mr. COFFEEN. Mr. Chairman, we have listened to a lengthy array of petitions and remonstrances from several States, introduction by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. My remarks yesterday upon this question have made sufficiently clear my own position. I shall, as I then stated, support most heartily the Wilson bill, as it is termed, whether we shall secure our amendments or not. Nevertheless, I stand now, as before, in favor of a reasonable and proportionate tariff for revenue purposes on the wool product and on all others.

The matter I shall now send to the Clerk's desk to have read in the first place is the form of a petition. There is a sort of stereotyped form, I have noticed in these petitions from wool-growers of these Western States. The first part of the article which will be read at my request, from the Carbon County Journal of Wyoming, embraces the points involved in almost all the petitions that have come to me from my State.

I may remark, before the reading begins, that we do not apprehend any danger to the welfare of our State, whether we shall secure the amendments which I favor or not; for our resources, as I remarked yesterday, are so varied that for the decrease of every hundred or thousand sheep that we may cease to raise on our grassy plains there will be raised other stock that will be remunerative. So that we do not feel that we are in any manner in danger; nor do we stand here as beggars on this question.

The reason I wish to put this alongside the remonstrances read at such great length for the gentleman from Michigan is that we may have in connection with the same literature, first the substance of the petitions coming from Wyoming signed, as I have found upon examination of those presented by me in this House, by between one and two hundred people and then the answer to the statements of the petitions given by our own people.

I ask the Clerk to read first the petition, and then the response to it.

The Clerk read as follows:

THAT WOOL-GROWERS' PETITION.

[Rawlins Journal.]

The wool-growers' petition, which has been circulated throughout the State for the purpose of obtaining signatures, and which is to be forwarded to Senator CAREY and Congressman COFFEEN, contains the following points, stripped of their useless verbiage:

First. Wool can not be grown in Wyoming as cheaply as in Australia and other foreign countries, without the aid of a protective tariff, because the Wyoming climate causes a heavy loss in sheep, amounting to 20 per cent, with a possible loss of 50 per cent annually, in addition to a severe loss in each year's crop of wool, while in Australia the mild climate makes the growers' loss there little or nothing.

Second. It costs the Wyoming wool-grower 2½ cents a pound to lay his wool in the dirt or grease (which we have to do on account of our water being all alkali) down in Boston or New York, while Australia, with water transportation, can place their wool in Boston at one-half this price.

Third. Wages and living in Wyoming are from 50 to 75 per cent higher than in Australia.

Fourth. Taxes are high in Wyoming.

Fifth. A year ago wool netted in Wyoming from 12 to 14 cents, and this year from 6 to 8 cents; and sheep sold a year ago from $3 to $4 per head, and this year only $2 to $2.25 per head.

Sixth. London prices will govern with wool on the free list, and competition with all foreign wool of the Wyoming grade must follow with foreign nations.

Seventh. The bankers refuse to loan money on sheep.

Eighth. The cost of producing wool here is greater than in foreign countries.

Ninth. The prospects of free wool have made it impossible to get an extension on paper falling due, and the wool-growers themselves, from loss of confidence by the bleak outlook, are being completely paralyzed and have shaken the confidence of the banker and merchant.

Mr. COFFEEN. Mr. Chairman, before the Clerk reads the answer I wish to call the attention of the committee especially to this, so that they may listen carefully as it embraces a response to the various points put in from the West. I want this given so that every one who does not fully understand the question may be enlightened as to the views and circumstances of the wool question from Wyoming, and what will be read now is the comment from the Wyoming Derrick, published in the center of the State, and copied from the Rawlins Journal, published in the southern part of the State, in the wool-growing region.

The Clerk read as follows:

Let us examine these statements in their order as to their truth or falsity. As to the first statement that, owing to the severe climate in Wyoming, wool can not be grown here as cheaply as in Australia. In Australia flock masters pay 25 cents per acre for their sheep runs. Here the range is free. There, from a scarcity of water, thousands of sheep die yearly, while here there is an abundance of water in summer and snow in winter, to supply every demand. The fact has not been disputed that in cold climates sheep will average a greater number of pounds of wool per head than in warm climates, as nature aids in the protection of its creatures by enabling them to harmonize with their environments. Wyoming sheep that produce from 8 to 13 pounds of wool per head, rather destroy the poetical idea that Wyoming growers, on account of the cold climate, can not compete with Australian flock masters.

As to an annual loss of 20 per cent per annum, with a possible loss of 50 per cent, the statement is too absurd to rebut. The average annual loss will not exceed 8 per cent, and as the lamb increase runs from 80 to 70 per cent, it is difficult to see where any annual loss comes in. The idea of 1,000 head out of every 5,000 head dying annually is preposterous on the face of it. Sheep-owners in Wyoming generally cull out (each fall) their old broken-mouthed ewes, and have good young sheep to go into the winter with, and their annual loss will not exceed 8 per cent.

As to the second statement, that the cost of transportation of Wyoming wool to Boston is 2½ cents per pound, and that the Australian's is only one-half that, owing to water carriage, the inference would be that the Australian grazed his flocks on the ocean's beach, and that all he had to do was shear, dump his wool as ballast in a sailing vessel, and head for London, and then to Boston, to pick up the fortune awaiting there. As a matter of fact, thousands of Australia's flocks are miles inland, and the cost of freight on wool to the ocean will equal nearly the cost of transportation from Wyoming to Boston.

In this second statement the claim is also made that Wyoming wool has to be shipped in the dirt or grease, "as the alkali water, which is all we have, is unfit for scouring purposes." Is the Platte River, Snake River, Big Horn River, and the immense streams tributary to them all alkali? What a false assertion! The reason the wool is shipped in the grease is simply because the railroad companies would charge as much freight for scoured wool as for wool in the grease, because the former occupies more space in their cars and because buyers would rather scour their own wool, as they want some of it scoured cleaner than the rest, it depending on the various uses for which it is intended.

Third. A San Francisco paper states "wages are as high in Australia as in California," and as California ranks third as a wool-producing State, we presume that but little difference exists between California and Wyoming wages.

Fourth. As to taxes. Taxes are high in Wyoming. We admit that. Four years of Republican rule have contributed materially to that condition, as there is hardly a county in the State that has not a bonded indebtedness. As to the amount of taxes paid by sheepmen, they do not begin to equal the amount paid by cattlemen. A Republican State board values the sheep, and the taxes are paid on sheep; not a cent is paid on the clipped wool, although nearly a million and a half pounds of wool were shipped from Carbon County alone in the past twelve months.

The fifth and sixth statements are in regard to the present low price of wool and sheep. With as much reason the petition could also have included the low prices of cattle, wheat, and horses. The author of the petition conveniently omits to mention that the McKinley bill is still in force, and that the shoddy mills are merrily grinding out 65 per cent of the woolen goods of the country, and that wool has steadily fallen in price since the McKinley bill was enacted. As to the price of $2 and $2.25 per head for sheep, there is not a flock master in the State that would sell his flock for either of those prices unless by extravagance or woeful mismanagement he was compelled to do so.

The seventh statement about London prices, and competing with foreign countries: This country can compete with foreign countries in very nearly all lines of manufacture. The world's markets will be opened to American wool manufacturers. A large export trade of woolens will create an increase in the demand and price of wools, and with a prohibition on shoddy, the sheep-growers would get better prices than ever for their fleeces.

The eighth statement about bankers refusing to loan money on sheep:

Very few of the Wyoming banks have been able to loan money on sheep or any other kind of property for the past six months, merely because they do not have the money to loan, but extremely rare are the cases where loans have not been renewed by the bankers to those actually needing them.

In the ninth statement the honest admission is made that the sheepmen themselves became paralyzed with fear, and that bankers and merchants lost confidence through the fear started by them.

This wonderful petition closed with prayer to save the business from destruction. When it is remembered that Wyoming does not produce a pound of wool of the grade which Australia exports, and which manufacturers need for their finer grades of goods, the political animus which inspires the petition can readily be perceived. It was drawn and circulated with no hopes of having the McKinley rates retained, but for the apparent purpose of raising a political issue upon which Republican wire-pullers and politicians could float into office. As a political scheme it will hardly succeed. Cattle-growers, horse-raisers, and small ranchmen are not particularly benefited by ranges eaten up and destroyed by the mouths and hoofs of thousands of sheep, and are naturally antagonistic to the industry.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan has been empowered by about 1,500 people in Texas to present two remonstrances against the proposed action of the Texas delegation in the House on the question of free wool. I believed at the time they were submitted to the House that the majority of the signers of these remonstrances were members of the Republican party, or Democrats who were indirectly connected with the business interests of the Republicans who were engaged in the sheep industry in the locality from which these remonstrances come.

Mr. PASCHAL represents San Angelo, from which one of them emanated. He sent a telegram of inquiry about it to a responsible gentleman in Texas, who has been recently honored with a high official position, and that gentleman responded that not more than 30 per cent of the signers of the petition were members of the Democratic party.

Since that time Mr. PASCHAL has received a letter from the mayor of San Angelo, who is also postmaster of the town, in which he states, speaking of the telegraphic inquiry made by Mr. PASCHAL:

The gentleman to whom you wired was speaking to me about the telegram which he received from you in reference to the signers of the petition sent to Mr. BURROWS. He told me about what he had written to you, and I fully concur in what he says: in fact, am more indignant at the claim than he was. I venture the assertion that there is not even a considerable minority of the Democrats here who signed the petition, and those did it from purely selfish and mercenary motives—the men who want all for themselves and are not very particular about the other fellow's protection. I feel sure that I voice the sentiment of the real Democrats of this section when I say that they are willing to abide by the action of the Texas delegation on the tariff, believing that they are in a better position to know what is best, and, knowing, will do it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I represented upon the floor of this House for eight years one of the largest wool-growing districts of the United States. For two years I have represented another district. But a very large number of my constituents are engaged in the wool-raising industry. I voted for free wool when I had the opportunity, and I shall vote again for free wool; and I voice the sentiments of my constituents in my old district as well as in my new district in so voting. About two years ago I made a speech in the city of Laredo, one of the principal wool markets of the State of Texas—the second or third, perhaps. A prominent wool-grower of the county of Webb, of which Laredo is the county seat, authorized me to say in the name of the sheep-raisers of that section, he owning and controlling about twenty-five thousand head of sheep, that they were in favor, with the exception of a few Republican protectionists, of free wool, and wanted me to vote for it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In 1884, when I made my first canvass as the nominee of the Democratic party to represent that district, stretching from the commercial town of Galveston to historic Fort Brown, near the mouth of the Rio Grande, and running up that river nearly 700 miles, I indorsed the proposition of free wool everywhere in the district. I had been nominated by acclamation and carried the wool-raising portion of the district by a large majority. My vote in the House of Representatives upon that question was repeatedly indorsed, and for the fifth time have I been nominated by acclamation by the Democratic party, with the Democratic wool-growers of the district represented in every convention, and sent here to represent their interests according to what I believe to be the best for their condition.

In 1884, when I first went upon the Rio Grande, where the people are mainly engaged in cattle and sheep raising, the price of wool was low. The price of sheep was correspondingly low; the price of cattle was up, and cattle which a few years ago had been selling upon the prairies of Texas for $6 a head as a maximum price, were commanding in the market $20 a head running wild upon the range, the cow with the calf following at her side. The cattle men were triumphant. Their faces were radiant with joy. The sheep men were correspondingly despondent.

Two years afterward I made another canvass, and conditions were reversed. Cattle had gone down in price lower than their original price; sheep and wool had risen in price, and yet the tariff had not been altered, but remained unchanged.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] has expired.

Mr. WISE. I ask unanimous consent that it may be extended five minutes.

Mr. CRAIN. As I have not addressed the House before upon any subject connected with this bill, I ask that I may be permitted to speak as long as the committee will permit me to do so without objection.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. CRAIN. I think ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] asks that he be allowed to proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I move that the gentleman have as much time as he wants.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman only asks for ten minutes.

Mr. CRAIN. I repeat, that while the price of wool, sheep, and cattle had decreased, the tariff had remained unchanged. Yet I heard the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] the other day, in his reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], state that the law of supply and demand had long since been exploded. That law having once existed, and being based upon immutable principles, will never be exploded. You might as well say that the laws of nature, which govern the planets of the solar system in their revolution in their orbits around the sun, will be exploded.

If potatoes are plentiful, potatoes are cheap. If potatoes are scarce, potatoes are dear. If a man wants to build a house and there are plenty of carpenters in the town who are out of employment, he certainly can have his house erected for a lower price than if carpenters were not so plentiful.

It seems to me that that statement was unworthy of the gentleman from Maine, and I call attention to it because I believe—and I so stated and state now—that so far as the district which I have the honor to represent is concerned, the tariff had nothing to do with the price of wool or the price of sheep.

In 1867 the policy of protection was inaugurated, so far as the woolen industry is concerned. The object of it, as avowed by its inaugurators and promoters, was to increase the price of wool for the sheep-growers throughout the United States; but at the same time these gentlemen, fearing the manufacturing industries of the country, and believing that the manufacturers would raise a hue and cry against them, gave them in the act of 1867 a specific or compensatory duty on foreign woolen goods that might be imported, so that their condition with relation to wool would remain unaltered.

But what about the consumers, the masses of the people of this country, including the operatives in the factories as well as all other people? They paid the tax on the foreign wool that was used by the manufacturers, and they also paid the enhanced price of the foreign cloth, a price enhanced by reason of the duty which was imposed. And where was their compensation, their compensatory duty? It was shown at the polls in 1892, when protection was denounced by these consumers, in the election of Grover Cleveland and the success of the Democratic party.

Now, what was the effect of the tariff of 1867? In 1867 there were 39,000,000 sheep in the United States. In 1875 the number had been reduced to 35,000,000. In 1891 there were about 43,500,000.

In 1867 the price of wool was 51 cents. In 1878 the price of wool was 40 cents, and to-day the price of similar wool is about 19 or 20 cents.

Under the act of 1883, by which the duty on raw wool was lessened by the Republican party, the duty was from 22 to 120 per cent. Under the law of 1890, called the McKinley act, it was 20½ to 160 per cent, or about 11 cents a pound. Last year woolen goods paid a tax of $34,293,666, the full value of the goods upon which this tax was paid being $35,792,905. The consumers of this country, therefore, paid a tariff of nearly 100 per cent upon the foreign-manufactured goods which they consumed. The same year the tax paid by manufacturers for raw material was about $8,000,000. They paid in taxes for raw wool which they imported about $8,000,000; and while the Government collected from the consumers nearly $35,000,000 in the shape of taxes on manufactured woolen importations, which were paid into the Treasury, the manufacturers, by reason of the protective rates of the McKinley act, also collected from them the $8,000,000 which they had paid on the raw wool used by them in their manufactories and which they were enabled to charge for their own productions above what would have been their selling price at a fair profit had they not been protected.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CRAIN. Certainly.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Is not the gentleman aware that it is a principle of taxation as urged by our Republican friends that the foreigner pays the tax; and does the gentleman think that the foreigner would pay a tax of $34,000,000 in order to sell $35,000,000 worth of goods?

Mr. CRAIN. I am not aware that it is a principle urged by our Republican friends; but I am aware that it is one of their stump declarations. [Laughter.] Everybody knows, or ought to know, that while the importer in the first instance has to pay the import duties at the ports of entry, those duties are added to the price of the imported goods when sold by him to the wholesaler and jobbers, that by them they are added to the price when sold to their customers in the country, and in turn are added by the retail dealers to the price which they ask of their customers; and who are those customers? They are the consumers of the country. I think the mere statement of the proposition thoroughly explodes the idea of our Republican friends that the foreigner pays the tax.

The proposition that a foreigner will sustain his own government and then come here and voluntarily support our Government by paying tariff taxes on the goods that he imports into our country is, it seems to me, preposterous.

When the Mills bill was under consideration in this House the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McKinley] produced a suit of clothes which he said was all wool, according to the guaranty of the seller, who was a merchant of Boston. I have the authority of woolen manufacturers on the floor of this House for the statement that that suit of clothes was not woolen in its composition and material, but that it was shoddy; and in my opinion the decadence of the woolen industry of this country is attributable to the tariff, which enables the shoddy manufacturers to produce a cheap article of clothing such as was exhibited by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] the other day as a tribute to American industry, and the overcoat which was shown by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON], rotten goods.

From 1860 to 1870 the capital employed in the production of shoddy goods in this country increased nearly 600 per cent, while the product of the shoddy manufactories increased nearly 350 per cent. And during the last year 67 per cent of the woolen manufactures of this country was composed of shoddy; and in shoddy manufactures lies the main danger to the woolen industry.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have not spoken differently on this floor from my declarations upon the stump when I was soliciting the suffrage of my constituents. I told them then, and I tell them now, that I do not propose so to vote as to benefit any industry at the expense of the mass of the people.

I did not tell them that I would vote to the detriment of the consumers, for the purpose of raising the price of wool or the price of sheep. Protectionists claim that a protective duty on raw wool imported raises the price of American wool, and yet under the tariff act of 1890, which imposes such a high duty, wool can be bought in Texas to-day at 7 cents a pound, about the lowest price it has ever brought. And I will state for the benefit of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] and for the benefit of the members of this committee, that whereas he presented a remonstrance from 250 or 300 constituents of the gentleman who represents the Dallas district [Judge ABBOTT] against putting wool on the free list, that the latter gentleman told me that he had been offered 50,000 pounds of Texas wool at 5 cents a pound, although the tariff on foreign wool is 11 cents a pound.

Now, I admit that there is a difference in the price between Texas wool in the manufacturing market and the wool of Pennsylvania, Ohio, and of West Virginia of a similar grade, but that is explained by the fact, as manufacturers have told me upon this floor, that there is a greater amount of shrinkage in the Texas wool than in the cleaner wool of the States which I have mentioned. But, notwithstanding this fact, the price of the last mentioned wool graded as one-half and three-eighths is only from 13 to 19 cents, and the price of Texas wool is 10 and 14 cents for a similar grade, the rate of duty on each class being about 11 cents per pound.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to know how the condition of the sheep-raisers of Texas can be worse than it is to-day. They have had protection since 1867, and yet they are complaining of ruinous prices, while I know that in the county in which I live, De Witt County, which is not a sheep-raising county, before the war wool was selling at from 40 to 50 cents a pound that to-day does not bring 20 cents a pound. Certainly free wool with corresponding reductions of the rate of duty on manufactured woolens can not fail to benefit the wool-growers and also the people of the whole country. [Applause.]

The producers of wool in Texas had the benefit of protection under the act of 1867; they had it under the act of 1883, and to-day the price of the wool which they raise is less than it ever has been in the history of the wool-growing industry of the State. Their condition can not be worse than it is, and we insist that it will be better, because when wool is put on the free list there will be a greater demand for it in this country, and the enlarged demand here will increase the price in other countries, and the increase of price in the foreign markets will necessarily increase the price here, and I have been told by a member of the Committee on Ways and Means who is a manufacturer and by another member who is engaged in the wool-manufacturing industry, that the manufacturers will require American wools to mix them with foreign wools, to produce thereby different, better, and more diversified grades of goods, which I predict will sell more cheaply with the duties upon foreign woolen goods correspondingly reduced as they must and will be.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PICKLER was recognized.

Mr. BURROWS. If the gentleman from South Dakota will yield for a moment, I understood the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] to say that the remonstrance of eleven hundred citizens of the State of Texas, which I had read, was signed by only a few Democrats.

Mr. CRAIN. I said, or I do say, that so far as I am concerned I do not know anything about it, but I read a statement from a letter of the mayor of San Angelo, who is also the postmaster, to the effect stated by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

Mr. BURROWS. Very well. I desire to state that of the 1,100 signers of that remonstrance 642 put opposite to their names the word "Democrat."

Mr. CRAIN. Oh, as to the statements in the remonstrance, I do not believe them. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota is recognized.

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to offer an amendment to this bill.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman from South Dakota yields to me for a moment. I have no desire to address the committee at the present time on this question, but the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. CRAIN] conveyed the impression, if I understood him aright, that there are no interests outside of Republican interests connected with the wool industry in the State of Texas interested in the tariff. I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read a letter from a very prominent Pennsylvania Democrat who, with that enterprise which is sometimes characteristic of Pennsylvania Democrats, has invested a large amount of money in the wool-growing industry in the State of Texas.

The letter was read, as follows:

HARRISBURG, January 5, 1894.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 26th instant is in due time received. I am interested in a ranch in Texas stocked with cattle and sheep. Free wool and free mutton will destroy the sheep business, and wool-growing will have to be abandoned if the free-wool clause of the Wilson bill is passed. In 1892 wool sold in Texas at 16½ to 17½ cents per pound. In 1893, under threatened free wool, it has sold at 6½ to 7½ cents, a reduction of fully 10 cents per pound, or about 60 per cent.

Just why this particular industry, engaged in by so many and in all parts of the country, should be sacrificed and abandoned, as it will be under the free wool and free mutton, is a mystery, and especially so as the people engaged in this business belong to the class for whose welfare the politicians of both parties seem to be so solicitous.

If a tariff for revenue "only" is the right thing, why should not wool bear its share of the tax? If cheap blankets and cheap clothing are a necessity, why not make them cheap by putting woolen goods and made-up clothing on the free list with wool? Why make a distinction, particularly when—

It requires more labor to raise the wool to supply a factory than is required in a factory to manufacture the same into blankets, or any ordinary woolen goods; and when—

It requires a greater investment of capital in land, sheep, and equipment to raise the wool to supply a factory than it takes to build and equip the factory itself—an investment five to ten times greater.

If you will look the matter up you will find that Texas has more sheep than any State in the Union, and is therefore more interested. Divide the whole valuation of the sheep in Texas in 1892 by two (they do not now sell for one-half that they sold for eighteen months ago), and add to this 10 cents per pound on the total wool clip of 1893, and you will get some idea as to the enormous loss that that State has already sustained. To this must be added a large shrinkage in the value of land on which the sheep pasture, if the Wilson bill becomes a law.

The Texas Congressman who votes for the Wilson bill as reported votes to destroy this great interest in his State—he does more, he votes to bankrupt three-fourths of those engaged in the business—for they are generally men of limited means. He votes to place a duty of 1¼ cents a pound—not ad-valorem, that may be shaded, but a specific duty of 1¼ cents per pound on rice, which is part of the food supply of the very men whose business he is voting to destroy; and as if to add insult to injury he votes a 45 per cent duty—the highest in the schedule—to protect Mr. Stevens, who has labored so faithfully to place wool on the free list and also to take such good care of his own particular interests.

The Wilson bill favors skilled labor at the expense of the unskilled; those who are best able to take care of themselves and their own interest at the expense of those who are least able. The "tie" which binds the planter's cotton is free; the "hoop" which binds the poor man's bucket is taxed. The bill is skillfully drawn. It even offers Middle Texas a bribe to help destroy the wool-grower of Western and the lumber manufacturer of Eastern Texas.

It seems to me the Texas Congressman who votes for this bill and who has any ambition to succeed himself will have some very interesting questions to answer next fall during the campaign.

Very truly yours,

A. J. DULL.

Hon. JOHN DALZELL,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend paragraph 384 by striking out "eleven" and inserting "twelve" in lieu thereof. Also strike out the word "twelve" in said paragraph and insert "thirteen" in lieu thereof, so that said paragraph when so amended will read as follows:

"The duty upon all wool and hair of the first class shall be 12 cents per pound and upon all wool and hair of the second class 13 cents per pound."

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that I have offered to the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan increases the tariff 1 cent a pound on the first and second classes of wool above that imposed by the McKinley law. It may be that this amendment will not be adopted by this committee [laughter], but I desire to offer it in good faith to emphasize, if I can, the position of every wool-grower in my State, regardless of the party to which he belongs, in his opposition to free wool.

I can not answer for the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] or his constituents, but in my State, and I have traveled over it lately and talked with a great many wool-growers, I find no exception among Democrats, Populists, or Republicans, none who are not opposed to the reduction of the tariff upon wool. The gentleman from Indiana cites a case that he heard of lately of a Republican making a speech who argued to the wool-growers and the farmers that putting a tariff on their wool would increase the price of the wool, and then turned around and argued that a tariff upon manufactured goods would give them cheaper manufactured goods.

Now, sir, the truth of both those propositions is easily established, and the Republican who maintained them was right. As far as wool is concerned, we lack 60,000,000 head of sheep in this country in order to produce all the wool and mutton that we consume. Under a tariff to keep out foreign wool and foreign mutton until our sheep-producers can produce those 60,000,000 head additional, there would certainly be a good price for mutton and for wool. There is no question about that. Then at that time falling back upon the old principle of protection when the prices for wool and mutton being good, and good prices had induced a sufficient number of people to go into the sheep-producing business to make up the additional 60,000,000 head of sheep required, then at that point the competition in wool-growing and mutton-raising in this country would bring down the prices of wool and of mutton to a point where they could be carried on while affording a reasonable profit and paying to the American laborer and the American farmer what the American laborer and the American farmer are entitled to, fair wages, and there the prices would stand, and they ought not to go lower than that.

Now, as to manufactured goods, of course we know—it has been demonstrated so many times that I do not stop to argue the proposition this evening—that under a protective tariff the competition in the domestic manufacture of articles lowers the price; so that the Republican who made the speech to which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN] referred was correct in both his propositions.

What my constituents want is the privilege of assisting in raising those 60,000,000 head of sheep; and while we are thus engaged we do expect a good price for our wool and mutton. But this bill deprives us of that altogether.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN] made here yesterday a part of the same speech which he made on the occasion of that great spectacular demonstration last Saturday evening. He stated that there are ten men who do not raise sheep where there is one who does, and therefore he argued that the man one who is thus engaged in sheep-raising ought not to have any protection. I would like to ask the gentleman from Nebraska this question, because he is one of the majority of the committee that reported this bill to the House. There are 10,000 people and more not engaged in the manufacture of woolen goods in this country to every one who is so engaged; yet he and the majority of his committee propose to give the woolen manufacturers a protection of 40 per cent.

Mr. CRAIN. Is the gentleman willing to vote for the amendment which I have pending reducing the tariff on woolen manufactures to 25 per cent ad valorem?

Mr. PICKLER. No, sir.

Mr. CRAIN. Then, why is the gentleman abusing those on this side because they do not make the duty lower on these woolen manufactures?

Mr. PICKLER. I am in favor of a reasonable protection on all articles, and I do not believe that 25 per cent is a reasonable protection on woolen goods. What I complain of on the part of the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means is that there is not an article raised by the farmer—horses, cattle, sheep, hogs, wheat, barley, hops, butter, eggs, or anything produced by him—upon which you do not lower the tariff so it is no protection or put the article on the free list, while at the same time you protect the Eastern manufacturer. But I say to the gentleman from Texas that I do not believe this free-trade policy is permanent, so I do not wish to destroy the woolen manufacturer because the wool-grower suffers; but if it becomes permanent, I would vote not only to reduce to 25 per cent, but to no protection.

A MEMBER. The gentleman forgets rice.

Mr. PICKLER. No, rice is no exception, as suggested, to its being lowered under this bill, but it is still a protective tariff for rice.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURROWS. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from South Dakota be extended for ten minutes, which I understand is the time he desires. He has not had an opportunity to speak fully on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection, the time of the gentleman from South Dakota will be extended for ten minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. A single remark before the gentleman from South Dakota resumes. He has propounded a question to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN] who is not here to answer it. Will he allow me to answer it for him?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will try to do so.

Mr. PICKLER. I would like to hear anybody answer that question.

Mr. SPRINGER. The question was why this bill allows 40 per cent protection on woolen goods——

Mr. PICKLER. And gives nothing to the farmer or the wool-raiser.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to state in regard to the protection given to the woolen manufacturers that under the operation of laws passed by the Republican party they have been invited to engage in a business in which they enjoyed last year 98 per cent protection on their products——

Mr. PICKLER. The wool-growers have as strong a claim in the same direction.

Mr. SPRINGER. And in consideration of the fact that thousands of persons have been induced to invest millions of dollars in these enterprises by reason of this large protection, we thought it would be unjust to deprive them suddenly of all protection; and, therefore, we propose to allow them to enjoy this protection for such a time as will enable them to readjust their affairs upon the basis of free wool, and to prepare themselves, in the near future, when our revenues will permit it, for a still lower rate of duty.

Mr. PICKLER. I understand that more than half the protection to the woolen manufacturers under the McKinley act was a compensatory duty on account of the tariff on wool.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is stricken off in this bill.

Mr. PICKLER. But you protect the woolen manufacturer just the same. The gentleman's answer is no answer at all. He talks about the capital invested in woolen manufactures in the East. Have we not capital invested in our flocks in the West? We have been working under the same law. The McKinley act promised the same protection to the wool-grower that it promised to the Eastern manufacturer. And now, when you undertake to destroy the McKinley law, why do you not treat all the beneficiaries of that law alike? [Applause on the Republican side.] Why do you not give the wool-grower as well as the woolen manufacturer a little time in which to readjust his business?

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question.

Mr. PICKLER (continuing). Why do you not give similar opportunity to the horse-raiser, the potato-grower, the producer of hops and barley? Instead of doing this, you put everything that the farmer produces on the free list, or what is substantially the same thing. Though you have professed to be the friend of the farmer and opposed to the protected manufacturer, you now with bended knees grant protection to the Eastern manufacturer, while you kick the farmer downstairs. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PICKLER (continuing). I only want to call attention to this——

Mr. WARNER. Does the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Dakota yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARNER] for an inquiry?

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, yes.

Mr. WARNER. What was the matter with the Republican friends of wool, for which interest the gentleman seems to be contending, that induced them to vote this morning against giving the farmer time to adjust his wool business to the changed conditions of this bill?

Mr. PICKLER. You are responsible for this legislation, you and your side. I will tell you the reason they voted for it, the wool men on this side. We knew from your previous threats of destroying the wool industry of this country that these men would have nothing to expect from you excepting injury; and, in fact, the wool business has been gradually growing worse and worse in consequence of the position they knew you held on the question ever since November, 1892. Putting wool on the free list, therefore, will not hurt us any more than we have been hurt already since the last election of 1892. [Applause on the Republican side].

Mr. WARNER. How did you vote on that question this morning?

Mr. PICKLER (continuing). And we want to compel your manufacturers to stand upon the same ground that we do. That is what we voted for.

Mr. WARNER. I hope the gentleman will answer my question. How did he vote?

Mr. PICKLER. I voted as my convictions led me to vote. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WARNER. Does the gentleman think that that vote is going to help the wool-growers?

Mr. PAYNE. If my colleague would only speak a little louder we could probably hear him. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURROWS. Let me say to the gentleman from New York——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PICKLER. I will say to the gentleman from New York that I voted to extend the time until 1898, and by that time we will be in such a position that we will not have to ask any favors of the Democratic party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WARNER. Did you vote for or against the other proposition, to extend the time to August1?

Mr. PICKLER. I voted to prevent the Democratic party from doing a worse thing, although we are in such a position now that they could scarcely make it worse than it is. Our wool has been practically on the free list for ten months, and we did not propose that you buy our wool at free-trade prices, while you give the manufacturer McKinley protection.

Mr. WARNER. The gentleman claims that the wool-growers are now being ruined, but did not he and the most of his party at the same time vote to-day against giving them the proposed extension of time to arrange their business for which he now contends?

Mr. PICKLER. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am accustomed to blizzards myself, but I can not tolerate any more of that New York cyclone. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I thought I had ten minutes.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The gentleman from South Dakota has only used five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, of course, had no intention to retrench the time of the gentleman, and will recognize him for five minutes longer, if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. PICKLER. I do feel a special interest in the abuse that is heaped upon the farmers by this bill, because my constituency is largely or almost entirely an agricultural constituency. We are interested, it is true, in the mining business also, but it is the agricultural features of this bill that are so damaging to us.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] says that the Democrats down in his country are in favor of free wool. Mr. Chairman, my opinion is that they would read one out of the Democratic party in Texas where the gentleman has been making speeches if he advocated anything but free wool. They would not allow him to belong to the Democratic party in that State. They would say that he was a Republican. That must be the way they would class him. As soon as a man says he wants protection on wool in Texas they say he is a Republican. It comes not because Democratic wool-producers in that State believe they will get a better price for wool, but because under the teachings of the gentleman from Texas they think to be consistent Democrats they must be for free wool.

Mr. Chairman, in 1889—and I am still talking of the interests of the farmer—in 1889, before the protection under the McKinley law, there were imported into this country over $125,000,000 worth of foreign agricultural products, every dollar's worth of which ought to have been produced by the farmers of the United States, giving that much more employment to the people here and putting that much more money into circulation and keeping it at home rather than sending it out of the country. There was among those products $14,000,000 worth of animals and meats. The gentleman from Tennessee said the other day that there was a very small amount of meat products which came into this country; but for five years preceding the passage of the McKinley law there was an average of 88,000 head of cattle imported into this country annually.

My constituents want to assist in the raising of those 88,000 head of cattle, and to put a part of the money received for them into their own pockets, if they can be permitted to do so. Of dairy products there were $1,250,000 worth in that year; fruits, other than tropical, $8,000,000 and over; flaxseed, $3,857,000 worth.

Mr. TUCKER. How much tea and coffee?

Mr. PICKLER. Does not the gentleman mean sugar? [Laughter.] I will ask the gentleman further, do they raise tea and coffee down in Virginia where he lives? I judge from the late Senatorial contest at Richmond that there was a hotter production than tea which they were raising down there.

But I am not talking of tea and coffee. I am talking of products that the farmers of this country could have produced. There was over $3,000,000 worth of flaxseed brought into this country. We have a region as suitable for raising flax as can be found anywhere in the Union, and we want to assist in the production of that flaxseed and we do not want it to come from Canada or anywhere else. We want to produce these articles, so as to employ our labor.

It is remarkable, Mr. Chairman, how, when a man on the other side wants to say anything about the protection of the farmers, he always bases his salvation on wheat. I notice that the gentleman from Kansas did not talk about anything except wheat, wheat, wheat.

Mr. SIMPSON. Oh, yes; I did.

Mr. PICKLER. Now, we are not contending here that the tariff has made us any great amount of money as far as wheat is concerned, but it has helped us largely upon nearly every other product. But we do contend that every bushel of Canadian wheat that is kept out of this country allows some farmer in this country to produce that bushel himself, and that the same is true of every head of cattle and horses. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, it is evident that this committee wants to vote upon this amendment as soon as possible, and I shall only detain the committee for a few moments.

The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] has made a statement about protection, and who should vote for protection. I accord to him, as I do to every gentleman, the right to choose whom he shall vote for, and what doctrine he shall vote for; but it seems to me that no man in this House should be called a Democrat who is in favor of protection. Every man in favor of protection ought to be a Republican, because protection, Mr. Chairman, means simply that one class of our people shall be taxed in order to enrich another class, and that is not Democratic doctrine.

Mr. REED. I hope the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means will make some reply to this. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. HUNTER. The doctrine of protection as advocated by our friends upon the other side of this Chamber is that somebody in this country must protect the manufacturers, and they claim the especial privilege and purpose of introducing the farmer as the man who shall do that protecting.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I rose more particularly to speak concerning the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. He proposes to strike out, as it were, section 276 of the bill now pending before this House and to insert in lieu thereof the McKinley bill; and he claims and has sought to prove here, by sundry petitions from different States and Territories, that this section would be in the interests of the wool-grower.

If we are to take the statistics and the facts, we find that under a protective tariff wool has been declining for the last thirty years, and since the McKinley bill was adopted wool has continued to decline, notwithstanding the attempt to excuse that decline upon the theory that the Democratic party attained power in 1892.

But prior to the election of the present House and the present Administration, wool was on a constant decline, and now the gentleman attempts to introduce into this House the provisions of the McKinley bill so far as wool is concerned, under which was precipitated a more rapid decline in the price of wool than under any other tariff which was ever imposed in this country.

It seems to me strange, if he purposes to benefit the farmer, that he would introduce the very measure, and insist upon its adoption in this House, by which the price of wool has been reduced all the time. He thinks that the Territory of New Mexico will not come into the Union——

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HUNTER. I have only five minutes. I would like to yield to my friend, because I know the kindly spirit in which he would ask a question and take up the balance of my time. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] says that he thinks the Territory of New Mexico will be excluded and that their people would not want to come into this Union if we do not retain the present tariff tax on foreign wool.

Now, I apprehend, Mr. Chairman, that they would be very ready to come into this Union wool or no wool, sheep or no sheep, because it is not dependent upon a question of that character; and why he should introduce that statement into his speech I can not quite understand. But there is a sort of prophetic method of stating these propositions, that if certain things are not done, if the wool tariff is not retained the country is going to ruin; if the tariff is not retained upon coal and iron ore that the country will go to wreck and to ruin. That is the doctrine and that is the statement in all instances of those who were receiving the benefits of protection when there has been an effort made, not only in this country but all over Europe to reduce taxation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WRIGHT of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take up the time of the committee, but I have a communication here, which is only one of many similar in character that I have been receiving from my constituents, and which I desire to read to the House. And in this connection, I would say that this resolution is from a Democratic county in a Democratic part of my State and district.

MAPLEWOOD, WAYNE COUNTY, PA., January 9, 1894.

DEAR SIR: At a regular meeting of Harvest Grange, No. 892, Patrons of Husbandry, the following resolutions were passed:

"Whereas it is proposed in the Wilson bill to place on the free list twenty-nine of the finished products of the farm which are now protected by equitable duties; and

"Whereas the same bill gives many manufactories 40 per cent protection; and now therefore

"Be it resolved, That we heartily condemn the gross unjust discrimination against the farming interests manifested in that bill.

"Resolved, That we, as members of Harvest Grange, No. 892, Patrons of Husbandry, respectfully call upon our Congressmen and Senators to use their aid in opposing said measure.

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to our Congressman and Senators, also to the Farmers' Friend for publication."

Respectfully, yours,

JOSEPH VEITH, Master.
E. H. SAMSON, Secretary.

Congressman WRIGHT, Washington, D. C.

I wish to say that it is only one of a large number of protests against the Wilson bill which I am daily receiving from my people—and from Democrats as often as from Republicans—and from farmers, mechanics, laborers, and manufacturers alike.

It seems that my constituents thus far are unable to see wherein the Wilson bill will be of any benefit to them; and regardless of previous political affiliations they demand the defeat of the proposed legislation.

It seems to me that Democratic solicitude for the farmer is all theoretical, and it seems equally true that the practical farmers in my district perceive the folly and iniquity of this Democratic attempt to put all the products of the farm on the free list.

I believe I have nearly a thousand protests similar to the one I have just read.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Chairman, it is not at all surprising that we who are representing districts in which the wool industry predominates should be overwhelmed in this Chamber with petitions, remonstrances, and memorials appealing to this body to stay the hand that is to extirpate one of the greatest industries of this country, an industry which yields an annual revenue to the people of this country—our people, sir—of over $100,000,000; an industry which is valued at over $116,000,000 in the property of sheep alone; an industry which involves in the value of land, barns, sheds, and equipments, as the sheep industry, of $408,000,000, and which gives employment, directly or indirectly, to over 2,000,000 American people.

I say, again, that it is not surprising that the people engaged in these industries should at this moment, of all moments, be particularly interested as to the fate of this bill. My own State, which ranks about sixth in the order of wool-growing States of this Union, will feel this severe blow probably more than any other State engaged in this industry. One-half of that State, embracing an area almost as large as the States of New York and Pennsylvania, is largely engaged in this industry; and I have received communications certifying that if this bill passes as it is now framed that it is the last hour for the industry of wool in that entire country. So wrought up are the people in that portion of the State that I have received letters from a number of my Democratic constituents against the passage of the bill, and one of them concludes, "I have never had the nerve, sir, to look a sheep in the face since I voted for Grover Cleveland." [Laughter.]

Now, it has been said by my friend from Texas [Mr. CRAIN], who recently held the floor, that when wool is placed upon the free list it will inure very largely to the benefit of the wool-growers, in enhancing the price of wool. That is a statement that no doubt represented the views of his people at the time when he stated they were satisfied with whatever he did, and it is, no doubt, like a great many other people with respect to like statements from the free-trade element on that side of the Hall, as there were a great many people all over the country who wanted a change. The change has come, and with it has come a sad dissipation of all the encouraging and racy promises which were made to them.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HERMANN. Yes, sir.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I believe you stated that the product of this industry was $116,000,000 annually.

Mr. HERMANN. I said that the annual revenue was $100,000,000 and that the sheep in the United States were valued at $116,000,000.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. That the value of the product was $116,000,000?

Mr. HERMANN. The value of the product was $116,000,000.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. You also stated that there were 2,000,000 people occupied in producing this amount?

Mr. HERMANN. I said that, directly and indirectly, the wool-growers and those who were engaged in the wool-growing numbered 2,000,000 in round numbers.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The year round?

Mr. HERMANN. The year round.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Then that is just $58 apiece for their labor the year round.

Mr. HERMANN. That statement is in accordance with the knowledge and candor which the gentleman generally manifests in discussing this question. A great many of these people are engaged in this business merely as an incident, as the gentleman so well knows. That is so in his own State, a State which will be more severely affected than any other State in the Union in proportion to its population if this proposed reduction is made.

And, Mr. Chairman, permit me to say in answer to the statements that have been usually made upon the stump and to the appeals which have been addressed to the laboring classes—the consuming classes of this country—telling them when wool is placed upon the free list it will bring a vast benefit to the consumer of clothing. In reply to those appeals permit me to make this statement, and I appeal to the Ways and Means Committee to consider the testimony that was presented before them on this subject by one of the best experts on the wool industry in this country, Mr. Justice, of Philadelphia.

A question was addressed to him by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] as to whether protection would not be a greater injury even to the small wool-grower than free trade would be a benefit to him, and his answer was that the tax that protection put upon the consumer of woolen goods would not exceed 90 cents per suit, referring to a suit made of the finest Merino wool, such a suit as can be purchased at wholesale at $27; and taking the ordinary suit worn by the average citizen of this country, which costs about $13.50, the highest tax imposed by protection on that would not exceed 45 cents. And yet this great industry, in which over 2,000,000 of our people are engaged and which yields a product of over $100,000,000 in value, is to be sacrificed in order to overwhelm this menacing despotism which taxes the consumers of the country to the extent of 45 cents per suit of clothes!

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HERMANN. I would like five minutes more, Mr. Chairman. I do not often trespass upon the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to extending the time of the gentleman five minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. HERMANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, another suggestion has been made by my friend from Texas; that the people themselves, the consumers, the working people of this country, are not satisfied with the present tariff and that they are asking for this change. Sir, I hold in my hand a very pathetic appeal which comes to me from the laborers and operatives engaged in the humblest occupations in connection with one of the largest woolen mills on the Pacific coast. It is signed with their own hands and the names of some of them are written no doubt with very little skill. I commend to gentlemen of this committee the pathetic language of these working people contained in this appeal which I will now read. It is as follows:

PETITION OF THE EMPLOYÉS OF THE THOMAS KAY WOOLEN MILLS.

We, the undersigned employés of the Thomas Kay Woolen Mill Company, request you in the most earnest manner to vote against and to use your best influence to defeat the Wilson tariff bill. If this bill should become a law it would have the most disastrous effect upon the industry which gives us employment. Those among us who have worked in Europe know that the prices paid for labor in Europe are so much lower than the prices paid for the same labor in this country that if foreign-made goods were admitted to this country at such a rate of duty as the Wilson bill would give them, it would have the effect of either throwing us out of work entirely, or else cutting down our wages to about the same rate as is paid in Europe.

We desire to inform you that if we are thus deprived of our means of earning a livelihood, or if we are obliged to work for reduced wages, we will hold those responsible who vote for the bill, and we hereby assert most positively that, irrespective of former party affiliations, we will vote and work against the election of any member who will favor a bill that will cause such distress to the laboring classes.

Now, in regard to the condition that will be inflicted upon the wool-growers of the country by this proposed legislation, I hold in my hand a most intelligent communication from one of the leading woolgrowers in my State, a gentleman who has occupied for a number of years the distinguished position of State senator in the Legislative Assembly of Oregon. This gentleman gives to this House and to the country an itemized statement of the cost which is necessarily incurred in the production of wool in, I may say, all that portion of the country which lies west of the summit of the Rocky Mountains. It is asserted here, and has been asserted frequently, that in the production of wool a very large proportion of the receipts are in the form of a margin of profit and that that profit is paid by the consumers of the country.

Now, this communication demonstrates beyond question that the returns of the industry, even under the protection afforded by the McKinley law, is only such as affords a reasonable livelihood for those engaged in it. It brings into use a large body of land which probably would not otherwise be utilized, for I may say that the lands devoted to pasturage in that portion of my State are perhaps equal in area to the State of Connecticut and are generally unsuited for other farming purposes. I ask the Clerk to read this communication, and I ask that due attention and consideration be given to it, because it comes, as I have said, from one of the most intelligent woolgrowers of my State and sets forth clearly the cost of raising wool.

The letter was read, as follows:

THE DALLES, OREGON, December 6, 1893.

MY DEAR SIR: In a short time the question of the removal of the present tariff on many commodities will come before the United States Senate, and from what the papers tell us it is fairly reasonable to suppose that the principal industry of Eastern Oregon (woolgrowing) is seriously menaced.

As you know, my experience in woolgrowing has been considerable, and I have been fairly successful.

I have been engaged in the business for eighteen years and have run from ten to twelve thousand head. I have made it a point each year, for a period of thirty days, to accurately ascertain the actual cost of all my sheep camps, in the way of supplies, and you can accept the following figures as trustworthy since they are an average from all these records:

COST OF RUNNING 2,000 SHEEP ONE YEAR.

Herder, at $35 per month	$420
Board, at $15 per month	180
Camp-tender to help move and furnish camp	200
Salt, 2 tons, at $30	60
Hay, 50 tons, at $8	400
Extra help during lambing season	100
Extra help during winter feeding season	50
Shearing 2,000 sheep, at 7 cents per head	140

COST OF RUNNING 2,000 SHEEP ONE YEAR—Continued.

Board of shearers		$30
Extra help sacking wool, etc		25
50 wool sacks, at 40 cents		20
Feeding horses used to supply camp, etc		180
Shoeing horses used to supply camp, etc		30
Furnishing camp—tents, blankets, rope, etc		50
Hauling 16,000 pounds wool to railroad, at ½ cent		120
Cost of 16,000 pounds wool as per above		1,991
1,600 pounds wool, at 6 cents	$960
700 lambs, being increase	875
		1,835
Net loss on above basis		156

The only possible reduction that can be made in the cost of running a band of sheep is in wages, as the plow has driven the stock so far back into the hills that the cost of feed is greater as there is so little land that will produce, and freight to and from the railroad figures largely in salt and other supplies, and shipping wool (my ranch is 80 miles south of Arlington.)

Thus you will see that at 6 cents per pound for wool, which is the highest price we can expect, with free wool, for the class of wool raised here, calculating the weight of each fleece at 8 pounds, which is about the average, and the increase at 35 per cent (which is all an ordinary band of stock sheep will produce, as we have to carry the males until two years old and past before they are suitable for market, and can not breed the ewes until two years old), the owner would be about $200 loser on the year's work. This is leaving out of consideration all the taxes, interest on capital invested, and wear and tear to camp accouterments, which is considerable.

If a wool-grower were running but one band of sheep, several of these items would be greater, such as the expense of camp-tending and horses, which I have divided by three, as one outfit attends to three sheep-herders. Again, the average loss caused by wild animals and by accident during a year is at least 5 per cent, and this, taken with the interest at 6 per cent on investments in real estate, or the rent which must be paid to secure a winter range and feeding ground, will considerably increase the loss of the wool-grower.

You are, of course, better posted than we can be as to the probable reduction in cost in manufactured material to be brought about by the annihilation of the wool industry in this country.

But when we are told that only three or four pounds of scoured wool goes into a suit of clothes, it does not seem probable that so small a reduction will be of any great advantage to the consumer, as the protected manufacturer is evidently to have so much the best of it that he will probably be given, or take, this small margin also.

For the last four or five years I have averaged 15 cents per pound for my wool, and $2.75 for my mutton sheep. The latter can not now be sold for more than $1.50 (at the ranch), and our wool is now being sold in Boston for 10 cents. The cost of freight, including insurance and commissions, amounts to about 4 cents a pound.

But for the unfortunate accident of Democratic success in electing a majority in both Houses of Congress and a President, the price of this year's clip would have been considerably higher than before, as the immense amount of rags and shoddy imported during the six months before the McKinley law went into effect is about consumed, and the manufacturers who are now idle would be at work on our wool.

I am sure that you are working earnestly in opposition to free trade, and I sincerely hope that a resolute stand, such as you will take in our interest, will be successful.

There is one thing which you may not have had brought to your notice, and that is, that destruction of the sheep industry means the abandonment of thousands of acres of land which now furnish good sheep pasture in Eastern Oregon (and which once, though not arable, furnished bunch-grass range of high value for cattle-growing, have been so heavily stocked for a series of years that the bunch grass has been destroyed, and will never return).

The only vegetation which now exists is weeds and the small sheep grass, which will support nothing but sheep, and upon which they will thrive; take away the sheep and this is waste land and can never be anything else.

It would be impossible for us to continue the business under free wool; we would have to quit breeding and dispose of our sheep for mutton as they become of suitable age.

When the industry is destroyed in the United States, I apprehend, the foreigner will raise the price of wool probably to more than we have received under protection, but we will have no sheep, and it takes a long time to stock up a range, as sheep do not increase very rapidly.

I am, yours very truly,

CHAS. HILTON.

Hon. BINGER HERMANN,
Washington, D. C.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. HOLMAN, for this day, on account of sickness in his family.

The SPEAKER. The hour of half past 5 o'clock having arrived, the House, under the special order, will stand in recess until 8 o'clock this evening; the evening session to be devoted to debate only on the pending bill. At the evening session the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. BROOKSHIRE, will perform the duties of the Chair.

The House accordingly took a recess until 8 p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House, at 8 o'clock p. m., was call to order by Mr. BROOKSHIRE as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is now in session for the further consideration of the tariff bill, and under the special order will resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

THE TARIFF.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. RICHARDSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

Mr. BOWER of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, we are told that "modesty becomes the gods even," and with how much more grace is it worn by those who have the honor for the first time of a seat upon this floor. I feel like apologizing for an innovation upon that time-honored custom which enjoins and impels silence upon the new and callow members, and looks to older and more experienced heads for guidance and leadership. But when reputed leaders on either side of the House are found prostituting their influence and prestige to the promotion of their peculiar personal views and local advantages, in utter disregard of the rights of their peers and in contempt of the interests of the throbbing, seething masses behind them, it is high time that unappreciated courtesies should be flung to the wind, and individual effort and responsibility felt and emphasized.

In 1880, that distinguished soldier and patriot, Gen. Hancock, in what was deemed at the time an inopportune and unfortunate utterance, pronounced the tariff question a local one. Opinionated critics and pretended statesmen were disposed to sneer at the observation, and doubtless it worked to his prejudice. But to listen to the arguments incident to this debate one would be led to believe that he was the political Solon of his day. After years of agitation of this question, paramount to every other save one in national importance, when party zeal and courage have been rewarded with a victory magnificent and complete, we behold the advocates for tariff reform divided, bickering, and halting in the way, from considerations of personal and local concerns.

I regret to see that a question of such magnitude has developed into a game of earnest competitive "grab," in which longest arms and softest fingers bear away the richest booty. In fixing the schedule in this the most important tariff measure ever presented to Congress, it is expected that mutual concession, toleration, and fairness shall prevail. [Applause.] There is the strongest demand upon the unselfish liberality, both of the members of this House and those whom they represent. Standing here as a Southerner, entertaining a pardonable partiality for my own people, loving them first and best, and according to every other Representative the same privilege, I feel that I can safely declare that in supporting this bill the people of the South are laying upon the altar of the public weal more than their proportionate share of the advantages supposed to accrue from a system of protection.

It is more than an accident or coincidence that in the long catalogue of legislative acts granting special privileges under the guise of raising needed revenues for the Government the objects and beneficiaries of this legislation were found mainly in the North and East. The beneficence and munificence of protectionism have been, it is true, claimed and argued for the country at large; they have been felt and realized only in sections, and unfortunately, for my people, in other sections than theirs. If the balance sheet were now struck and the entire system abandoned forever, we of the South would on "the idea of strict equity" find ourselves creditors in account for legislative favors, which it is true we were never selfish enough to demand, but to which, nevertheless, we were upon every principle of reciprocity at least fully entitled.

We do not propose at this critical juncture to refer to past inequalities and bias in the tariff laws. To meet the present exigency, past jealousies must be forgotten and a closer and more compact organization of our forces had. Still, sir, it may be said, without irritation of our friends of the North and East, that they of all others have least grounds to object to this measure, both as to its general scope and the details of its provisions. The bright star of tariff reform is at length in the heavens! We hail it and welcome it with equal joy! [Applause.] If aught can be said against its advent, it is that it still reserves its brightest light for the Northern and Eastern sky, and its shadow, if it has one, for the South and the occident. [Applause.]

Standing by the old Democratic landmarks, I still believe in a tariff for revenue only, but admitting always that every schedule, however low, carries inherently and inseparably a certain amount of protection with it. Practically there are no free traders in this country. There never can be until we have assented to the idea of direct taxation for the support of the Government. Much, sir, both from the standpoint of a Southerner and an old-fashioned Democrat might be urged against the structure of this bill. I make the concession without for one moment admitting the propriety of antagonizing it. In the first place an extensive and an enlarged free list, involving necessarily a higher duty upon those articles retained upon the dutiable list, is unquestionably vulnerable.

There are two ways to thwart the purpose of a revenue tariff, and one is just as effective as the other. On the one hand you may levy an import so high as to render it entirely prohibitory, utterly precluding the importation of the article taxed, and thereby shutting off all revenue whatever from that source. On the other hand, you may levy no duty at all, placing everything upon the free list, and of course obtaining no revenue at all. The latter, sir, is the pleasing but delusive fatuity of a recent phase of Democracy, misconceived and misconstrued. The first is Republicanism run wild, hopeless, irreclaimable, and as dangerous to the property and prosperity of the people at large as anarchism, panics, revolutions, pestilence, or war. The latter is Republican protectionism in its last analysis. The first would be the logical outcome and result of Democratic low-tariff ideas, but for the natural, fixed, and unavoidable barrier of an ever-present and growing necessity for revenue. The man who apprehends and predicts absolute free trade under present conditions, under any administration, is either a fool or a hypocrite.

Let the alarmist on this line look about him and reflect for a moment. Let him behold the expenditure of every Department of this Government swelling with incredible rapidity. Let him look upon a national expenditure calling for $500,000,000 annually, and in connection with this contemplate the result of cutting off at one blow the source of two-thirds of the revenue of the Government. Such winnowing of economic chaff is mere trifling, whether it be upon the part of Republicans or Democrats. We may theorize on the subject as much as we please, but the time will never come when we shall have no tariff schedule.

Mr. HULICK. I understand the gentleman to say that he is not a free trader in practice and that free trade can not be carried out in practice; but is the gentleman a free trader in theory?

Mr. BOWER of North Carolina. I know nothing about free trade in theory. What we want is something practical. I can not conceive of such a thing as free trade in theory and not in practice. [Applause.] I know of no such free trade as that. Whenever I hear a person predicting absolute free trade, if he is a Democrat, I think, to use a slang expression, he is "talking through his hat" [laughter], and if he is a Republican he is "talking through two hats." [Renewed laughter.]

Sir, that is not the real issue between the great political parties of the day and country. The question is not whether we shall have a tariff, but how much, and not only how much, but upon what articles, and not simply upon what articles, but with what spirit and for what ultimate purpose. The question is, shall we keep our eye upon the constitutional privilege and duty of taxation and the original purpose and aim of this privilege, to wit, the raising of revenue, laying the burden upon the people as evenly and uniformly as possible, letting results take care of themselves, or, on the other hand, losing sight of the extent and object of our license, pervert our authority, and magnify an incident of taxation, and one not contemplated by the framers of our Constitution, into the first object and chief end of such taxation.

Has any gentleman of the opposition an imagination vivid enough to conceive what would have been the language of the authors of the Federalist, the great advocates and defenders of the Constitution, in refutation of the proposition to levy imports solely or even mainly for the purpose of protection? With such an antecedent interpretation of this most important provision of the Constitution it never could have become the organic law of the land. Such a constructive extension of the taxing power was beyond the ken of those great statesmen and lawgivers who builded this house of constitutional authority for us, which has been our glory and our refuge more than a hundred years. In these latter days we have fallen upon new ideas and new theories, and the first chart of legislative authority has been amended by thousands and ignored by tens of thousands. The bill now under consideration is open to criticism. There lingers about it much of the smell and taint of unconscious protectionism. The gentleman from Connecticut who last addressed the House went a long way to strike a blow, though a very feeble one, at the South. He tells us that we of the South ought not to complain of tariff taxation; that it is a tax paid by consumers; that a large element of our people consume but little in the way of food, except "sweet potatoes, razor-backed hogs, and hominy," and that their wardrobe as a rule is not very extensive. I would say to the gentleman, that we are not accustomed to look to his State even for a supply of these delectable articles of food which he has prescribed for us; nor have we, in later years at least, encouraged to any great extent the consumption of wooden nutmegs, one of the staple productions of the historic old State from which the gentleman hails. [Laughter.] The gentleman's remark, though facetious, is neither correct nor in good taste. He and those whom he represents, of all others, have least cause to complain of this bill, for by fortune or necessity it transpires that they who were the first are to be the last recipients of whatever benefits are to accrue from the protective and discriminating features of a tariff schedule. Now to particularize:

Section 3 is as follows:

That there shall be levied, collected, and paid on the importation of all raw material or unmanufactured articles not enumerated or provided for in this act a duty of 10 per cent ad valorem; and on all articles manufactured in whole or in part, not provided for in this act, a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem.

Here we have in a general sweeping provision the first important discrimination of 10 per cent ad valorem in favor of the manufacturing industries over all others. The champions of protection on this floor should make their first and most profound obeisance to the reporting committee at this point. At this stage of the proceedings the free trader absolute and the low tariff and tariff-for-revenue-only individual will find small crumbs of comfort indeed.

But, sir, this is the mildest form of the protective idea that here and there and oftentimes crops out. Almost every raw material, certainly every important one except leaf tobacco, instead of being taxed 10 per cent ad valorem, is put upon the free list, while the duties on the manufactured articles into which they enter, instead of being limited to 20 per cent, range from 20 to 50 per cent, the average being over 30 per cent. The manufacturer should again doff his hat to the committee. Iron ore and manganese ore are on the free list now, but the duty on iron and steel range from 22½ per cent on pig and scrap iron up to 45 per cent on penknives and razors. The manufacturer again has cause for gratulation, while the man who digs and delves for ore will be pardoned for a little vigorous "kicking," at least.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOWER of North Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I understand that the gentleman is criticising the committee——

Mr. BOWER of North Carolina. Not at all.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Because it has put certain raw materials on the free list, and put certain high per cents on the finished product. Now, I think that the idea of the committee was simply to get revenue in that way. If the raw materials referred to that have been put upon the free list were the chief dependence of the Government for its support, I am frank to say that I do not believe the Government would get enough to pay the members of the House their salaries.

Mr. BOWER of North Carolina. That may be true. I am not speaking for the purpose of criticising the committee. If my friend had heard my previous remarks he would have caught my meaning. I do not refer to these discriminations to find fault with the committee. But I am attempting to bring before the House this fact, that in putting these raw materials on the free list and at the same time preserving a high duty on the articles into which these raw materials are converted, the committee did, perhaps not intentionally, favor a certain class of people and a certain section of the country. And further, I may be permitted to say, that in doing this we are diverging from the old Democratic idea of a horizontal ad valorem tariff for revenue only.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will my friend allow me there?

Mr. BOWER of North Carolina. With great pleasure.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am of the opinion that after this bill is enacted into law and the due course of trade is established, that possibly we will get more revenue from these finished products at the rate we will put upon them than we have received from the higher duties we have had on them for some time.

Mr. BOWER of North Carolina. Perhaps the gentleman is right. That is a prophesy; and I hope my friend may prove a true prophet.

Coal is on the free list, but every wheel in the great factories which it warms into life and activity at every revolution converts some unprotected commodity into a protective one, helps to swell the great fund which the factory system has for distribution among the favored classes, helps to make the riches of the rich a little more pronounced and potent, and the poverty of the poor a little more tantalizing and intolerable. Copper is on the free list, but the products of the copper are protected by a duty of 20 to 30 per cent. Wool is on the free list, but the duty on woolen goods runs from 35 per cent on worsted yarns to 55 per cent on ready-made clothing, and the proverbial wool-hat man still pays 35 per cent on his hat.

Silk cocoons and raw silk reeled from the cocoons are admitted free; but silk partially manufactured must pay 25 cents per pound, the duties on silk in other forms ranging from 20 to 50 per cent ad valorem. Flax before it is hackled is put on the free list; but the duties on linen goods range from 25 per cent on thread or yarn to 40 per cent on the highest grades of goods. Raw cotton is upon the free list. The country understands how it came there. Our Republican friends are fond of talking of Democratic hostilities to wool. It has furnished the text of many a campaign diatribe in Ohio and elsewhere. They have rung all the changes upon that gamut, but you never hear them speak of raw cotton being on the free list, and for a very good reason.

In 1882 there was a duty of 3 cents a pound on raw cotton. Here was a moderate duty on the most important agricultural product of the country. A Republican Congress in the early part of 1883, just before its expiration, repealed this duty and placed this Southern staple upon the free list. A result of this repeal has been an increased and an increasing importation of cotton from India, Peru, and Egypt. Why, cotton should have been singled out for the free list when coal, iron ores, and every other kind of ores, and wheat, and corn, and almost every other agricultural product was dutiable, I leave our Republican friends to explain. [Applause.] I refer to this not for the purpose of adverse criticism, but to show the status of the Republican mind ten years ago in reference to the idea of protecting the great agricultural interests of the country.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not understand that my friend is taking the position that a duty on cotton would help the cotton producer of this country?

Mr. BOWER of North Carolina. Practically it might not. Still if there is anything in the idea that putting an import tax on an article protects it, I do not see why it would not apply as well to cotton as wool.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does not my friend know that two-thirds of the cotton raised in this country is sold in foreign countries, and that the price of every pound of cotton made in this country is regulated by the market in London and Liverpool? But it is not so with wool, for we import two-thirds of the wool we consume.

Mr. BOWER of North Carolina. I understand the distinction drawn by my colleague. It is a very just and material one. Still the fact remains that foreign cotton is brought to this country and sold in competition with ours.

Raw fur skins and undressed furs are to come free, but fur hats must still pay a duty of 30 per cent. Hides, hoofs, and horns are on the free list, but the manufactured products of these articles are still favored with a duty. Wood in its natural state and in its crudest and simplest phases of manufacture is thought to need no protection, but as soon as the deft fingers of the carpenter, the mechanic, and the artisan have touched it a tax of 20 per cent is imposed. Mica, to my regret and the chagrin and injury of a most respectable element of my constituents, loses by the provision of the bill the 35 per cent protection hitherto enjoyed, but stoves, in the manufacture of which it is most extensively used, still glisten and glow in the sheen of a 30 per cent protection.

Mr. Chairman, I might extend this review of what I consider the objectionable features of the bill, but I do not deem it proper to do so. Sam Jones, in many respects the biggest man of this day and country, speaking of the necessities of the hour, says that what this country needs now is not so much a man to think and plan and doctrinize, but a man that will act, that will "get up and get" and do something. That is what is needed in the religious field and that is what is imperatively demanded in the political world. In the light of most solemn promises and party pledges I stand ready to support the measure in whatever shape it may finally come to a vote. [Applause.] It will not meet every expectation of an impatient, suffering people, but in view of its many features of substantial relief and the wide field of hope it opens up, I am prepared to say, "with all its faults I love it still." [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I do not impute to elections as much significance as some do. Where there are great sectional interests involved they seldom settle anything definitely. The only solution of such questions is revolution or war. The slavery issue was agitated hotly for nearly half a century. Elections were lost and won and won and lost upon it. The press teemed with incendiary articles on either side; big-mouthed politicians bawled themselves hoarse, ambitious and aspiring statesmen skulked and squirmed and "trimmed." False prophets were up all over the land, and now and then declared the issue settled, but after the shedding of much precious blood the final solution was had at Appomattox.

And so, I do not contend that the election of 1892 turned solely on the issue of a particular kind of tariff, nor that this issue is finally and unalterably settled. But, sir, as it was one of the elements of that contest, and made unusually prominent therein, we have a right to infer that much stress was laid upon it by the voters of the country, and to allow to it a proper influence upon the results of that very important election. Regarding that election as only a very significant battle won, we are still to prosecute the war to its legitimate conclusion.

The selfsame fight we are now making was fought by our predecessors sixty years ago. The battle was fought along the same lines. Then, as now, it was claimed that certain industries and certain classes of laborers in the country needed special privileges and advantages to enable them to live and to prosper. Then, as now, they demanded and obtained concessions and contributions from the brawn and sweat of the masses. The manufacturers have changed in nothing except in the argument of their contention and the method of their warfare. Every privilege then claimed was on the score of infancy. No other pretense was advanced. Sir, that argument has died with the flight of years. A later and more effective one has taken its place. How it has cheered the bounty-hunting, looting horde to many an onset. [Applause.]

Oh, Labor! Labor! How many crimes are committed in thy name! [Applause.] What was then asked in consideration of the inefficiency of tender years is now urged from a sham regard for the interest of labor. Sir, we are constantly reminded that there is an army of laborers in this country who can not exist and flourish save by the fostering care of this Government. That army, we are told, is now knocking at the door of Congress, with petitions in one hand and threats and protests in the other, demanding an indefinite continuation of the taxes that have too long burdened an indulgent people. Gentlemen upon this floor talk often and vehemently about the protection of the laboring classes of America against the pauper-paid laborers of Europe.

But, sir, who are the laborers of this country, and where do they live, and how do they live? It has been shown by an eminent statistician that there are in this country about 17,000,000 laborers in all, of whom about 13,000,000 are engaged in industries not susceptible of so-called protection, while 600,000 of the remainder are only occasionally benefited thereby. So that we have in round numbers only about 3,400,000 as the beneficiaries of the protective system. Sir, if there were no other argument against it but this it ought not to stand on its present footing for a day. A general economic law that does not dispense its benefits with equal hand impartially to every class and to every individual, however high or low, is inherently and eternally wrong. [Applause.]

What right has the lawmaking power of this nation to say that thirteen men shall be assessed for the benefit and weal of three other men no better than the thirteen and having no better or stronger claims upon the Government than the thirteen? As Democrats we have been taught to believe, and we do believe, that every citizen in this broad land must work out his own individual material welfare and salvation, not with fear and trembling, but looking to the Government only for equal laws, equal burdens and benefits, and equal protection to property, to person, to life, and to liberty. [Applause.] He has a right to expect this much and no more. This doctrine is old and elementary, I know, but it can not be that it has lost any of its force from age. It is the same that was taught by Jefferson and Madison and Monroe and Jackson. Whenever it has had occasion to speak, the judiciary of the country, with rare exceptions, has given to it its unequivocal sanction.

As late as 1892 Justices Brewer, Field, and Brown, of the Supreme Court of the United States, joined in an opinion that epitomizes the true Democratic idea. Hear what they have to say on this line:

> The paternal theory of government is odious.
> The utmost possible liberty to the individual, and the fullest possible protection to him and his property, is both the limitation and the duty of government.
> If it may regulate the price of one service which is not a public service, or the compensation for the use of one kind of property which is not devoted to a public use, why may it not with equal reason regulate the price of all service and the compensation to be paid for the use of all property?

But our Republican friends tell us that while protection does more especially enhance the price of the protected labor, that it really does more than this; that it scatters its beneficence broadcast, as it were, dispensing blessings where they are not solicited even or expected. In a word, they tell us that a high tariff will increase the wages of all industries, agricultural as well as manufacturing. The constituency whom I feel proud to represent here are mainly engaged in agriculture. If, therefore, it can be demonstrated that the passage of this bill will work to their detriment I should feel impelled by the highest official obligation to oppose it. But it has not been and can not be shown that such is the case. According to the report of the Senate Committee on Finance upon Wholesale Prices, Wages, and Transportation, no such argument can justly be made for protection.

Statistics are always dull and often unreliable and, I think, should be sparingly indulged in. Some one has aptly remarked that "though figures do not lie, liars sometimes figure." According to the figures of this report by Mr. ALDRICH for the committee, it appears that the rise in wages in agriculture since 1860 has been only 4 per cent, while in the protective industries it has been in round numbers 69 per cent. In 1866, Mr. J. R. Dodge, the Statistician of the Department of Agriculture, made his first investigation into farm wages and announced the gratifying result of an increase of 50 per cent since 1860. But a like investigation in 1892 disclosed the unpalatable fact of a decrease of 46 per cent since 1866, leaving as a balance an increase of 4 per cent since 1860. From an examination of the same statistics we also find that the staple agricultural products, such as enter into general consumption and constitute the necessaries of life, on the whole, have declined 6 per cent since 1860.

So, sir, the agricultural laborer can make his own deductions and comparisons. Mr. Chairman, I undertake to say they can not be very unctuous to his pride or his sense of justice. He will find that while wages of 100 cents which he would have received in 1860, have been increased to 104 cents in 1892 for the same amount of labor and length of service, that on the other hand the products of that labor would have been so decreased in price that the same quantity of such products that in 1860 would have yielded 106 will now yield but 100 cents, so that in reality there is an actual balance against him in 1891 of 2 cents, which only can be made good by superior efficiency in work arising from improved implements, improved machinery, and improved methods of farming, etc.

Again, it is often asserted here and elsewhere by the advocates of a high protective tariff that while the prices of manufactured products have continued to decline for many years still the standard and dignity of manufacturing labor and the wages of manufacturing laborers have not only been maintained, but greatly advanced. If this be true, it is neither strange nor unexpected. Why or how should it be otherwise, if the great and wealthy manufacturers of the country keep faith with those in whose name they have so assiduously claimed the bonuses and bounties of protection? It would indeed be more than Punic bad faith on their part, if, after using their employés as cat's paws to pull the chestnuts from the fire, they should refuse them something like a respectable division of the chestnuts. I will say that if the wages of the mighty host of manufacturing laborers are not ample and satisfactory, they ought to be. It is not the fault of the laws of the land if they are not.

But the whole story of wage-earners has not yet been told. There has been suppression of facts and exaggerations of estimates to such an extent as to leave the real status of the laborer in doubt and confusion. The report of the Commissioner of Labor shows that there is little ground for the claim so often asserted that American labor has such superior compensation to that of other countries, and especially Europe. He gives us a table, for instance, in the cotton-manufacturing industry, from which it appears that in a Southern district of the United States the average daily wages in this industry was 69½ cents, while those of England in like industries were 66 cents; and the difference of wages is more than discounted by the cheaper supply of all the necessaries of life—cheaper rents, cheaper fuel, cheaper clothing, etc. I beg the indulgence of the House for submitting two tables taken from that report, from which it will be seen that while American wages in the few industries given are higher than those in Europe, yet, as a matter of fact, the amount actually saved as surplus is nearly the same in the two countries:

In conclusion on this point, I beg to submit that the idea that the American manufacturing employés as a whole are receiving such princely wages is the delusive dream of the high-protection orator of the day. Against such an idea let the protests of the labor unions of the country, and the numerous strikes more desperate and protracted than ever, speak. Theorizing is one thing, realization is another. The "bosses" and superintendents of the manufactories may be satisfied; their wages doubtless are liberal. Indeed, sir, it may be that capital all over the country is doing the very best it can for labor under the circumstances, but the fact still remains that hundreds and thousands of women and men are in the workshops and factories of the country toiling for 40 cents a day, and out of that 40 cents boarding and clothing not only themselves, but often-times their families. This is the condition that confronts us, and this is the indictment to which we must answer.

One of the greatest objections to tariff protection has been, and is, the tendency to sectional accumulation of wealth in favored localtities, where such accumulations are unnatural and forced as the result purely of special legislation. I believe, sir, that patriotism like charity should begin at home, though I concede that it ought not to end there. But, sir, when I come to observe the effects and operations of this or any other proposed law I trust I will be pardoned for considering more particularly the results upon my own people. I maintain that my own State with others of like situation and condition as compared with others of this Union has suffered in the past, and is likely to suffer in the future from the continuation of a system that reaches out and grasps all the surplus wealth of the country and concentrates and holds it in other more favored States.

The champions of protection never lose an opportunity of inculcating the doctrines that in the beginning God created the tariff, and that whatever good things have followed are the creatures of the tariff. [Applause.] If we rise in the scale of morals and civilization, it is the tariff that causes it; if agriculture quickens and we have an unusual crop of wheat and corn and rye, it is the tariff fertilizer that did it [laughter]; if our trade increases at home or abroad, it is attributable to the tariff; if the people discard their old clothes and wear more and better ones; if they display a more ravenous appetite and a more fastidious palate and eat more things and better things than they did before, and still keep clear of dyspepsia [laughter]; if they pull down their old cabins and cottages and build larger and more commodious houses, it is the tariff that did it all. And so, sir, if wealth accumulates and multiplies in the country at large and at particular localities, we are not allowed to forget the fact that it is all due to the tariff as the first great moving cause.

Now, sir, if this be true some of us have grievances to present. We are no communists, but with equal natural advantages and like conditions we claim that we ought to be able to make an equal showing in wealth. If we are not able to do so we are apt to think there is something wrong somewhere, and if it is protection that produces this inequality, then we have a right to inveigh against protection. If we take the three agricultural States of Mississippi, Alabama, and North Carolina and compare them with the three manufacturing States—New York, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania—the contrast will present in its strongest light the point I am trying to make. The total assessed valuation of the property in the three agricultural States named at the different periods was as follows:

States.	1880.	1890.
Mississippi	$110,628,129	$157,518,906
Alabama	123,867,228	197,080,441
North Carolina	156,100,202	212,697,287
Total	389,593,559	567,296,637

In the three manufacturing States it was as follows:

States.	1880.	1890.
Massachusetts	$1,584,756,802	$2,154,134,646
New York	2,651,940,006	3,775,325,938
Pennsylvania	1,683,459,016	2,592,841,032
Total	5,920,155,824	8,522,301,616

The aggregate wealth of the three agricultural States in 1880 was $389,595,559, and in 1890 it was $567,296,634, a gain in ten years of $177,701,075. In the three manufacturing States the aggregate wealth was in 1880 $5,920,155,824, while in 1890 it had reached the sum $8,522,381,596, an increase of $2,602,145,772.

The increase of wealth in the manufacturing States exceeds that of the agricultural States by $2,424,444,697, an amount nearly four times as great as the total wealth of the latter in 1890. In New York the increase was, in round numbers, $1,123,000,000; in Massachusetts, $560,000,000; and in Pennsylvania, $909,000,000; while in Mississippi it was $46,000,000, in Alabama $74,000,000, and in North Carolina $56,000,000. If you were to distribute this wealth per capita each individual would have as follows: In Mississippi, $122; in Alabama, $130; in North Carolina, $131; in Massachusetts, $962; in New York, $829; in Pennsylvania, $493. The average wealth by the head of the agricultural group was $102, and that of the manufacturing States $601, a ratio of nearly 6 to 1.

Massachusetts has been conspicuous for the advocacy of protection. Her industrial classes have been active and vigilant in the support of the system. I venerate the old Commonwealth for the splendid record of her Revolutionary patriots and heroes. Even those of later days, her scholars, her statesmen, and her orators have imparted an enviable luster to her name. Without, therefore, wishing to be invidious or offensive, I desire as a conclusion of the comparison I have undertaken to present the parallel of Massachusetts and my own State. In 1890 the population of Massachusetts was 2,238,943, and that of North Carolina 1,617,947. The area of Massachusetts is 7,800 square miles, and that of North Carolina 50,704 square miles.

The total wealth of Massachusetts, as before stated, was, in 1890, $2,154,134,646, and that of North Carolina was $212,697,287. The per capita wealth of Massachusetts being $962, and that of North Carolina, $131, the question arises, Whence this difference? Can it be accounted for on the assumption that Massachusstts has superior natural advantages? With all his State pride, I have heard no citizen of that State boast of her climate or her soil. He can not afford to do so. I have recently visited this historic old State under circumstances and upon an occassion well calculated to lend an enhanced value to her natural resources, and an additional charm to the beauty of her landscape.

I believe I can do her justice. In no point of natural advantage can she be compared to the old "North State." She is without the sunshine, the exuberance of climate, the diversity and fertility of soil that constitute North Carolina one of the most naturally eligible sections of the Union. And yet she boasts, and justly, that she has outstripped us in the race for wealth as $962 is to $131, and this calculation does not include a large amount of untaxed United States bonds held by her citizens as their chief investment. Her workmen, they tell us, are enjoying liberal wages, living in ease and independence, while her political economists labor as best they can to convince the balance of the country that it is the most natural thing in the world that matters should be just so. Sir, we have submitted to this state of affairs for more than half a century, and it is high time for a revolution along this line, a revolution radical yet lawful and just, infringing upon the natural rights of no class or section, and in perfect harmony with the general prosperity of the entire country.

We are told by the opponents of this bill that one of the results of its operation will be a Treasury deficit, and we are conjured therefore to avoid all reduction of taxation on this account. We are asked whence is to come the revenue with which to meet our public obligations and to maintain the public credit. I answer by saying that the untold wealth of this nation is back of all of its obligations, and there is no cause of alarm. But, sir, other legislation is to follow this bill, or at least ought to follow, looking to the equalization of taxation. I have said that a tariff for revenue is the only defensible tariff, and the only kind contemplated by the framers of the Constitution, but I do not contend that it is absolutely just and equitable.

Under this system of raising revenue the amount of tax paid by each individual depends upon the amount of the taxed commodity consumed by him. Now, sir, in the economy of nature there is a limitation to the amount of food consumed by each person, and in a democratic county like ours the simple tastes of our people prescribe, as a rule, a reasonable limitation upon the quantity of clothes used by them. So that as a matter of fact the independent yeoman in comfortable circumstances eats as much and clothes himself as well as the millionaire, and therefore upon these subjects pays as much tax as the millionaire. In other words, the tariff in this regard is more of a poll than a property tax.

Now, sir, the people of the country have conceived the idea that property and wealth ought to bear their just proportion of the burden of maintaining this Government. They can not and will not tamely submit to the idea of a man worth from three to five thousand dollars, and even less, paying as much tax as a Vanderbilt or a Rockefeller, with a hundred million of dollars each at his command. [Applause.] We are expected to impose an income tax, and we will be recreant to our pledges if we do not see that it is levied. [Applause.]

In conclusion I would make an especial appeal to the Democrats of the House to see to it that the promises made by us as a party be, so far as in our power lies, executed to the letter and the spirit.

We have been in session ordinary and extraordinary for several months and we have not as yet fulfilled those promises. We have promised the people of the country financial reform, and such reform necessarily involves an increase of the volume of currency. We have promised to maintain gold and silver as a part of the currency of the country, preserving their parity and continuing the coinage of each. So far we have not kept this pledge. We have promised to provide a home currency by the establishment of State banks. So far we have taken no step in this direction. We have promised tariff reform and reduction, and it remains to be seen whether we shall keep this pledge. I trust we shall. As a party we have been greatly trusted; let us measure the extent of our obligation by the extent of this trust. [Applause.] Let us keep faith with the people and the people will keep faith with us. [Applause.]

[Mr. SPERRY withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, I expected simply to extend my remarks in the RECORD and shall do so, but I want to reply somewhat to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SPERRY], with reference to his theory of the consumption of imported goods that are affected by a tariff law. His theory is a novel one to me. It is one I never heard advanced by any other gentleman, either upon this floor or elsewhere, or by any political economist. The ports of entry of this country are not numerous, and when we come to the ports that receive the largest share of imported goods, like New York, Philadelphia, and Boston, they distribute goods all over the United States and consumers are coextensive with the civilization of this country. Consumption is not limited by State lines or by districts, and can not be so in the very nature of trade and business. And this statement that South Carolina must necessarily consume only the goods that come through her ports is one the like of which I never heard before.

The gentleman allows nothing for the fact that the merchants of that State, for instance, purchase from importers in Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and Baltimore, which goods they distribute all over the State and elsewhere. To say that State lines shall be regarded as limitations upon the consumption of goods is, in my mind, a monstrous proposition. Therefore I think the gentleman's figures, while doubtless correct as to the imports of goods in the different ports of the South, and in the North as well, yet they prove nothing to my mind in the way of showing the distribution of those goods or where they are consumed.

Mr. Chairman, I will extend the remainder of my remarks in the RECORD, and surrender the floor.

[Mr. POST addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BROOKSHIRE having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BAILEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4864) reducing taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HENDRIX. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

ISSUE AND SALE OF BONDS.

Mr. PEFFER. I submit a resolution, which I ask may be read and go over under the rule.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas, on the 17th day of January, 1894, the Secretary of the Treasury did prepare and publish the following notice:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
"Washington, D. C., January 17, 1894.

"By virtue of the authority contained in the act entitled 'An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments,' approved January 14, 1875, the Secretary of the Treasury hereby offers for public subscription an issue of bonds of the United States to the amount of $50,000,000, in either registered or coupon form, in denominations of $50 and upwards, redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the Government after ten years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest, payable quarterly in coin, at the rate of 5 per cent per annum.

"Proposals for the whole or any part of these bonds will be received at the Treasury Department, office of the Secretary, until 12 o'clock, noon, on the 1st day of February, 1894. Proposals should state the amount of bonds desired, whether registered or coupon, and the premium which the subscriber proposes to pay, the place where it is desired that the bonds shall be delivered, and the office, whether that of the Treasurer of the United States or an Assistant Treasurer of the United States, where it will be most convenient for the subscriber to deposit the amount of his subscription. Failure to specify the above particulars may cause the proposal to be rejected.

"As soon as practicable, after the 1st day of February, 1894, the allotment of bonds will be made to the highest bidders therefor, but no proposal will be considered at a lower price than 117.223, which is the equivalent of a 3 per cent bond at par, and the right to reject any and all proposals is hereby expressly reserved. In case the bids entitled to allotment exceed the bonds to be issued, they will be allotted pro rata.

"Notices of the date of delivery of the bonds will be sent to the subscribers to whom allotments are made as soon as practicable, and within ten days from the date of such notice subscriptions must be paid in United States gold coin to the Treasurer or such assistant treasurer of the United States as the subscriber has designated, and if not so paid the proposal may be rejected.

"The bonds will be dated February 1, 1894, and when payment is made therefor, as above, accrued interest on both principal and premium from February 1, 1894, to date of payment, at the rate of interest realized to the subscriber on his investment, will be added.

"All proposals should be addresssd to the Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C., and should be distinctly marked 'Proposals for subscriptions to 5 per cent bonds.'

"J. G. CARLISLE, Secretary."

And whereas there is nothing in said notice to show that there is immediate or prospective need for the sale of bonds to accomplish the object sought by Congress in the enactment of the resumption law of January 14, 1875; and

Whereas the Secretary of the Treasury has no authority to issue and sell bonds for any other purpose than that set out in said resumption act: Therefore

Be it resolved by the Senate, That, in the opinion of this body, the Secretary of the Treasury has no lawful authority for issuing and selling bonds as proposed in the notice aforesaid.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The Senator from Kansas, who introduced the resolution, asks that it may lie over until to-morrow under the rule.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest that the resolution be printed and lie over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will lie over and be printed, if there be no objection.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit a resolution and ask that it be printed and lie on the table. I give notice that on Thursday of next week I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to be heard upon the resolution.

The resolution was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That in the judgment of the Senate of the United States the Secretary of the Treasury is not clothed under existing laws with any legal authority to issue and sell the bonds or other interest-bearing obligations of the Government, and any such bonds or obligations thus issued would be null and void.

SETTLERS ON INDIAN LANDS IN SOUTH DAKOTA.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I present a letter from the Commissioner on Indian Affairs to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, to accompany the bill (S. 131) making an appropriation to pay the damages resulting to the persons who went upon the Crow Creek and Winnebago Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, between the 17th day of February and the 27th day of April, 1885. I move that the letter be printed and lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

THE RUSSIAN THISTLE.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I present from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture in response to a letter from the chairman of the committee requesting the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture on the bill (S. 1237) providing for the destruction and extermination of the noxious plant or weed known as "saltwort," or "Russian thistle," or "cactus." I move that the communication be printed and lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

CONDITION OF THE CIVIL SERVICE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there are no other resolutions the morning business has closed, and the Calendar is in order.

Mr. CALL. There was a resolution under consideration by the Senate yesterday morning, and which went over until this morning. I ask that it may be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Florida that according to the rules the resolution has been placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CALL. I understood that it was laid over with the express understanding that it would come up to-day. That was the request of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], and also of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that although that suggestion or request was made by a Senator, there was no order of the Senate made, and consequently the resolution has been placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Florida can move to take up the resolution.

Mr. CALL. I move, then, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida asks, in accordance with what he supposed was the consent of the Senate, that the resolution which went over yesterday be now considered. The Chair hears no objection. Does the Senator desire to have the resolution read?

Mr. CALL. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. CALL on the 16th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment be required to examine into the condition of the civil service of the United States and the expediency of its retention or increase, and to report to the Senate by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CALL. I ask for the consideration of the resolution, and a vote upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the adoption of the resolution. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. BERRY. I understood the Senator from Florida yesterday morning to move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment. I think there ought to be an amendment to the resolution, and if he is going to ask for its adoption I should like to have it go over until to-morrow morning, with a view of offering an amendment. I understood that it was to go to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. CALL. If there is any particular desire that the resolution shall go to the committee I have no objection to a reference, but it simply directs the committee to make an inquiry. If the Senator from Arkansas wishes to move an amendment to it I ask unanimous consent that it be allowed to go over, to be taken up to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent that the resolution shall go over and be taken up to-morrow morning. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

METHODS OF ACCOUNTING IN POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. VILAS. I ask the consent of the Senate for the consideration, out of its order, of the bill (H. R. 4610) to improve the methods of accounting in the Post-Office Department, and for other purposes.

This is the second one of the two bills which were brought into Congress by the joint commission appointed under the act for the examination of the methods of business in the Department. As I presume will be in the remembrance of every Senator, this bill was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads for its examination, and in a pretty full meeting of the committee it was examined and unanimously reported back favorably with one amendment to correct a mistake in a single particular.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was, in section 4, line 5, after the word "shall," to strike out "immediately after the close of the present fiscal year," and insert "as soon as practicable after this act takes effect;" so as to read:

SEC. 4. That section 5 of said act of March 3, 1883, be amended to read as follows:

"That the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department shall, as soon as practicable after this act takes effect, transmit to the Postmaster-General a statement of the aggregate amount of domestic money orders and postal notes which shall have remained unpaid for a period of one year or more from the last day of the month of their issue."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL BANK INTERESTS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first business on the Calendar under Rule VIII will be stated.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. STEWART September 11, 1893, providing for a committee to inquire if any Senator is or has been a stockholder of or directly or indirectly interested in any national bank.

Mr. STEWART. Let that resolution lie over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over. Shall it go over under Rule IX?

Mr. STEWART. We are under Rule VIII now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is now acting under Rule VIII.

Mr. STEWART. Let the resolution go over under Rule IX. There will be more time for its consideration under that rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be placed under Rule IX.

WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN.

Mr. TELLER. Do I understand that this call of the Calendar is under Rule VIII?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution which has been laid before the Senate is the first case on the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. TELLER. I believe Senate bill 341 was passed over in my absence. I do not know but that it may be considered under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of Senate bill 341, which is upon the Calendar under Rule IX. The Chair is advised that when that bill was passed over the Senate was considering bills under Rule IX, but that it was passed without prejudice. Perhaps properly it should be laid before the Senate at this time. The title of the bill will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 341) to submit to the Court of Private Land Claims, established by an act of Congress approved March 3, 1891, the title of William McGarrahan to the Rancho Panoche Grande, in the State of California, and for other purposes.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope that bill will not be taken up to-day. A bill of such importance, I think, ought to have a day fixed for its consideration of which previous notice should be given.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator objects, of course the bill can not be taken up under this rule.

Mr. MORRILL. I should not like to have the bill taken up to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the bill should be placed among the Calender of cases under Rule VIII.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then the Senator from Colorado can give notice that he will call the bill up on a certain day.

Mr. TELLER. I give notice that on the next legislative day immediately after the disposal of the routine morning business, I shall move to take up the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope not, for there are some questions of importance coming up on the next legislative day which will undoubtedly occupy considerable time; for instance, the elections bill.

Mr. TELLER. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that the bill to which I have referred will not interfere with the elections bill. I give notice that I shall move to take up the bill on the first legislative day after to-day. Of course, if there should be any objection to proceeding with it at that time, that question can then be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the meantime the bill will be placed among the cases under Rule VIII on the Calendar.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

CONTRACTS FOR DEPARTMENTAL SUPPLIES.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (H. R. 4292) to amend section 3709 of the Revised Statutes relating to contracts for supplies in the Departments in Washington.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill merely affects the method of advertising for bids in obtaining supplies for the Departments. It requires that all advertisements for supplies shall be on one day and that all the bids shall be opened on that day, and then leaves the method just as it is now. It affects the existing law only as far as that is concerned. There having been some doubt in regard to the exact language of the bill as it came from the other House, I have prepared a substitute which confines the operation of the bill to advertising and receiving the bids on one day so that there may be uniformity in the prices paid by the different Departments for the same articles. We except from its operation the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the Public Printing Office, as it is not considered that they ought to be brought under the bill. They have so many different kinds of things to purchase that it might be injurious to them. I ask that the amendment, to strike out all after a certain part and insert what I send to the desk, may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "following" in line 4, and to insert:

And the advertisement for such proposals shall be made by all the Executive Departments, including the Department of Labor, the United States Fish Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Smithsonian Institution, the Government Printing Office, the government of the District of Columbia, and the Superintendent of the State, War, and Navy building except for paper and materials for use of the Government Printing Office and materials used in the work of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, which shall continue to be advertised for and purchased as now provided by law, on the same days, and shall each designate 2 o'clock post meridian of such days for the opening of all such proposals in each Department and other Government establishments in the city of Washington; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall designate the day or days in each year for the opening of such proposals and give due notice thereof to the other Departments and Government establishments.

Such proposals shall be opened in the usual way and schedules thereof duly prepared, and together with the statement of the proposed action of each Department and Government establishment thereon, shall be submitted to a board of three officers, consisting of the chief clerks of the Treasury, Interior, and Post-Office Departments, or such other official representative of each of said Departments as the head thereof shall designate, at a meeting to be called by the official of the Treasury Department, who shall be chairman thereof, and said board shall carefully examine and compare all the proposals so submitted and recommend the acceptance or rejection of any or all of said proposals. And if any or all of such proposals shall be rejected, advertisements for proposals shall again be invited and proceeded with in the same manner.

So as to make the bill read:

That section 3709 of the Revised Statutes is amended by adding thereto the following:

"And the advertisement for such proposals shall be made," etc.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to suggest a modification of the amendment by striking out the words "chief clerks of the Treasury, Interior, and Post-Office Departments" and inserting "assistant secretaries" instead. That will give greater responsibility to the board. I will also strike out the words "or such other official representative of each of said Departments as the head thereof shall designate." That will confine it to assistant secretaries, and will give more responsibility than the other method.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The modification will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to modify the amendment so as to make the latter part of it read:

Such proposals shall be opened in the usual way and schedules thereof duly prepared, and together with the statement of the proposed action of each Department and Government establishment thereon, shall be submitted to a board of three officers, consisting of the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, Interior, and Post-Office Departments, at a meeting to be called by the official of the Treasury Department, who shall be chairman thereof, etc.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it read, "Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury and Interior Departments, and the First Assistant Postmaster General." In the Post-Office Department there is no assistant secretary. There might be some contention as to whether he was an assistant secretary. It will then read:

Shall be submitted to a board of three officers consisting of the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury and Interior Departments and the First Assistant Postmaster-General of the Post-Office Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 339) to authorize the Chattanooga Western Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Tennessee River, near Chattanooga.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate providing for the printing of 8,000 copies of the Thirteenth Annual Report of the Director of the Bureau of Ethnology.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate providing for the printing of 10,000 extra copies of the Report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year ending June 30, 1893.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 3195) granting a pension to Lovica Hall, a widow of a soldier of the war of 1812; and

A bill (H. R. 4449) fixing the limit of indebtedness which may be incurred by Salt Lake City.

STATUE OF MAJ. GEN. JOHN STARK.

Mr. GALLINGER. A few days ago I asked unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 15) for the erection of an equestrian statue of Maj. Gen. John Stark, in the city of Manchester, N. H. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] objected to its consideration, but he has since assured me he will content himself with voting against the bill, and will not object to its being considered. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered now.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Library with an amendment, in section 1, line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "forty," so as to read:

That the sum of $40,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the erection of an equestrian statue of Maj. Gen. John Stark, within the limits of the city of Manchester, N. H., and for the proper preparation, grading, and inclosing of the lot and foundation upon which said statue shall be erected, which sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, or such officer as he may designate.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not like to do anything unpleasant to the Senator from New Hampshire nor to the people of the good State of New Hampshire, but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to this proposed departure from the general practice of the Government, which is to confine its ornaments of statuary etc., to the city of Washington. The District of Columbia is the only ground in the United States which is subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress. It may be that in its history heretofore the United States has provided ornaments and monuments for different cities of the Union, but if so I think the cases have been very rare. Perhaps the Senator from New Hampshire may tell us of some cases where it has been done.

There is no man whose character is more interesting than that of Gen. Stark. He was one of the bravest and best soldiers of the Revolutionary period. He was a man of remarkable vigor and probably his name is among the cherished names of all who love Revolutionary history.

I should certainly be very glad to see a monument of Gen. Stark, either in the Capitol at Washington or in one of the parks about Washington, but I very much doubt the expediency of embarking in the execution of works of this kind to be placed in different cities of the Union. New York, Philadelphia, and all the great cities may call upon the Congress of the United States to immortalize in marble the heroes and patriots of the different States. Ohio would be very glad indeed to indicate worthy names for appropriate monuments to be erected at the capitol at Columbus. But if we enter upon that course there will be no end to it.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask my honorable friend a question? I ask him whether he does not think it would be wise for the national authority to erect at Marietta, in the State of Ohio, a monument in commemoration of the founders of that State?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think if an appeal were made to the Legislature of Ohio they would be very willing to order it.

Mr. HOAR. I thought my honorable friend introduced a bill to have it done by Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. It may be that I introduced a bill of that kind; but so far as I now recall I think such a bill was never passed. As a matter of course no event in our history is more important than the early settlement of the Northwest at Marietta, mainly by the people of Massachusetts. It is an event that ought to be commemorated and it was recently commemorated in a most striking and graphic manner. There were two anniversary celebrations. Disagreeing as to the day which ought to be celebrated the people held two magnificent anniversary festivals, I may say, in which the Senator from Massachusetts and myself and others participated and made speeches.

But it seems to me that we ought not to extend the building, by the Government of the United States, of monuments in memory of persons of distinction, whose death perhaps came before the framing of the Constitution of the United States. I only speak of this as a warning, because if we embark upon the movement as a matter of course there will be no end to it. There were events and men in the history of our country before the Constitution was formed, and in every State in the Union since it was formed, which ought to be commemorated by marble and by story and by song, but it seems to me it ought to be left to the States to do these things. Although I am not much of a State-rights man and believe in the strong powers of the General Government, I hesitate to enter upon the adornment of the capitals of the different States of the Union by monuments such as the one now proposed to be erected.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am, I confess, somewhat surprised at the objection the Senator from Ohio has urged against the bill. A similar bill carrying a larger appropriation has passed the Senate twice, and, if I mistake not, three times.

I am not prepared to-day nor would it be wise to enter into a discussion of the great achievements of Maj. Gen. John Stark. New Hampshire has not been unmindful of what that great man did at Bunker Hill, at Bennington, and at Trenton to establish our Government. I think there are very few citizens of the Republic who are unmindful of his valor, his patriotism, and his wonderful career as a soldier of the Revolution.

My State has erected a statue of Maj. Gen. Stark in the park of the State house at the capital. The last Legislature of my State passed an appropriation to place a statue of Maj. Gen. Stark in Statuary Hall at Washington. In the city of Manchester, where lie his remains and the remains of his illustrious father, who came over from Scotland in the early days of this country, a rude monument marks the spot. The city desires to give a proper plot of ground if the Government—which owes so much to this man, in my judgment, perhaps more than to any other one citizen of this great country—will appropriate a small sum of money to erect a monument in commemoration of his grand deeds.

I do not know how many precedents there are for the action which is now asked of the Congress of the United States. I have not looked up that matter. My attention has not before been called to it, but I think there are precedents. However, whether there are precedents or not, it seems to me it will do no harm for the Congress of the United States, remembering the great achievements of this illustrious soldier, to establish a precedent. I am reminded by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] that Congress contributed a statue at Plymouth, in the State of Massachusetts. So there is at least one precedent for the action that is proposed at the present time.

When the State of New Hampshire sends a statue of Maj. Gen. Stark to be placed in Statuary Hall, doubtless my colleague and myself will ask the indulgence of the Senate to talk a little while, more especially to the younger generation, about what this great soldier did to establish our Republic. It is not necessary for us to do so to the Senate, because I presume every Senator from the South as well as the North knows what Gen. Stark did for his country.

I hope there will be no objection to the consideration of the bill, and that it may be passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, it is true a similar bill has passed the Senate once or twice. It has always been passed over my opposition. I am opposed, as the Senator from Ohio well says, to the policy of the National Government engaging in the erection of monuments in the various States and localities of the Union. Everybody admits the patriotism and distinguished services of the great man in whose honor this monument is proposed to be erected. So far as the amount of money is concerned, it is no equivalent for his patriotism and his services. If we were to exhaust our Treasury a thousand times we could not make a full equivalent compensation for the patriotism and services of our Revolutionary sires. It is useless for us to undertake now to make in dollars and cents an equivalent for their services and their patriotism and their sacrifices. Those things can not be paid for, either in dollars and cents or in monuments erected by the national or State governments.

Mr. President, at this particular juncture in our financial condition and financial history not one solitary appropriation ought to be made which is not absolutely necessary for an honest and economical administration of the living Government, the active Government, the Government of the people to-day. It is no time to be indulging in appropriations in recognition of services performed a hundred years ago, or at any other time, when at the time compensation was supposed to have been made, just as has been done all the way along in our history. I am opposed to the bill; I am opposed to all similar bills; and I desire to record my vote in opposition to such measures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on the Library.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BERRY. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], and I withhold my vote for the present.

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MCMILLAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON], but I am at liberty to vote on this question. I vote "yea."

Mr. VILAS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL]. Not knowing how he would vote, I must withhold my vote. I should vote "yea" if he were present.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DIXON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL]. I notice that he did not respond to his name on the roll call, and I withdraw my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the affirmative). It is proper I should state that I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], but as he reported the bill and is in favor of it, I took the liberty of voting.

Mr. DUBOIS. May I inquire whether a quorum has voted? I am at liberty to vote if my vote is necessary to make a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no right to inform a Senator whether a quorum has voted.

Mr. DUBOIS. I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to announce my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—28.

Allison,	Cullom,	Frye,	Hawley,

Daniel,	Hoar,	Proctor,	White, Cal.
Dixon,	Hunton,	Pugh,	Wolcott.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the passage of the bill, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I did not have an opportunity to vote on the bill because of my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], who is not present. If he were present I should vote against it, and in doing so I would violate some of the most sincere sentiments of my nature.

We ought to honor the Revolutionary heroes who have conferred not only great renown and honor upon the country, but who established its liberties. However, we have fallen upon such evil times, and the people of the United States by our legislation have been deprived of the use of their natural and other resources to such an extent that we are actually too poor to honor the memory of our ancesters, the great and glorious men who fought in the Revolutionary war. To build monuments we can not afford to borrow money at 5 per cent, and that is what we are about to do now upon a very questionable use of the statutes, for the purpose, I understand, of fortifying the gold reserve in the Treasury for the benefit of banks and bankers and dealers in gold coin and gold bullion. That class of patriotic and needy citizens of course must first of all be taken care of, and we must be just before we are generous. We are told that is the philosophy of good morals and good politics. Those men seem to have a claim upon the different departments of the United States, legislative and executive, which it is impossible to resist. We must yield to them in every demand that they make; and if we should impoverish ourselves to such an extent that we can not consult the better qualities and properties of our hearts and minds, of course so be it.

I am put in a category here where I can not, in justice to the people of the United States, vote any money out of its Treasury for any other than a work of absolute necessity until the financial situation of the country is changed, and until we have realized to the last degree what I conceive to be the unwisdom of that policy which locks up all our resources and puts us to the beggary, I will call it, of borrowing money for our daily support rather than to have collected out of the people such revenues as are necessary for the support of the Government, and putting within their ability and within their power the opportunity of paying what we ask of them. They do not cheerfully withhold anything that makes for the glory and the honor of the United States. They certainly are willing, even at the most extreme sacrifice, to supply all the necessities of the Government, even though they may be considered as extravagant necessities, created by unnecessary outlays under acts of Congress.

But, sir, the people of the United States are not able to stand any more burdens. No matter how much money there may be in the country, no matter though it may be rifted up in the banks and placed under lock in their vaults to the amount of hundreds of millions of dollars, no matter though the banks in New York to-day are richer than the Government of the United States and have more money under their control, the people have no opportunity to get hold of it. It does not circulate simply because the Government and the banks will not allow it to circulate. The resources are here. The crops are made. The world needs them. The necessity in fact is imperious for food and raiment and the other elementary productions that we so abound in in this and all other countries. While wheat in the West is selling for 40 cents a bushel or thereabouts men are going about Washington City who have been accustomed to work, able and willing to work, almost literally begging their bread. Under such circumstances I must wait before I can vote for a bill so meritorious even as this is. I must wait until our country gets in a condition where we can say to the people, "We are not casting burdens upon you unnecessarily."

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I feel very sensibly the force of the remarks made by the Senator from Alabama, but I regard this as a very meritorious measure. I have voted for a similar bill on several occasions before, and I should be very glad to see the appropriation made.

I am aware of the fact that we are about adopting war measures. It is not done because there is any visible enemy in the field. The trouble is that our enemy is invisible to the people, but it is really a war. It is a war which the money powers are waging against industry and production; and we are increasing the annual debt to carry on that war to reduce places. The great revolution which was inaugurated twenty years ago is now being conducted with great vigor. The destruction of one-half of the world's money and the reduction of prices that necessarily follows are being severely felt. The burdens of the Government must necessarily increase.

As the value of money advances the burdens will be continually made correspondingly heavier. That we all understand. To raise $500,000,000 annually to pay the current expenses is double the burden that it would be if we had not destroyed half our money. The debt of the people of the United States, the lowest estimate of which I believe is about $30,000,000,000, is a sore burden to bear with the shrinking volume of currency.

I am aware of all that; but as we are carrying on a war against the industries and adopting war measures for that purpose, I believe I will not change my vote upon this question. I shall still vote for this appropriation, knowing as I do that it is adding to the grievous burden, but it is not a feather's weight compared with the heavy hand of oppression which we see indicated by the publication in this morning's papers.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I only rise to say that I agree with the distinction that was made by the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in regard to an appropriation for the statues of distinguished men and Revolutionary heroes at other places than the national capital. I think, when we consider the temptation that there will be for unlimited appropriations in this regard to be expended in the States, it is a very wise and conservative distinction to draw, and that the statues and other memorials of the heroes of our heroic age should be placed in the national capital. The States have not been derelict in their duty in this regard, and they will abundantly take care of the name and fame of their heroes in the form of their statehood.

Apart from the condition of the National Treasury at this time, I do not think that even otherwise it would be good policy to open the door for a practice such as is indicated by the bill which the Senator from New Hampshire has in charge. I say this with reluctance and regret, because I would be very glad to oblige my good friend from New Hampshire in promoting the object which he has at heart for his people. I do not think, though, that it is wise, or politic, or expedient at this time to appropriate money for such a purpose. Gen. Stark's name and fame are embalmed in the hearts of his countrymen. A statue of him has already been erected by the State of New Hampshire, as the Senator says, in the State house grounds at the capital of that State; he is to be remembered and his memory perpetuated in Statuary Hall in this Capitol building; and there seems to be no pressing exigency to provide that he shall not be forgotten, as he never will be.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I voted for an appropriation for this purpose at a previous session of Congress, and I hoped to vote for it again. I believe it is a worthy thing for the United States to erect statues to our Revolutionary heroes, and in the States which gave them to this great country. I voted for this appropriation this morning. Upon reflection, at the present time I believe it to be my duty to change that vote for the reason suggested by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART]. I do not believe our financial situation is such as that I should be justified at this particular juncture in following the suggestion of my own heart and the nation's patriotic desire to pay this tribute to a State and to a hero who served his country in time of its utmost need.

Congress has seen fit to curtail the supply of money in this country at a time when it was famishing for it. We are in that famine, and every part of the land is feeling it, and, as we are advised by the Secretary of the Treasury, we have upon us a deficit which, according to his plan, is to be supplied by a recurrence to the credit of the country and the issue of bonds. According to the scheme of taxation which has been propounded, it would seem as if this deficit were to become for some years at least one of the institutions of our country, to be continuously fed by an extension of its credit, by the hoarding up of more money in the Treasury, and by a continuance of depressed financial conditions.

I should not feel warranted in my conscience at such a time in adding a feather's weight to the burdens of an afflicted people. While I have every sympathy with the object of the bill and dislike that my name should be put in an adverse vote toward it, our national poverty and not my will consents.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, perhaps it will be proper, as chairman of the Committee on the Library, as I made the report to the Senate in favor of the passage of this bill, that I should say a word as to why the report was made. It was because it has become a fixed and established policy of this Government to build monuments to its distinguished citizens. We have now in process of erection monuments to Gen. Logan, Gen. Hancock, and perhaps others. Fifty thousand dollars has been appropriated by Congress for the erection of these monuments.

Mr. GRAY. In this city?

Mr. MILLS. Not in this city, but for building them out of the public Treasury.

Mr. GRAY. In this city?

Mr. MILLS. I do not care where we are building them, we are building them out of the public Treasury.

Mr. GRAY. I only asked for information.

Mr. MILLS. It is not a question about the location, if I understand the objections made by the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Delaware, but it is as to the condition of the public Treasury.

If we are to begin the business of cutting down appropriations, I have no objection, if it is the desire of Senators and Representatives, to suspend for the present the business of building monuments to illustrious citizens who have done so much to establish and perpetuate the Government.

For myself, sir, I am in favor of building monuments to great men. I think they are great school-teachers. They impress great lessons upon those who have come after them and those who are still to come after them, and I am glad whenever I have an opportunity to vote to build these monuments to perpetuate the memory of the illustrious deeds of our ancestors.

I think that we might in some other part of our expenditures do some curtailing more appropriately than to commence with Stark and Francis Marion. The very first bugle note that I have heard sound in this Chamber for retrenchment and reform is to turn our backs upon the memories of two of the most illustrious men who founded this Government.

In obedience to American sentiment, strong, all-pervading among its people, when these measures have been before presented to this body they have been passed without a single dissenting voice. The Committee on the Library has reported in favor of erecting these monuments to these two illustrious scions of our Revolutionary days, and if we are getting so poor that we can not afford to build these monuments, I think we are getting in a very pitiable condition.

Mr. President, we may hear sometime during this session more evidences and more appeals for economy, but we shall not hear them when great appropriations are asked for, many of which are not wanted by the Government.

I leave to the Senate to pursue its own course in this matter. For me, I will not start the knife of economy upon the name of Francis Marion or John Stark.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, this appropriation is now, I believe, proposed to be made $40,000. There are about seventy million people in this country or will be by the time this statue is planned and the monument erected. So that it is about a half a cent apiece that the people of the United States are asked to pay.

We never have been in the habit of proposing many of these things in the same Congress; the Library Committee regulates that; and I do not suppose that it is likely that during the coming two years there will be any others proposed except this and the South Carolina one. If there should be four of them, it would be two cents apiece all around.

I differ with the Senators who think that, even in what we call hard times, this country is not rich and powerful enough and the people of the country are not willing to pay a proper tribute of respect to their heroes. I think the poorest person in the country, animated by an American spirit, would be—I was about to say, and I think I could say with truth—the most likely, in spite of hardship or want, to favor this kind of appropriation.

I differ also with Senators who think that these monuments ought to be put at the national capital. I think they ought to be put at the places where the men were born, where they died and perfomed their heroic actions. The whole country in New England is full of the memories and traditions of John Stark, and the whole country in South Carolina is full of the traditions and memories of Marion and Sumter.

Mr. President, these monuments educate the child who never is educated from books. They educate the child before the education of books begins.

The military spirit of the French people, the military and naval spirit of the English people, has been educated and trained and has grown because the French or the English child finds in every market place, in every public square of a great city, monuments to the men who have done their good fighting. Over every public square in an important city you will find towering the monument to Nelson or to Wellington or to Rodney. I suppose not 25 per cent of the French people even to-day are able to read and write. It is these monuments to Bonaparte in the Place Vendome, to the great marshals who accompanied him, to Lannes and to Ney, which educate in the French people the trait which responded to the great refrain:

Sons of France, awake to glory!

I want to see these things done at national cost, by national gratitude, and by the national power. It is not because the State of New Hampshire wants to save thirty or forty thousand dollars that her Senators propose that this tribute to the great New England soldier should be paid; it is because she desires there should come to him and to those who prize his fame the great honor and satisfaction of an expression of national gratitude. The monument when built by Congress is worth tenfold what it would be if built by any State, however respectable.

Where should the soldier rest but where he fell? Where should the monument to the soldier be built, but where he fell? I do not think there is ever any danger that we shall get too many.

I want to see a monument built by national gratitude to Marion and to Sumter. I want to see the great deed of George Rogers Clarke commemorated in the town of Lexington, where his dust sleeps. I want to see the great civic service of James Madison commemorated by national gratitude either at the national capital or in the State of Virginia. The State of the honorable Senator who has just spoken is so rich in heroes, that even in that magnificent work of art at the capitol in Richmond, where the statues of six great men surround that of Washington, there was no room for James Madison. I wish and I hope the Senators from Virginia will ask us before long to supply that need at the national cost.

George Rogers Clarke, having a little handful of men, holding a fort in the Northwest, in the forest, had the only military force in the great Northwestern domain, except an English force of ten times his power, which could, I suppose, have taken his little handful of men in an ordinary attack in an hour. He did not evacuate the fort and did not wait to be attacked, but he moved his own force through the forests and surprised the British garrison just before daybreak. He captured ten times his own number, and the result was that on the principle of uti possidetis we held the great Northwest, and our boundary was established where it is, instead of having the Ohio River as the northwestern boundary of the Republic. Yet that man sleeps beneath the soil of Kentucky in a grave without a stone to mark it. Mr. President, let a monument be put there, and hundreds and hundreds and thousands and thousands of American youths will gaze upon it and will learn that story by heart.

When we passed in the Senate a few years ago a bill for erecting a monument over George Rogers Clarke, an Englishman, the editor of a great New York paper, who undertakes to give us instructions in political economy, who is read more, I think, by my honorable friend from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] than by anybody else in this body, undertook to laugh and sneer at the proposition in the Senate to build a monument to this obscure and nameless man, of whom this Englishman had never heard.

I hope, Mr. President, there never will be a time, come hard times or come prosperous times, when the American Senate will not be ready, when asked by the representatives of a great State, to perform such an act as this in commemoration of her great heroes.

I said this monument would cost the people of the United States a half cent apiece. My honorable friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] corrects me and says it is half a mill apiece, the twentieth part of a cent.

Mr. PROCTOR. The Senator from Massachusetts has made my speech for me. Seventy million mills contributed by the people of the United States, I believe, would be $70,000; and $10,000 would be a contribution of a trifle over half a mill by each individual.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I take very great pleasure in voting for this bill and in giving the reasons why I vote for it; and I take great pleasure in voting for it at this particular time.

The question presents itself whether or not when business is paralyzed and people are out of employment, when there is great suffering and want in the country, is the time to stop the necessary and proper expenditures of the Government, or whether it is not wise at such a period, when the people need employment, when suffering is abroad amongst them, to disburse the money of the Government and its credit in such a way that these people will be preserved from the evils of the want of work, of destitution, and of poverty?

Mr. President, a time of general suffering and want is the period when the Government should do whatever is needful and proper and legitimate to do, and should advance the public works and expend money in order that the people may have employment, not to make it a matter of charity, not to go beyond the bounds of constitutional jurisdiction and power, but within them to distribute the money and the credit of the Government in doing whatever is proper and useful and necessary for the general good in the largest manner.

There is no question of the fact that in this country business is paralyzed to a large extent; that the ordinary sources of the distribution of the products of the country have been in some measure checked and restrained. It matters not from what cause that may be. We are not here to discuss that question. We wish to know whether or not a country of seventy million people, of inexhaustible resources, of boundless production, capable of furnishing subsistence and comfort to every one of those seventy million people, shall at this time have no relief, no assistance by the supreme legislative power of the Government, and when it can be done in strict accordance with constitutional functions and its legitimate and proper duty.

Therefore, while I concur in all the suggestions which have been made, which address themselves to the patriotic consideration of this body and of the people of this country in perpetuating the memory of those men who have been the apostles of free government, in bringing them conspicuously before the people of this and future generations, I take especial pleasure in doing it at this time, because in a small degree it furnishes employment to the people who need it to preserve them from suffering and destitution.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] seems to be under the impression that this bill has heretofore passed the Senate without opposition. If the Senator will examine the RECORD he will find that there was a very strong contest over it on one or two occasions when it was here pending. It has never passed without opposition. We had a long discussion upon it when Mr. BLAIR was one of the Senators from New Hampshire, and it has been opposed every time it has been presented.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, I stand corrected. I had understood that the bill had been passed without opposition. I regret very much to hear that there has ever been one word of opposition raised in this body to the erection of a monument either to Francis Marion or to John Stark.

History tells us that the battle of Bennington, which we won by the splendor of Stark's genius and his indomitable courage, was the cause of the fall of the British forces at Saratoga; and when we remember how much we have inherited of beneficence from that one man alone, and also from Marion, I am unwilling at this late day to interpose any objection to erecting a pile of stones to point our children to, and say that those stones were raised to the memory of one of the grandest acts in the history of the American Government and one of the grandest acts in the history of the world.

If economy, sir, is to be practiced and if we are to become alarmed at the present condition of the Treasury, let us practice it somewhere else. I agree thoroughly in all that my friend from Florida [Mr. CALL] has just said. In a time of great distress, when labor is thrown out of employment, when the streets and highways are filled with idle men, unwillingly idle, that is the time of all others when the Government ought to be liberal in its expenditure in employing the labor of the country and preventing it from starvation.

While I stand corrected as to the statement made by my friend from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], I still stand firmly for the passage of this bill and for the erection of the proposed monument.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, this bill has twice passed the Senate. On both occasions I think I not only recorded my vote against it, but made a few remarks to the Senate in opposition to it.

I do not believe that it was ever contemplated by the framers of the Constitution that the Congress of the United States should make appropriations to build statues or monuments in the various States to distinguished men who had performed distinguished services. I believe, if a monument is to be erected in New Hampshire, that New Hampshire ought to pay the bill, and not come to the General Government and ask it to appropriate money to build a statue in that State to Gen. Stark. If the monument were to be built here in the city of Washington, then there might be some reason for asking such an appropriation, but there is no reason, in my opinion, why we should appropriate money to build a statue in the State of New Hampshire or in any other State.

I am astonished to hear the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] that now, because times are hard, this Government should be more liberal in appropriating money. That is not my theory of the Constitution. My idea is that each individual citizen of the United States should look to himself, and it is not the purpose of this Government to give work to individuals throughout the United States by appropriating money which belongs to other people and does not belong to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas will please suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 2331) to repeal all statutes relating to supervisors of elections and special deputy marshals, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER.]

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be laid aside informally until the pending measure is disposed of.

Mr. GRAY. I shall not object to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire if we can have a vote now.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senate is ready to vote.

Mr. BERRY. I want two minutes more to complete what I wish to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the unfinished business be informally laid aside in order that the Senate may proceed with the consideration of the bill which was under consideration at the hour of 2 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. BERRY. I shall not object if the Senator from Delaware will consent that I may occupy not more than two minutes to conclude what I was about to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and he recognizes the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I had thought that the Senator from Texas agreed with me that the reason why distress exists in this country at this time is because the General Government has undertaken to take care of individual citizens and to give them advantages by reason of legislation enacted by this Government.

I say that I believe the distress which at present exists throughout the country is attributable to the fact that this Government has exercised a species of paternalism and has taken the money of the people, which belonged to all the people, and given it to individuals throughout the United States, sometimes by direct appropriation but more especially by tariff laws, intended to protect particular individuals and particular classes.

These are the reasons why I called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and I hope the Senate may defeat it.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator from Arkansas allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BERRY. Certainly I will.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator this question: Suppose we admit the fact that the tariff or any other cause has produced the great want and destitution in the country, does the Senator prefer that the people should starve and die rather than that the Government should expend its money for legitimate purposes?

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida knows that I want no man to starve or die; but he knows as well as I know that, according to the theory of our Government, where charity is to be given to those who are unable to make a living for themselves, who are indigent, it should be given by the States and by the counties and not by the General Government.

I say the whole theory of this Government is that there is no power under the Constitution by which we can appropriate money for the special benefit of a particular individual. That is my theory, and the Senator can not shift the issue by talking about people starving. Does he mean to say, if we are going to give charity directly to these individuals, that the best way is to vote money to build monuments all over the country? If we were going to give money to the people, I would pick out the most needy in the country and give it to them directly and specifically, if I believed as the Senator from Florida believes, rather than undertake to provide for those of a particular locality by building monuments.

Mr. GRAY. If there is going to be any continued debate I shall have to renew my objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think the bill had better go over.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think we can get a vote on it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass? upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MCMILLAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. I do not know how he would vote on this question if he were present, and I therefore refrain from voting.

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. WILSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If he were present I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DIXON. I have a general pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL], and therefore withhold my vote. I understand if he were present he would vote "nay;" I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—32.

Allison,	Frye,	Morrill,	Shoup,

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 3195) granting a pension to Lovica Hall, a widow of a soldier of the war of 1812, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (H. R. 4449) fixing the limit of indebtedness which may be incurred by Salt Lake City, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

REPEAL OF ELECTION LAWS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2331) to repeal all statutes relating to supervisors of elections and special deputy marshals, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. CHANDLER.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I favor the repeal of the present Federal election law, for the reason that the premises upon which it is based are vicious and untenable. This legislation is based upon the assumption that the people of the United States are better than the people of the States. It is one of the remarkable features of political opinion in this country that since the civil war the idea has obtained almost generally that the control of the Federal Government is under Federal officials not responsible to the people of the States. It is the most remarkable assumption that has ever entered into public life that when you take a citizen of a State and clothe him in a Federal uniform he becomes a better, more intelligent, and more patriotic man.

While the framers of the Constitution in creating the autonomy of the Government recognized Federal and State jurisdiction, every intelligent citizen knows that the fountain of power, both national and State, is in the people. The stream never rises higher than the fountain, and to say that a Federal official taken from a State becomes better and wiser and more patriotic because he draws his salary from the National Government and is clothed with national authority is simply to obliterate the fundamental principles of our Government.

Public sentiment in the United States is at last the tribunal for the adjustment and adjudication of all public measures and policies. If public sentiment in the States is such that certain legislation can not be enforced, the same difficulty would apply to legislation coming directly from the National Government. Unless legislation, State or national, is supported by public sentiment, it becomes a dead letter and can not be enforced.

It is remarkable that as legislators we seem to have come to the conclusion that we can do through national power what we can not do through State power. The whole origin of this national or Federal election law comes from the anomalous circumstances that succeeded the war in the Southern States. My friend from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] told us frankly yesterday that he favored giving suffrage to the negro, and he assigned a patriotic motive for that belief and that action. Different motives prompted public men in favoring that measure.

I undertake to say to-day that it has been the source of more calamity to the people of the United States than any other enactment upon the statute book or in the Constitution. It was based upon the idea that the negroes would be able to protect themselves, although utterly unprepared for suffrage. It was in utter antagonism to the fundamental principle upon which this Government is based, that the people are intelligent enough for self-government. When you admit that the people of the United States are not intelligent enough, are not patriotic enough to govern their own affairs and to protect their own interests, you abandon the theory upon which this Government is based and declare it an absolute failure. And when you inject into the suffrage of this country, as a part of the controlling and administrative forces of the Government, suffrage which is dangerous through ignorance, you weaken to that extent the doctrine upon which the Government must stand or fall.

When from any motive (and I am not here to assail motives) suffrage was given to a race utterly unprepared for it, who had been brutalized by slavery farther back than we have any record upon the subject, the innocent victims of circumstances over which they could possibly have had no control—when that was done we weakened just so far the doctrine of intelligent self-government upon which the institutions of the people of the United States are founded. I have no disposition to go back and discuss the question of slavery. I simply state a fact which every intelligent man in the country to-day admits. I hope for a better result than came immediately from giving suffrage to the negro race, but these results must come from moral and intellectual powers, above legislation and beyond it.

Mr. President, whenever we admit that coercion either by national or State government is necessary to make the people protect themselves we give up popular institutions in this country.

This whole legislation is based upon distrust of the people. It must be assumed that there is here in Washington and in these Halls some mystic, necromantic, and subtle influence that purifies the political atmosphere of the country when it emanates from this great source of wisdom and purity. It is absolutely believed that when we send men clothed with Federal authority amongst our constituents an aroma of patriotism is diffused in the immediate vicinity and throughout the State. Is that so? Has experience proved it to be so? Public sentiment controls in the United States, and where universal suffrage obtains this must always be the case. Public sentiment in the States is day by day becoming more averse to Federal jurisdiction, because the democratic idea, which never goes backward, is becoming stronger in this country. Who can take away suffrage from any human being to whom it is now given? Who can limit suffrage? It will continue to be extended because the irresistible impulse of intellectual thought, of the never-ceasing and never-ending desire for more freedom, for the illimitable expansion of the right to think and act, forces irresistibly larger freedom in individual and political action.

Suffrage can never be taken away, nor can you stop the democratic impulse (and I use the word "democratic" in its largest sense) towards larger liberty in every direction, generally and personally. Public sentiment, I say, is becoming more averse day by day to Federal jurisdiction, because the officials of the Federal courts are not selected by the people. Whence comes this clamor now throughout the country for the election of United States Senators by the people? It is the irresistible tendency to a purer and more absolute democracy, if I can use the word "absolute" in connection with the term democracy. It is the essential belief of the people that public servants should be chosen by themselves. When you send amongst them a Federal judge appointed by a President by and with the advice of the Senate and not elected by the people, it excites the antagonism which all of us know exists to-day throughout the country.

Mr. HIGGINS. Will the Senator from Missouri yield for a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. HIGGINS. I ask the Senator whether the same antagonism exists to the appointment of electoral commissions in the Southern States by their governors, who in turn select the election officers, so that the election officers in none of them are selected by the people at all, but in every instance either by the governor or by the Legislature of the State?

Mr. VEST. I make no exception. Take the body of the people of the United States, and when these appointments are made without consulting them they do not meet with enthusiastic popular support. I do not propose by any partisan question or allusion to be drifted away from the general tenor of the remarks I make. I am simply elaborating briefly the idea that the political coercion of the people from any source without their consent to make them better citizens is utterly antagonistic to the spirit of our institutions and the genius of our people.

A great deal could be said, Mr. President, in regard to the disastrous attempts that have been made by the National Government to regulate matters in the Southern States against public sentiment. I am not here to declare that all elections in the Southern States have been regular and according to law, and without interference that ought not to have existed. I am not here to say that the elections in the large cities are absolutely pure and fair and always reflect the wishes of a majority of the legal voters in those communities. But I am here to say that we had better—and that unless we can rely upon the intelligent patriotism of the people to correct these irregularities the case is hopeless, and Federal coercion will never correct it.

Bear those ills we have than fly to others that we know not of—

The condition in the Southern States to-day is the most peculiar in all history. I do not propose to go into an irritating argument based upon sectional ideas as to what has resulted from giving suffrage to the negroes of the South. My friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE] suggested to us yesterday that he wanted to hear something upon this side of the Chamber that he could answer. I want him now (and I call his especial attention to it) to examine the report in the contested-election case of Hill against Catchings, in the House of Representatives, I think for the Fiftieth Congress. He will find in the testimony accompanying that report the sworn statements of more than twenty intelligent Northern men of the highest standing, clergymen, lawyers, business men from the New England and other States, who went South after the war, many of them officers in the Federal Army, who had shown their patriotism by risking life and limb upon the battlefield in defense of the Union; and they testified without exception that although Republicans who had never scratched a ticket, when they went to the State of Mississippi and found that negro domination meant absolute destruction of personal security and personal rights, they were forced by an instinct of self-preservation to act with the Democratic party.

Mr. FRYE. Will they not find from the same investigation that in a district made purposely a negro or colored district, with at least twenty or thirty thousand majority of colored voters, Mr. CATCHINGS was declared to be elected, having received only three or four thousand votes?

Mr. VEST. It is very possible; and I can show in Northern districts, in Ohio and Indiana and Illinois, and in my own State of Missouri, where a large majority of the people did not vote at Congressional elections. The Senator assumes that when this was done intimidation and fraud caused it; but the same thing happens everywhere to some extent. Why is it that in our late Presidential election New York cast two hundred and odd thousand more votes than in the State election recently had? Who can account for popular impulses and popular motives, unless he is contented from a partisan pedestal to hurl his shafts at the opposite party by assuming some partisan reason?

But I shall not be diverted from my statement by the question of my distinguished friend. I ask him to explain to me why it is that these Northern men, who still proclaim themselves Republicans and vote for the Republican electors on the Presidential ticket, after they have gone South were forced through an instinct of self-preservation to act with the Democratic party, to which they did not belong, to protect, as they say themselves, their own persons and their own property?

In the face of this state of things we are asked to coerce those people into holding elections in a certain way. We are asked that Federal power shall be invoked, ignoring the doctrine of popular sovereignty; because the people who are unfit to elect members of Congress are unfit to elect their county and State officers.

If the fountain be once poisoned it poisons all who drink from it, whether in the selection of a State officer or a Federal officer. There can be but one remedy, if the assumption of Senators on the other side be true, and that is to disenfranchise absolutely a certain portion of the people of the South in order that the others may exercise the right of suffrage intelligently and patriotically; in other words, to vote the Republican ticket. Our friends can not explain why it is that the same man ought to be permitted to go to the polls and select his governor and the State ticket and his county officers, but be denied the privilege of voting for a member of Congress except in a specified way, although he is the same man—corrupt in one instance but entitled to vote by regulating his conduct according to their rules in regard to the selection of another officer.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to ask him to explain how a voter, such as he describes, in a State is obliged now to vote differently for a member of Congress than for State officers?

Mr. VEST. I do not say he is compelled to vote differently, but I say that under the present election law you can put Federal officials there who will control the election.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator explain how? That is what I asked.

Mr. VEST. I will explain it by a practical illustration. I take it that every Senator looks upon this question especially from the standpoint of experience in his own State. I understand matters better in regard to the State of Missouri than any Senator here possibly can except my colleague. I know with absolute certainty what has occurred in Missouri.

In 1876 the necessities of the Republican party (and I will prove this from the sworn testimony of their own witnesses) demanded that three Congressional districts in Missouri should be carried for the Republican ticket. A determined effort was agreed upon here in Washington to carry the United States House of Representatives for the Republicans. Mr. W. D. W. Barnard was the confidential friend of Gen. Grant and the chosen instrument of the Administration to do that thing. He was the national bank examiner of the State of Missouri, appointed by Grant. The United States marshal in the St. Louis district was H. W. Leffingwell, whom I know very well—a real-estate man of high character and a very old citizen. Leffingwell was an honest man, conservative and patriotic.

Barnard carried the instruction of Mr. Taft, the Attorney-General of the United States, to the Republicans of St. Louis that those three districts must be carried for the Republican party by the use of the instrumentalities provided in the Federal election law. He carried the instructions of the Attorney-General to Leffingwell, the United States marshal, and they both swear to it. Leffingwell said, "Why, there is profound peace in Missouri: there is no danger of any tumult or riot here in the city of St. Louis. The calm is profound politically, socially, and otherwise." Barnard said to him, "Here are your orders. Who made you marshal?" "Well," said Leffingwell, "you had a good deal to do with it. You are very near the President." "Well, sir," he said, "the man who made can unmake: and if you do not carry out these orders I will put you out of this office." I am sorry my friend from Maine has left the Chamber, because I wanted him to hear this and have something to answer.

It is amusing to hear the Senator from New Hampshire, who does me the honor to listen, say that these supervisors are mere "lookers on here in Vienna;" that they never interfere; that they are mere witnesses, spectators, like gentlemen who visit the opera simply for amusement and pleasure. Now, let us see whether they were lookers-on in the cases I have mentioned.

Mr. HUNTON. What is the document?

Mr. VEST. I will read this. It is House Document No. 3491. It is hardly necessary for me to remark that the conspiracy was carried out and that the three districts were carried for the Republican party. R. Graham Frost was beaten by a Republican named Metcalfe on the return, though he was elected at the polls. Frost contested the election, and here is the testimony taken in that contest. It is found in House of Representatives Miscellaneous Document, second session, Forty-fifth Congress, 1877-'78, volume 4, page 317. Mr. Barnard was put upon the stand; he was asked this question——

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator state what investigation that was?

Mr. VEST. It is the contested election case of Frost against Metcalfe. I am about to read the testimony of Mr. Barnard under oath. He said:

Q. You had great influence with Gen. Grant—

He was asked—about that time, I believe?

A. That I can not say. Gen. Grant and myself had been acquaintances for thirty-odd years.

Q. And great personal friends?

A. I think so, sir.

Q. What did Mr. Leffingwell say to you?

(Objected to as irrelevant.)

Q. What was the nature of Mr. Leffingwell's dilemma?

(Objected to as irrelevant and immaterial to this issue.)

A. Well, Mr. Leffingwell had been engaged in the real estate business here for years, and a good many of his friends whom he had done business for had rather influenced him that Mr. Tilden would be the President, and if he put this law, which he was instructed to—

Which he was instructed to—in force that he would make enemies and he would get out of office, and his business would be injured by it. A committee composed of a number of very prominent Democrats waited on him, and after an interview he promised to give them an answer the next day.

Q. What was the nature of the interview, right there?

A. In reference to enforcing the law.

Q. Were they protesting against it?

A. Yes, so I understood. I had a desk in the office, and I had overheard the conversation.

Q. You stated he would give them an answer.

A. An answer at 11 o'clock.

Q. He said he would give them an answer the next day?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did they call the next day?

A. They did; a portion of them called and he turned them over to me.

Q. What took place after the conversation that you had on the first day about this protesting committee?

A. Mr. Lefingwell and myself lived at Kirkwood, and on the train going there that evening he told me that he was in a great deal of trouble, and he did not know what to do. During the evening he said he did not know what he should do, and I said, "He had got his orders and instructions?" "Yes." "Well, you certainly will carry them out." He did not know. The next morning early, quite early, he sent for me and told me he was in a good deal of trouble and did not know what to do. I was somewhat amused at his position, and said to him after there was quite a conversation, I told him, "Lefingwell, have I had anything to do with your appointment as marshal?" "Everything; you made me marshal."

Q. He stated to you?

A. Yes. "And you have got instructions from the Attorney-General to enforce the laws of the United States?" "Yes." "And you refuse to do it?" He hesitated. "Yes," he said, he did not know what he should do; he never was in such a position in his life. "I then was influential in making you marshal?" "Yes." "And if you do not execute your orders I will see that you are not marshal much longer. The man that makes can unmake." Then he said to me, "What am I to do?" I said to him, "I can relieve you of that dilemma. Give me control of those marshals;" and he says, "I will do it."

Q. Well, did he do it?

A. I think so, sir.

Q. Well, what did you proceed to do then?

Mr. Barnard goes on to state that he himself took the authority away from the chief marshal and appointed 1,028 deputies, organized them into regiments, battalions, and companies; the captains reported to the majors, the majors to the colonels, and the colonels to him, and he reported to the Attorney-General of the United States. They put the city of St. Louis under a military organization under this law.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator if that does not present the constitutional question about laws paramount that we have had under consideration?

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, my friend from Massachusetts has a nightmare in the shape of Liliuokalani. [Laughter.] If anything is said here on astronomy, botany, mineralogy, religion, or politics, he jumps up immediately with, "Paramount, Paramount Blount and Liliuokalani." [Laughter.]

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I thought he was stating the exact proposition. Does he not think so? Here is a case of a person who he says undertook, under what authority I do not know——

Mr. VEST. No; neither does anybody else.

Mr. HOAR. He undertook, by the consent at any rate of the marshal who was in power, to take his functions upon himself, and to control his inferiors. Now, does the Senator think that is constitutional or not? If he does not, then he does not seem to have any nightmare about its being done elsewhere.

Mr. VEST. I think this was one of the most monstrous outrages the Republican party ever inflicted upon a free people. Unconstitutional? It was barbarous.

Mr. HOAR. Hawaiian.

Mr. VEST. I hope that is an answer to "paramount;" and if anything is necessary to be said as to old Lil, Liliuokalani, I am ready to give it. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Barnard, under this authority from the Attorney-General, which the Senator from Massachusetts asks me whether it is constitutional, which had no foundation whatever except the necessities of the Republican party, proceeded to carry those elections. Mr. Barnard testifies that he disfranchised 5,700 voters; he took the registration lists and struck off 5,700 names; and amongst them were some of the most reputable and oldest citizens of St. Louis, men who had fought the Indians for sovereignty over their territory, men who had blazed the pathway of civilization with the ax in one hand and the rifle in the other. They were arrested on the morning of the election by these military deputy marshals, and terror seized the whole community. Many Democrats refused to go near the polls. Conservative business men remained at home during the entire day. Three Republican Congressmen were brought to the House of Representatives under that proceeding from three Democratic districts in my State.

It was charged here yesterday by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] that this law was enacted for political purposes and not in the interest of fair suffrage and the purity of the suffrage. Let us see what was the object, according to Mr. Barnard's own testimony. He is asked further:

Q. Was there any more danger for the commission of frauds and for disturbance at this election than there was at previous elections?

A. Oh, well, all our large communities had become very corrupt in the exercise of the elective franchise, and it was thought essential to the protection of voters.

Q. Independently of political consideration, was there any more necessity for the appointment of marshals at that election than any previous election?

(Objected to on the ground that there can be nothing connected with the election independent of political associations.)

Q. In order to be precise, I will say, independently of all party consideration, was there any more necessity for the appointment of marshals for that election than for any previous election?

A. Oh, well, you gentlemen know very well that in a political struggle for party ascendency it is necessary for the coördinate branches of the Government to be in accord, and there was an effort on the part, so I interpreted it, of the party which I acted with to regain control of the House of Representatives.

There was no pretense that there was any disturbance in the city of St. Louis. There was nothing but absolute peace and tranquillity. Mr. Barnard, as he himself swears, received his orders in Washington from the Attorney-General to carry those three election districts under the election law, and he went out to St. Louis and achieved the purpose, and then he had the hardihood to avow it when a sworn witness upon the stand. But I leave to my distinguished friends on the other side to go through the testimony in detail. The conspiracy was successful. Fifty-seven hundred men were disfranchised. Hundreds were arrested on the morning of the election. It was an ex parte proceeding.

The Senator from New Hampshire seemed to resent the idea yesterday that the deputy marshals were anything else than reputable citizens, angels of political light and purity. Mr. President, this man Barnard called from the purlieus and dens of vice throughout the great city of St. Louis every reckless and characterless mercenary who for $5 a day would take his marshal's badge and arrest men at the polls. There were appointed at $5 a day 1,028 men without responsibility, without character, willing for this pitiful sum to strike down the liberties of any man, no matter how old, how respectable, how influential. It cost the people of the United States $21,000 to consummate that infamy. The bill was made out, and Barnard, following the conspiracy to its end, came back to report to his masters, with Henry T. Mudd, a deputy marshal, with him, and here is the account of his interview with Taft. I want my friend from New Hampshire to hear this. It will relieve the tedium of the debate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am already very much terrified, and I hope the Senator will not terrify me too much.

Mr. VEST. The idea of terrifying the Senator from New Hampshire, after all he has been through, after what he did in Florida, after all he knows about the election law! He would shake hands with the ghost of Banquo and then eat a hearty supper. [Laughter.] Mr. Barnard returned to Washington to give an account of this dirty and infamous job and to get his money for those pure and patriotic deputy marshals. Here is what he swears occurred with Attorney-General Taft:

Q. You think those marshals did very good service in the Congressional election, do you not, Mr. Barnard?

A. When I went to Washington with Mr. Mudd, who was chief deputy marshal for the settlement of this account, Mr. Taft asked Mr. Mudd how many marshals he had.

Mr. SHIELDS. Taft, the Attorney-General?

A. The Attorney-General. * * * Mr. Taft asked Mr. Mudd how many marshals he had. Mr. Mudd referred him to me, and said I had charge of the marshals; and he turned to me, and I said, "1,038." The old gentleman wheels around in his chair and says, "Were there no others out in Missouri you could have made marshals?" Says I, "Mr. Taft, we went in to win"—

"We went in to win"—

"and if it had been necessary to have had a posse comitatus—I think that is what you call it, and every other man over 15 years of age should have seen a fair election."—

That is what he calls a fair election—and he said, "You bring a good deal of sugar in your spade."

And he signed the voucher.

Mr. CHANDLER. Who said that, Mr. Taft?

Mr. VEST. Mr. Taft, according to Mr. Barnard.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Taft said to Mr. Barnard, "You bring a good deal of sugar in your spade?"

Mr. VEST. Yes; "You bring a good deal of sugar in your spade."

Mr. CHANDLER. Can it be possible that an Attorney-General of the United States said that?

Mr. VEST. He was a Republican Attorney-General. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, there is one phase of this interesting history that I have omitted. My friend from New Hampshire says the deputy marshals are mere spectacular gentlemen; that they do not interfere with elections.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator wishes to be accurate. I said the supervisors were mere lookers-on. I did not say the marshals were.

Mr. VEST. Well, the supervisors. Mr. Barnard was at the head of the supervisors and at the head of the marshals, by the authority of the Attorney-General, and, according to his own testimony, he was sent from Washington to do this business.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am glad the Senator put in the words "according to his own testimony." I think that is an important qualification of what the Senator is stating. I regard the whole story of this Mr. Barnard, which I have no doubt he told before the committee just as the Senator says he did, as a mere yarn—one of those yarns that men are apt to tell who think the world revolves about them.

Mr. VEST. That makes an infinitely worse case. The man then added perjury in order to make himself infamous. He is another Republican, with absolute power to control that whole business.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. VEST. Of course.

Mr. CHANDLER. What is the evidence that he is a Republican?

Mr. VEST. His own statement.

Mr. CHANDLER. He appears to me from the testimony, to act like a Republican getting ready to go over to the Democratic party by the way of the Mugwump road.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, there is no room for him in the Democratic party. We do not want that sort of cattle. This man lived a Republican. If he is living now he is a Republican, and if he has died he died in the odor of sanctity as a Republican. He was the Republican national bank examiner for the State of Missouri. I knew him well. It is as well known as the name of my State that he did this work, and he was absolutely omnipotent at that election in the city of St. Louis. It is well known that he arrested men and discharged them, and represented the Republican party and the power of the Republican party when he did it.

But going back to the episode, which I neglected to name, there was one precinct in that great city in which the Democrats, notwithstanding all this fraud and force, secured a majority—precinct No. 71, well known in the political history of my State. Barnard found it had gone Democratic, and our returning board, composed of the county judge and the county clerk and another State officer, under the statutes of Missouri, met the next day or the day afterwards, the second day, to count the votes and make the return. Barnard, booted and spurred and armed, with an armed deputy marshal at his heels, went into the room in the court-house where the State returning board, under our law, met. He said, "I understand you are about to count precinct No. 71." Mr. Garesché, the county clerk, said, "What right have you in here, sir; this is a State board." And he ordered him out of the office. Barnard said, "I am under Federal authority, and if you dare to count the vote in that precinct I will put every one of you in jail before night." He swears that he did so, and Garesché then again told him that he must leave the office, and a personal difficulty was averted by pushing Barnard out of the door.

Now, I ask the Senator from New Hampshire, ought a law to remain upon the statute books under which such outrages can be committed? What argument to an honest and patriotic legislator can be more forcible than the existence of a statute which opens the door for trampling down the dearest rights of an American citizen in the name of party? It is no argument to tell me that there are abuses of suffrage in other localities. It is no argument to tell me that the large cities are full of political corruption. A statute which permits a brutal minion of the Federal power, armed and accoutred to do the work, to arrest American citizens without warrant, a statute which says they can be arrested with or without writ, which permits a Federal official to go into a State returning-board office and threaten the officers with arrest if they carry out their honest judgment and make the record as they saw it, ought to be wiped from the statute book in the name of decency if nothing else.

These facts are beyond any sort of controversy. They happened in my own State. They are recited here in a document printed by the Congress of the United States, and everything I have said is substantiated upon the sworn testimony of these men.

Mr. President, I repeat that whenever the time comes that national coercion is necessary to secure the purity of elections in the States, it is a confession that the principles upon which our Government is based have failed, and that popular sovereignty has passed into history merely as an attempt upon the part of the people to secure personal and constitutional liberty.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 18, 1894.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

VETO MESSAGE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message of the President; which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without my approval House bill numbered 71, entitled "An act for the relief of purchasers of timber and stone lands under the act of June 3, 1878."

This bill permits the proofs and affidavits which, under present statutes, parties desiring to acquire certain public lands are required to make before the registers and receivers of the land offices within which such lands are located to be made before any commissioner of the United States circuit court or before the judge or clerk of any court of records of the county or parish in which the lands are situated.

A similar bill was passed by the Fifty-second Congress and was disapproved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior. The successors of these officers oppose the present bill on the ground that in its operation it would open the door to fraud and to a perversion of the intentions of the Government in relation to the public lands.

It is difficult, with the most scrupulous care, to guard the alienation of our public lands from fraud and illegal practices. It is perfectly plain, however, that the prospect of accomplishing this result is better under present laws, which require the necessary proofs to be made before land officers who are appointed for that purpose and who are under the control of the General Land Office and amenable to its regulations, than it would be by substituting other officers over whom the Land Office has no control.

Certain rules and orders of the Land Office are now in force which regulate the taking of the necessary proofs and permit oral examinations by registers and receivers. These regulations are of the utmost importance if our land laws are to be justly and honestly administered.

I fully concur in the objections made to this bill by the officers having charge of the public lands in the last Administration and by their successors who are now charged with that responsibility. I am convinced that such a relaxation of our existing land laws as is contemplated by the bill under consideration would not be in the interest of good administration.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 17, 1894

ANNUAL REPORT OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION AND NATIONAL MUSEUM.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following Senate concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed of the report of the Smithsonian Institution and the National Museum for the year ending June 30, 1893, in two octavo volumes, 10,000 copies, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 5,000 copies for the use of the Smithsonian Institution, and 2,000 copies for the use of the National Museum.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this is a Senate concurrent resolution. The House Committee on Printing has reported a similar one. This is the usual current printing of that institution. I ask that the Senate resolution be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following Senate bills and joint resolutions; which were severally read a first and second time, and referred to the committees as indicated below:

A bill (S. 1306) to establish a port of delivery at Bonners Ferry, Idaho—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce;

Joint resolution (S. R. 8) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to cause the settlement of the accounts of Special Agents Moore and Woodson under the treaty of 1854 with the Delaware Indians, etc.—to the Committee on Claims;

Joint resolution (S. R. 51) to provide for the printing of the report of the joint committee of Congress and proceedings at the centennial celebration of the laying of the corner stone of the Capitol—to the Committee on Printing; and

A bill (S. 1266) to extend and amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Kansas and Arkansas Valley Railway to construct and operate additional lines of railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved February 24, A. D. 1891—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORT OF BUREAU OF ETHNOLOGY.

The Speaker laid before the House the following Senate concurrent resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 8,000 copies of the Thirteenth Annual Report of the Director of the Bureau of Ethnology, with accompanying papers and illustrations, and uniform with the preceding volumes of the series, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 for distribution by the Bureau of Ethnology: the illustrations to be obtained by the Public Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago, when the Speaker laid that resolution before the House, I asked for its consideration, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, asked that it lie on the table until he should have an opportunity to look at it. I am informed that he has looked at it, and has no objection to its consideration and passage. It is the usual resolution to print the report of that Bureau.

The Senate concurrent resolution was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE TENNESSEE RIVER NEAR CHATTANOOGA.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 339) to authorize the Chattanooga Western Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Tennessee River near Chattanooga.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Chattanooga Western Railway Company, a corporation created and organized under the laws of the State of Tennessee, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct and maintain a bridge, and approaches thereto, over the Tennessee River, at or near the city of Chattanooga, in the county of Hamilton, State of Tennessee, which shall be so constructed as to provide for the passage of railway trains, locomotives, passenger and freight cars on, over, and across the same. And the right is also hereby given to the said county of Hamilton to erect, or cause to be erected, on, over, and above said railway bridge, using the latter as its sub-structure, a public bridge to be used for the passage of street cars, wagons, and vehicles of all kinds, and for animals and foot passengers.

SEC. 2. That any bridge built under this act and subject to its limitations shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post route, and shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-roads in the United States. That no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mail, troops, and munitions of war of the United States, or for through railway passengers or freight passing over said bridge, than the rate per mile for their transmission over the railroads leading to said bridge, and equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph and telephone companies, and the United States shall have the right of way across said bridge for postal-telegraph purposes; that the said bridge shall be constructed either by draw, span, or otherwise, so that a free and unobstructed passageway may be secured to all water craft navigating said river at the point aforesaid: Provided, That if said bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be constructed as a drawbridge the draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signals for the passage of boats or vessels; and whatever kind of bridge is constructed said corporation shall maintain, at its own expense, from sunset to sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridge as the Light-House Board shall prescribe.

SEC. 3. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have, and be entitled to, equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains over the same, and over the approaches thereto, upon such basis or arrangement as may be agreed upon by and between such companies and the Chattanooga Western Railway Company; and in case the owner or owners of said bridge, and the several railroad companies, or any one of them, desiring such use, shall fail to agree upon the sum or sums to be paid, and upon rules and conditions to which each shall conform in using said bridge, all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War upon the hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties.

SEC. 4. That any bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation of said river as the Secretary of War shall prescribe. And to secure that object the said company or corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawings of the bridge, and a map of the location, giving, for the space of 1 mile below and 1 mile above the proposed location, the topography of the banks of the river, the shore lines at high and low water, the direction and strength of the current at all stages, and the soundings, accurately showing the bed of the stream, the location of any other bridge or bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject, and until the said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War, the bridge shall not be built; and should any change be made in the plan of said bridge during the progress of construction, so as to prevent or remove all substantial obstruction to the navigation of said river, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War: and if any litigation shall be had in regard to the location or construction of said bridge, the same shall be in the circuit court of the United States in whose territorial jurisdiction said bridge, or any part thereof, is located.

SEC. 5. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved; and any alterations or changes that may be required by Congress in the bridge constructed under this act, or its entire removal, shall be made by the corporation owning or controlling the same, at its own expense. Furthermore, if the construction of said bridge shall not be commenced within one and completed within three years after the passage of this act, all privileges conferred hereby and this act shall become null and void.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The Senate bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The House bill (H. R. 291) for the same purpose was laid on the table.

LIBRARY PRIVILEGES FOR JUSTICES OF SUPREME COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Joint Committee on the Library be, and it is hereby, authorized to grant the privilege of using and drawing books from the Library to the chief justice and associate justices of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, in the same manner and subject to the same regulations as members of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire that this joint resolution be now considered?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees for reports.

The Clerk proceeded to call the committees.

Mr. MOSES, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation a bill (H. R. 5061) to repeal section 4716 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The Clerk continued and completed the call.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call. The House will now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

THE TARIFF.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for further consideration of the bill the title of which has just been read.

The amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] is pending. To that the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] offers an amendment. Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, I have never been quite able to bring myself to believe that the industry of sheep husbandry will be directly promoted by putting wool upon the free list, nor am I now fully prepared to indorse the views of those who hold that the effect of tariff duties, when applied to wool, is to lower the price of that article, whereas, in respect to all other commodities, its effect is to maintain or increase prices.

For those who are so wedded to the protective idea that they can swallow, without wincing, the proposition that protection is required in order to cheapen the products of manufacture, so that trades unions and other industrial organizations may be able to compel manufacturers to pay higher wages for labor, it may not be difficult to believe that the result of a protective duty upon wool is to lower the price of that article and thereby render the sheep industry more profitable. And I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that there are those who profess to so believe.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN] on yesterday sent to the Clerk's desk and caused to be read an extract from a speech of Senator SHERMAN delivered in the Senate in August, 1890, in which that Senator, representing one of the principal wool-producing States of the Union, declared in substance that the effect of a duty upon wool was to lower rather than to raise the price. Now, Mr. Chairman, such an expression from such a source may well challenge the attention and consideration of those who have been inclined, as I confess I have, to believe the contrary, for there is no public man of wider experience than Senator SHERMAN or whose opportunities for observation have been greater, and in the State of Ohio no man stands higher in Republican estimation, not even the distinguished author of the law which we are soon to repeal. And, as tending to prove that the words cited by my friend from Indiana were not spoken without consideration, upon the impulse of the moment and in the heat of debate, but that they express the well-settled and long-entertained convictions of the senior Senator from Ohio, I beg to quote from a speech delivered by him in the Senate on February 7, 1883, to be found in volume 61 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 2201. In discussing the schedule of the tariff act of 1883, relating to manufactures of wool and incidentally speaking of the effect of duties upon wool, Mr. SHERMAN said:

> The State of Ohio produces 25,000,000 pounds of wool, far more than any other State in the Union. It is not by large flocks and herds, as in California and Texas, but almost every farmer has a flock of sheep, averaging about 100 in number, and from them they produce fine wools that are now most valuable to commerce, to the amount of 25,000,000 pounds. Under the operation of the existing law the price of wool has gradually gone down. Up to 1866 the wool-growers and the wool-manufacturers were in a perpetual state of war with each other, the wool-manufacturers insisting that there ought to be no duty on wool and the wool-growers insisting that there ought to be a duty upon wool to correspond with that on manufactured goods. They finally reconciled their interests in 1866, and the Tariff Commission, in speaking of that important fact, says this:
> "The law fixing these duties was passed in 1867 with the approval of the entire body of producers, so far as any expression could be secured, and the wisdom which guided its promoters has found substantial vindication in the growth of sheep husbandry during the past fifteen years."

And then Mr. SHERMAN proceeds to say:

> In the table which I have now before me it is shown that in 1867 (when this beneficent arrangement was first effected) the price of wool was 51 cents a pound; in 1870 it was 46 cents a pound; in 1875 it was 43 cents a pound; in 1880, which was an abnormal year, 48 cents a pound; but to-day I am told these same wools are sold in Ohio at from 35 to 40 cents a pound. So the result of the policy of protecting the wool-growers has been, as it is in all industries, to gradually reduce the price.

If the Senator were repeating the statement to-day, Mr. Chairman, that he made eleven years ago he would have to change it only so far as to say that "to-day these same wools are sold in Ohio at from 18 to 20 cents a pound." And I desire to emphasize the argument embodied in the closing sentence of the quotation I have read, so far as it relates to the effect of protective duties upon wool.

If, without the light of this and similar testimony by men of wider experience than my own and larger opportunities for tracing effects to their causes, I had undertaken to account for the continued and almost constant decline in the price of wool ever since the law of 1867 was enacted, I would have been disposed to attribute it to other causes than the tariff, and to say that the decline had taken place in spite of the tariff rather than as a consequence of it. For it would seem, Mr. Chairman, that of all the products of agricultural industry wool almost alone might with some appearance of sound logic be deemed capable of deriving benefit from a protective policy. We are not exporters of wool, as we are of nearly every other product of agriculture.

On the contrary, we do not produce a supply at all equal in quantity or quality to the demands of our own markets. But it will be observed that Senator SHERMAN does not pretend that the decline in price has taken place in spite of protection. On the contrary, he plainly declares it to be a necessary consequence of protective duties when he says that, "the result of the policy of protecting the wool-growers has been, as it is in all other industries, to gradually reduce the price."

By unanimous consent, the time of Mr. HARE was extended for five minutes.

Mr. HARE. It would seem, indeed, that the ordinary, natural, and logical operation of the policy of protection, which is to increase or maintain instead of to reduce prices, has been thwarted and defeated in the case of the wool industry; for whatever theories men may hold there is no gainsaying the history of the last twenty-seven years. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There are two circumstances, Mr. Chairman, which in my judgment may account for the failure of protection to maintain, even approximately, the prices of wool. Protection does not always protect even its intended beneficiaries. In order to enjoy its benefits they must be in a position to combine against competition. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The wool-growers of the United States have not occupied this position, and in the very nature of their situation they never can. By reason of the fact that they are more than a million in number, widely scattered throughout all portions of the country, they have not been and never will be able to effect a combination that might enable them to fix a price for their product. This fact alone would be sufficient to deprive them of whatever benefit might otherwise inure to them under the law.

But in the next place, and to add to their discomfiture, they have practically but a single purchaser. The markets of the world are closed to them, and the only purchasers they have—the manufacturers of woolen goods—being comparatively few in number, are not competitors with each other, but, on the contrary, can, and presumably do, combine and fix the price to suit themselves. If, by reason of the high duties, they are compelled to pay high prices for the foreign wools which the necessities of manufacture require, they thereby to that extent exhaust their working capital, and having the prices of the domestic product within their own control, it would be but natural that they should endeavor to recoup their losses at the expense of the home producer. Whether they do thus seek to equalize prices, none of us can testify. It is enough for us to know that they could avail themselves of this advantage if so disposed.

But, Mr. Chairman, whatever may be the cause or the remedy, the fact remains that under the influence of the highest protective duties, maintained throughout a long period of years, the industry of sheep husbandry has persistently delined, the prices of wool have steadily gone down, and the number of sheep in the States east of the Mississippi River has constantly dwindled, until in Ohio there are not to-day more than two-thirds as many sheep as there were in 1868.

The truth is that what Ohio and the other States referred to need is protection against the wool of Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and California; and this, by reason of the wisdom and far-sighted sagacity of the framers of the Constitution, they can not hope to have. [Applause.]

But they do not need, Mr. Chairman, the protection contemplated in the pending amendment. It has been tried and found wanting. [Applause on the Democratic side.] To the wool-growers it has proved not merely a disappointment, but if it be true that the result of the proposed policy has been to gradually reduce the price of wool, as claimed by Senator SHERMAN, himself an apostle of protection, it has been a curse. For I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that there is a wool-grower in the United States who could be persuaded to give his assent to a policy involving such consequences, with the understanding that they were to be the necessary result of the policy. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of a tariff for revenue.

[Here the hammer fell.]

On motion of Mr. LAYTON, Mr. HARE's time was again extended by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARE. If protection or benefit results from such a tariff to any industry, as an incident and not as an object of the duty, I will not complain; and personally I would as willingly derive revenue from a duty on wool as from any other commodity that enters necessarily into the consumption of every family in the land. If incidental benefit should result to the wool-growers from the imposition of such a duty I would not complain, for no beneficiary of the tariff system is more worthy or more entitled to consideration. [Applause.]

But if instead of being benefited the wool-grower is to be injured, if the effect of a duty on wool is to "gradually reduce the price," then I am opposed to the levy of any duty whatever, for, however great the necessity for revenue, my constituents can not afford any further reduction in the price of wool. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, this is a question of mighty importance to the farmers of Ohio. There are 75,000 voters in Ohio who own sheep in sufficient numbers to pay taxes on them under our taxation laws. They are widely scattered all over the State, and belong to both parties. In the recent election in Ohio the heavy Democratic losses, heavier than anywhere else outside of a few of the large labor districts, were found in the principal wool-raising counties—Licking, Coshockton, Tuscarawas, Hardin, Marion, and others—and notably the counties in the district in which my distinguished friend who has just taken his seat [Mr. HARE] lives, and which he represents so well upon this floor.

Seventy-five thousand agriculturists in Ohio and more than a million in the whole country are assailed by the pending measure. The gentleman [Mr. HARE] has referred to the action of the Senate and the House of Representatives in 1883 in modifying, through the adoption of the report of the Tariff Commission, the wool schedule of the tariff act of 1867. The Democratic party of Ohio did not occupy at that time the position which the gentleman now occupies. Senator SHERMAN, who voted under protest for the revision of the tariff and thereby affected this industry in a very small way, to an extent not exceeding three-quarters of 1 cent on the pound, was assailed by the Democracy of my State in their convention, and in the Legislature, and by their Democratic Representatives on this floor.

I hold in my hand and will put into these remarks the action of the Democratic party in Ohio upon that subject. They issued a circular, which found its way onto the farm of every wool-grower in Ohio, claiming that the action of the Republicans in Congress had been injurious to the farmers of that State, and later on the Democratic Legislature, by a unanimous vote of every Democrat in both houses, denounced the Republican action, as they were pleased to call it, assailed Senator SHERMAN, and continued to assail him until within the last four or five years, when suddenly the Democratic party of Ohio became a free-wool party. Every Democrat on the floor of Congress from that State voted to condemn the action of the Senate and the House of Representatives at that time in passing the tariff revision act. So the gentleman from Ohio here finds himself preaching a new crusade, and, among other things he says, what we hear quite often on this floor, that he is willing to favor a tariff for revenue which will reach out and protect incidentally the flocks of Ohio. That is the very question which I now want to present briefly to this committee.

By some means or other, Mr. Chairman, we must have more money in the Treasury of the United States. This morning the honorable Secretary of the Treasury makes an announcement, by fair inference, that the Treasury is about to go to protest, and it is said that if the appropriations now made and which are due and payable at the Treasury of the United States were presented for payment, as any other commercial demands upon any bank in the country would be, the Treasury of the United States would go to protest; so that this Government is practically bankrupt. We are running behind at the rate of $70,000,000 per annum. Bankruptcy stares us in the face. We are looking around for more things to tax; more ways to raise money to avoid national disgrace. We are contemplating war measures—war taxes.

Now, while all this is true there is being imported into the United States annually 300,000,000 pounds of wool or its equivalent. I want to ask any Democrat who favors a tariff for revenue what is there in the commodity of wool that lifts it out of the category of those things upon which revenue ought to be raised? We want the money, and the commodity is coming in. We must import 300,000,000 of wool, or we must go short of clothing. Why not tax this wool? Will somebody answer that question? The gentleman from Ohio deliberately charges that the operation and effect of a tariff upon wool is to lower the price of the commodity. If that be true, and if his logic is true, why not levy a tax for revenue, and in that way afford the incidental protection which he suggests?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MARSH. I hope the gentleman will be allowed additional time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. This is a great question in my State, and I would be glad to have ten minutes more.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I ask that the time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] be extended ten minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I am at a loss to answer the question which I have propounded to the other side. It seems to me a fair and just criticism of this bill that it is not a bill to raise revenue; for all the great importations into the country, those upon which a tax can be most easily and certainly collected, and the character of which exempts them from the charge that their taxation would engender frauds upon the revenue, are exempted.

There is no difficulty in raising the money which our friends on the other side will have to furnish. A tariff upon wool, a tariff upon sugar—the party here having voted against free sugar—a tax upon whisky, and an additional tax of a dollar a barrel upon beer will put this bankrupt Government of ours in a solvent condition. Why is it—and this question will have to be answered at the polls in three hundred and fifty-six Congressional districts—why is it that you take this commodity which is the financial lifeblood of many a farmer and strip it of its protection, and expose it to destruction, when the gentleman on the other side, voicing the utterances of the Democratic party of his State for so many years, declares that a revenue tariff upon this commodity or even a protective tariff would lower the price of the wool and at the same time put money in the Treasury.

Mr. HUNTER. Under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan, which in effect substitutes the provision of the McKinley law for the provision of the present bill, do you expect to realize more than you have done, when during the last three years, under the operation of the McKinley act, wool has been constantly declining?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think I can answer the gentleman. The price of wool in this country is settled and fixed by the London market. I will put in my speech a table which will show what I presume the gentleman is familiar with, that going back to 1867 and coming down through the period of inflation, down to specie resumption, down to 1883, when the protective duty was lowered, down to 1890, when the protective duty was raised, the wool of the Ohio farmer, which stands side by side with the grade which I will quote from Australia, has gone down in the same ratio that the nonprotected wool of Australia has gone down in the London markets. So the argument of the gentleman falls to the ground, because there stands between the cheaper wools of the foreign producer and the Ohio producer this barrier of protection, and but for this protection Ohio wool would sell at London prices, freight added.

Mr. HUNTER. One word further, if the gentleman will pardon me. I find by the Ohio Wool Report that in 1889, preceding the passage of the McKinley act, fine wool was 34 cents a pound in Ohio——

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is not true, but it is true within 4 cents.

Mr. HUNTER. And in 1890 the price was 38 cents; in 1891, 33 cents; and it is much lower now.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is all true enough. At the same time the price of wool has been going down in the London market, affected by the foreign product; and at the same time there has stood this same barrier I am talking about. But let me go forward with my statement. The interruption of the gentleman has been made in good faith; and I am obliged to him for it.

If it be true that taking off the tariff on wool will not unfavorably affect the farmer of Ohio, why take it off? That is the question I propound to the country to-day. If it will not cheapen the product of the wool producer, why take it off? You are in favor of a revenue tariff. This product offers you a splendid field for your operations, and according to the argument of the gentleman from Ohio we can not produce within 300,000,000 pounds of all the wool that we require. Then that much must come from abroad. Why not have a revenue tariff upon it? Make it 10 per cent, 20 per cent, 35 per cent. The wool must come in; it will have to come in; let it come in and bring us revenue which we require, while according to the argument of the gentleman from Ohio, the farmer will not be damaged nor the clothier either.

The fact about the whole matter is this: We have in Ohio 4,000,000 sheep; that is to say, we did have that number about a year ago. At this time I regret to say the farmer of Ohio is sacrificing his sheep. One year ago they were worth an average of about $4 a head; to-day they are worth less than $1 a head. The reduction in value of Ohio sheep has amounted to $12,000,000 in a single year. The presence in power of the Democratic party has cost a good deal. It has come high, but we have it.

We were selling our wool one year ago at 26 cents a pound, not at the price claimed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HUNTER], because that was an erroneous statement based upon a special grade of wool, which is not the general grade of our wool, we were selling at 26 cents. The day when the Wilson bill was introduced here there was a nominal price of 18 cents; and from one side of the country to the other from the dealers in wool, there came orders to their agents to cease buying wool altogether. They seemed to understand. The men who want the wool seemed to understand that they were affected by the introduction of this proposed legislation.

The woolgrowing farmer stands helpless before the attacks and assaults of the Democratic party. He was warned in 1884 by the official declarations of that party that he was being wronged and injured by the reduction of 1 cent a pound on his wool, and now we find the same party taking off the 11 cents a pound which we understand and he understands to be a protection on his commodity. In case of war with a foreign country we must exist on one-half of the annual production of wool, or we must wait for the growth of flocks in order to produce our wool. The answer to the whole of this comes from the Democratic party, proclaiming first that they are in favor of a revenue tariff, then declaring that they are in favor of no tariff on wool, because it will enhance the value of wool—so says the argument on the other side—and at the same time they deprive the Treasury of the legitimate revenue which belongs to it.

Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a letter written by a most ingenious advocate of the Democratic theory upon this wool question, carefully written, comprising in a small compass all the arguments that have been made here and all the arguments that can be made here in favor of this provision. I also hold in my hand the answer to that letter, written by Mr. Justice, of Philadelphia, that answers, in my judgment, conclusively and successfully, every proposition made in that letter and every argument that has been made on the floor of this House.

My proposition—closing the few words I have been able to say—is this: We need the money, and the Democratic party is charged with the duty of raising it. They stand idly by, trying to lessen the revenues of the Government by $75,000,000 a year, while their Secretary of the Treasury is selling bonds bearing 5 per cent interest, principal and interest payable in gold, in order to save the Treasury of the United States from bankruptcy. One of the strongest and most persistent attacks which they are making is upon an article that by a revenue provision could go a long way toward furnishing the necessary money with which to meet the deficit of the Treasury and save a valuable agricultural product from absolute destruction.

THE WOOL INDUSTRY.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN E. H. GIESY AND THEODORE JUSTICE AS TO WOOL AND PROTECTION—COST OF RAW MATERIAL AND OF LABOR—WHAT WOULD HAPPEN WERE WOOL PUT ON THE FREE LIST.

[From the Chicago Inter Ocean.]

We publish below letters of great interest to all woolgrowers. Mr. E. H. Giesy, of Lockland, Ohio, wrote to Mr. Theodore Justice, of Philadelphia, presenting the arguments of those who would admit wool free of duty. His letter, and the reply of Mr. Justice, are given in full.

WOOL ON THE FREE LIST.

LOCKLAND, OHIO, September 28.

DEAR SIR: I read your letter to F. Mackaman, of Waynesburg, Ohio, which was published in the Cleveland Leader a few days ago. Although I am a Republican and a protectionist, I am not sure that American wool would not be better protected by being placed on the free list than by any import duty that might be placed on foreign wool. In the following you will find my reasons for this opinion, and if any of my assertions are not true I hope you will point to me clearly where I am in error, for I want to get the facts relating to the wool industry.

A great many articles are imported that might be manufactured in this country if we were not handicapped in the matter of raw material, and much money would be retained here that now finds its way into the pockets of the foreigners; for American labor, though dearer per man, is cheaper than foreign labor, because more is produced per man in this country than in foreign countries. In support of this statement, I will say that we export locomotives, watches, small hardware, and many other things composed almost entirely of labor, but we do not and can not export articles composed almost entirely of raw material.

I believe that by putting some raw materials, wool among them, on the free list, we would be protecting our manufacturers more than we are protecting them now, for we would enable them to make many things that they can not make under the present conditions. This would result in the employment of more people than have ever been employed here, and it would also result in greater export trade than we have ever had. I do not believe that placing wool on the free list would stop the production in this country or that it would lessen the price. To illustrate: We import many woolen goods that we can not make, because the duty on foreign wool precludes its use, and because of the fact that American wool can not be manufactured into as fine goods as are produced by a combination of American and foreign wools.

If the duty on foreign wool were removed, the American manufacturers, with the demands of 65,000,000 people back of them, would become bidders for this wool, and the price of it would naturally advance under the law of supply and demand. The foreign manufacturer would have to pay the same price for it that we would pay, and with the advance in price of the foreign wool there would be advance of the American wool. We are not handicapped in the matter of wages, as I have shown, although we pay more per day per man than foreigners pay, and if the foreigners should have to pay as much for raw material as we pay, we could manufacture many goods for our own consumption that we now import, and we could compete with them in many foreign markets where we now have no trade, and we would use much more American wool than we are now using.

You state in your article that owing to the low prices obtained for Australian wool in free-trade England many of the producers of Australian wool found it impossible to continue the production of it and sold their sheep to be slaughtered. This will lessen the supply of Australian wool, and may have some effect on England's prices for it, but if England should find such a competitor for this product as it would find in the United States, there would be still further advances in the price of this wool. So long as England has no competition for Australian wool it will, to a great extent, control the price of it. So long as there is a high tariff in this country, which forces the American manufacturer to pay more per pound for wool than the English manufacturer pays, it can not be used to any great extent by the manufacturers in this country, and just that long will it be necessary for American people to buy from England manufactured goods that can not be made in this country owing to the handicap of high tariff on Australian wool, or the lack of this wool for use in this country, and just that long will we be furnishing the English laborer work and paying profit of the English manufacturer.

Hoping that you will give these points due consideration and let me hear from you, I remain,

Yours, truly,

E. H. GIESY.

THEODORE JUSTICE, Esq.

MR. JUSTICE IN REPLY—REASONS WHY AMERICAN WOOL SHOULD BE PROTECTED.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., October 6.

DEAR SIR: I have your favor of September 28. I wonder that you are not a Democrat, believing, as you appear to, in so many untruths. Your facts are all wrong; therefore, it follows that your conclusions must be wrong, and I recommend your careful reading of a book on The American Wool Industry, written by Hon. William Lawrence, president of the Ohio Woolgrowers' Association. I mail you a copy and ask you to read it carefully, and to examine particularly the diagrams on the back cover with the description of that diagram which is on the inside of the back cover. The unthinking would undermine the foundations of our whole industrial system and bring down upon their heads the whole structure.

You, I am sure, hold your present views for want of proper information. How could the American wool industry be better protected by wool being placed on the free list when the London value from the time of the passage of the tariff law in 1867 up to January 1, 1893, was 50 per cent below the American price? If protection doubled the American price, would not the removal of that protection cause the price to fall to the level of the markets of the world, which from 1867 to 1893 were less than one-half of the American price, as you will see by examining the following table of comparison between protected American wool and similar wool in free-trade London:

Year.	Ohio medium fleece.*	Australasian medium fleece.†	American scoured medium.	Australasian scoured medium.	Cost of free wool below protected wool.
					Per cent.
1868	143	21½	71½	25½	‡50
1869	50	21½	83½	36½	‡56½
1870	45	20½	76½	34½	‡55
1871	46	27	76½	45	‡41½
1872	72	31½	88	53	‡40
1873	68	23½	1.13½	47½	‡58
1874	54	24½	90	41½	‡54
1875	56	25	93½	41½	‡55½
1876	52	23½	86½	39½	‡54

‡Average percentage of cost of free wool in London below protected wool in the United States between 1868 and 1877, on currency basis, 50.95 per cent.

§Average percentage of cost of free wool in London below protected wool in the United States between 1878 and 1891, on gold basis, 51.32 per cent.

Attention is called to the fact that the American quotations from 1868 to 1877 were in currency, while the English quotations for the same period were in gold; that medium wool of the same grade, quality, and condition in free-trade London was more than 50 per cent below the value of the same kind of wool under protection in the United States. Attention is also called to the fact that the quotations for American and English wool between 1878 and 1891 were both in gold; and during this period wool of the same diameter of fiber and in the same condition averaged 51 per cent lower in free-trade London than under protection in the United States.

SHEEP IN THE STATES.

To-day we have 45,000,000 sheep in the United States, 27,000,000 of which are west of the Mississippi River. The freight on the wool of these sheep from the ranch to the Eastern markets varies from 2 to 3 cents per pound, while the freight on wool from London is only one-quarter cent per pound. How can the American woolgrower pay from 800 to 1,200 per cent more freight than his foreign competitor, when the freight alone under such unequal competition would of itself bar the American woolgrower from his own market? Thus, with the removal of protection, the difference in freight alone would be so heavily against the American woolgrower that he would be compelled to go out of business.

If you have visited the Chicago Exposition you will find that without exception the woolens made by the American mills in texture, color, and finish outclass all foreign competitors. There is nothing manufactured from wool that can not be as well made in this country as elsewhere. The difference between free raw material in London and protected raw material under the McKinley law is only 90 cents in a fine dress suit of broadcloth. You can buy abroad a fine suit of broadcloth containing 3 pounds of scoured wool costing in London 30 cents per pound, or 90 cents for all the raw material in such a suit. The whole of the balance of the cost of such a suit of clothing represents labor and profit to the manufacturers, the free raw material in it costing not over 90 cents. In America the same 3 pounds of scoured wool under the McKinley law costs double the free-trade price or $1.80 (1 pound of scoured merino wool would cost 60 cents here as against 30 cents in London). In a suit of clothing such as would be used by workingmen the difference would be less than in a dress suit and less than 90 cents, probably not over 75 cents on each suit of clothing made of coarse wool.

COARSE WOOLS.

Coarse or medium scoured wools cost over 25 cents per pound in London, and in the United States, under the McKinley law, the scoured cost of the same scoured coarse wool is under 50 cents, so that the greatest difference between free raw material and the protected raw material in a suit of workingman's clothing would not exceed 75 cents as against a difference of 90 between free raw material and protected raw material in a fine broadcloth suit, such as the well-to-do would wear for evening dress. To give the consumer the benefit of from 75 to 90 cents on each suit of clothes it is proposed to take from wool the protection it has had for a generation and subject it to the competition of imported cheap free wool.

Ignoring the difference in freight against the American woolgrower, alluded to above, the Australian woolgrower has the advantage of pasture all the year around, the pasture in Australia being better in winter than in summer. The woolgrower in Australia rents his land from the Government for a smaller charge than the Ohio woolgrower in many cases pays for taxes alone, and the latter, owing to our vigorous winter climate five months in the year, feeds his sheep on hay and grain, nearly the whole of which is labor. It costs nothing to grow hay or grain—nature does that.

COST OF RAISING WOOL.

The main cost to the farmer of hay and grain is in the preparing of the land, in cultivating, in harvesting, and the feeding, which are all labor, and which represent 90 per cent of the whole cost of production, the remaining 10 per cent representing interest and taxes.

Now, under these conditions, the cost of raising wool in the United States is at least 11 cents per pound in actual outlay greater than the cost of raising the same class of wool in Australia or the Argentine Republic, and the McKinley tariff law places the duty of 11 cents per pound on imported unwashed wool to put the American woolgrower on even terms with his foreign competitor. The latter has the advantages of cheap land and climatic condition and cheaper freight, which to him are fully equivalent to 11 cents per pound, and if wool is put on the free list the American woolgrower will have to submit to the disadvantages of raising wool in this climate on even terms with his foreign rivals, who do not have such difficulties to contend with, and so without adequate protection must necessarily be driven out of the business. Our seventh largest agricultural industry, producing annually $65,000,000 worth of wool and representing an investment of $160,000,000 in sheep, will be destroyed by free trade. Sheep will be fattened and will then be sent to market as food, and flocks will disappear forever.

Our food supply will in time thus be decreased, and our manufacturers eventually will be driven to buy their wool in London or in Australia. Gold will be thus sent out of the country again, increasing the harmful influences that must follow with the balance of trade permanently against us.

INJURIOUS EFFECTS.

The woolgrowers would be forced into some other industry. They would probably plow up their present sheep pastures when the land is suitable and raise wheat, of which already we have an overproduction and a surplus, and instead of having 60-cent wheat, as now, the probabilities are that in consequence of the great increase of our surplus of wheat, in a short time we will have only 40-cent wheat. It is to the interest of American farmers to diversify their industries, and to produce such articles as will find a market at home instead of abroad. The farmer who can sell direct to the consumers close to his home saves the middleman's profits and the cost of transportation, which otherwise always lessens the net price to him when he has to find a market abroad.

American manufacturers are now in no way hampered in the matter of raw material. This is proved by the fact that under the McKinley law our imports of foreign wool were much greater than ever before. We imported foreign raw wool during the year ending June 30, 1893, in round figures, over 168,000,000 pounds, an increase of 32 per cent over the heaviest imports of any one year under any previous tariff law. The cost of this wool to the American manufacturer was less, including duties, than it had ever been before; now, with the large quantities of wool imported, and with its cost lessened, wherein is there any ground for your statement that the American woolen manufacturer is handicapped in the matter of raw material? Besides, the McKinley law provides that exported goods made of imported wool shall entitle the exporter to a return of all such duties paid on such raw material, save 1 per cent. Thus, for export purposes, the American manufacturer has free raw material. Now, why does not he export his cloth? Because the labor he employs costs from two to three times the labor of his foreign free-trade competitor, making his product dearer and more costly.

IMPORTS.

Our imports of manufactures of wool under the McKinley law have practically not increased at all, and the great increase in our imports of raw material (wool) show that protection as adjusted by the McKinley law has stimulated woolen manufacturing in the United States to such an extent, and to have increased the American market for wool so greatly that the American mills have required not only the American clip, none of which is exported, but in addition have had to import over 168,000,000 pounds of foreign wool to supply their needs, and this has been done without in any manner increasing the cost of clothing to our people. If there has been any change the cost of a suit of clothing to-day under the McKinley law is lower than ever before in the history of the country.

If the duty is now removed or even reduced, at a time when the Government needs more rather than less revenue, the only way to procure even the same revenue that is now collected is to double our imports. If we double our imports we obtain our supplies from abroad instead of at home. We cripple our manufacturers and lessen our market for wool. We give a great industrial impulse to foreign mills, and to this extent take employment from our American mills, and for what? Simply in order to raise as much revenue under reduced duties for revenue only as we now collect under duties that are protective. Why, therefore, should we destroy a well-established industry that pays taxes to supply our Government and instead promote a foreign industry that pays nothing toward the support of our Government? If we reduce our revenue one-half by lowering or removing duties we must double our imports to collect the same revenue that we now collect under present methods. The employment of American machinery to its fullest capacity under the McKinley law, as previously stated, not only consumed all of our own wool product, but required the importation of over 168,000,000 pounds more, an important quality which never before was ever approached.

FOREIGN WOOLS.

This foreign wool was bought because, even with the duty added, it was as cheap as American wool, the London or free-trade price of all wools having been only one-half of the American price for wool of the same kind and quality. Is it not, therefore, conclusively proven that protection doubles the price to the American grower? Cheap foreign wool makes cheap American wool, and if the American woolgrowers had held their wools above the prices here of the foreign wools with the duty added, the latter, being cheaper, would have entirely supplied American mills and would have left the American clip wholly unused, and the American woolgrower has been obliged to accept declining prices during the past few years because the markets of the world for wool have been declining. The London value of wool during the two years previous to Mr. Cleveland's inauguration fell over 30 per cent, and during the same period American wool declined less than 7 per cent. If it was not the protection of the McKinley tariff that stood between the Ohio woolgrowers and the cheaper wool market of the world what was it?

Since President Cleveland's inauguration, and the assault by his Administration upon the American wool industry, American prices have declined from 25 to 30 per cent, and why? Why did American wools hold up before this Administration came in, and fall immediately afterwards? It was because it was well known by everybody in the business that the London or free-trade price could not be reached without a decline in American prices of at least 30 per cent.

NOT TRUE.

When you state that a workman will produce more cloth in this country than in foreign countries under conditions otherwise similar, you make a statement without foundation in fact. A manufacturer in this vicinity who up to 1890, was making woolen goods in Bradford, England, under free trade, moved his machinery under the McKinley bill from England to the United States. He has been running identically the same machinery and with some of the same help employed upon the same machinery under free trade in England and under the McKinley law in the United States.

He says that the same man turns out as much or more work in England as in the United States, and that the labor cost in the weaving alone on 1 yard of cloth in England, under cheap foreign wages, is less than 2 cents, and the labor cost of weaving 1 yard of the same quality of cloth in the United States is 7 cents. This is owing to the higher wages paid here. This is for the labor of weaving alone, and the whole amount of labor represented by wages paid in constructing a yard of cloth from the time the wool is handled until the cloth is finished is only 15 cents in England, as against 34 cents in the United States. This is a comparison of free trade and protected labor on the same machinery, and in some cases with the same workmen, and is wholly outside of the cost of the raw material.

LOCOMOTIVES AND WATCHES.

You say that we export locomotives, watches, hardware, and many other things almost entirely composed of labor. The exporter of locomotives and watches gets a drawback of 99 per cent of the duties paid on his imported raw material, but, in point of fact, locomotives are now exported because the American type, rather than the foreign type of locomotives, are wanted abroad.

The largest exporter of locomotives informs me that the English machinists choose to copy our patterns of locomotives. Owing to the difference in labor in their favor, they will be able to beat us out of such foreign markets as we now hold. The same applies to watches. When we began to make watches by machinery, the Swiss handmade watches were supplanted by American machine-made watches, and the Swiss watchmakers were idle; but since Switzerland has been compelled to put in the American patterns of machinery for making watches, owing to cheaper Swiss labor, they now make them cheaper than American watches. They are not only regaining the markets of the world which they had previously lost, but are invading the United States, and you can now buy cheap Swiss watches at a price, including the duty, that is as low or lower than the same grade of American watches, and I would like to know who in this instance pays the duty. The McKinley duties on watches no longer cover the difference between Swiss and American wages, as was the case when that law was made.

RAW MATERIAL.

You say that by putting raw materials on the free list we would be protecting our manufacturers more than we are protecting them now. You appear to know more about their interests than they they do themselves; otherwise, why should 85 per cent of all the American woolen manufacturers join in a petition to the United States Senate against the placing of wool on the free list? You can see in the New York Daily Tribune of September 13 the telegram announcing from Washington that woolen manufacturers protested for seven hours before the Ways and Means Committee against any disturbance of the McKinley duties. "Every manufacturer of woolen goods who spoke strongly opposed the removal of duties from wool, declaring that it would be ruinous to the woolgrowers and flock-owners of the United States and of no benefit to American manufacturers or American wool consumers." You must admit that manufacturers know more about the interests of their own business than those not in the business, like yourself, and that the placing of such raw material as wool on the free list would not enable them to make a single yard more of anything which they can now make.

FINE GOODS.

You say that American wool can not be manufactured into as fine goods as are produced by a combination of American and foreign wools. Here you are again greatly in error. The late Capt. J. P. Bradley, of Ballardvale, Mass., and I believe, also, Mr. MOSES STEVENS, a member of the present Committee of Ways and Means, made goods a quarter of a century ago of American pick lock or Saxony wool, which were so extremely fine that a yard of it could be drawn through a lady's finger ring. No finer goods can be made to-day from any wool grown in any other part of the world.

Hundreds of thousands of pounds of this pick lock or Saxony wool, with a diameter of from 2,000 to 2,500 fibers to the inch, was sold under this very roof in former years. Australians did not produce it then, but now they produce Saxony wool so much cheaper than it can be produced on Ohio farms that our manufacturers have imported it from Australia, and the American woolgrowers, being unable to compete in price, are not now raising Saxony wool yielding two pounds to the fleece, but have gone into the business of producing the coarser merino wool, because they clip from 5 to 6 pounds to the fleece. If the duties are removed the Australian competition that forced the Ohio woolgrower out of the business of producing Saxony wool will also force him to abandon the production of double extra Ohio or merino wool.

DUTY ON FOREIGN WOOLS.

It is quite true, as you say, that if the duty on foreign wools is removed the American manufacturers would become bidders on foreign wool. If American manufacturers are to supply themselves with foreign wool it would be only because it would be cheaper to them than Ohio wool. Who, then, will be left to buy the Ohio clip, and what is to become of it? If American wool falls to the foreign price under free-trade the Ohio sheep will be fattened and sent to the butcher, and woolgrowing in Ohio will cease to be an industry there, except in limited cases, where the farmers can produce the coarser wool sheep for the meat, as they now produce cattle for that purpose. They would then consider the wool a by-product, as bullocks' hides are now considered.

When conditions arrive at this point there will be no merino or fine wool sheep in Ohio, and none of any kind except mutton sheep, as is now the case in England. Since the enormous increase in the world's supply in Australia and the Argentine Republic prices of merino wool throughout the world have fallen, and there is not a flock of merino sheep in England to-day. The only sheep left in that country are the coarse wool or merino sheep mainly produced for the meat. Under the severity of free-trade competition with Australia. England to-day produces only 130,000,000 pounds of wool, as against 160,000,000 pounds in 1875, when Australia only produced three-fifths of its present supply.

COMPARISON.

Chairman WILSON, of the Committee of Ways and Means, being wholly unable to find any plausible reason for the removal of the duty upon wool, had to resort, for an illustration, to a comparison with conditions in 1857. He stated that "wool in 1857 was put on the free list, and at that time we were prosperous." Now, what were then the existing conditions? In July, 1857, Ohio wool was worth 60 cents, and wool was then put on the free list; James Buchanan had been elected President, a financial panic spread all over the country, and by the end of that year Ohio wool had fallen to 30 cents—a decline of 50 per cent in six months.

Chairman WILSON points to this condition as a happy state of affairs, and invites the American people to a new trial of the same experience. Besides, in 1857 the conditions of the world's supply were very unlike those of 1893. Australia then produced only 30,000,000 pounds of scoured wool, as against 250,000,000 pounds in 1893, an increase of over 700 per cent; the river Platte produced over 10,000,000 pounds of scoured wool, and in 1893 that country produced 110,000,000 pounds of scoured wool, an increase of 1,000 per cent. The Cape of Good Hope in 1857 produced only 10,000,000 pounds of scoured wool, while in 1893 that country produced 50,000,000 pounds of scoured wool, an increase of 400 per cent.

Thus the world's supply of wool in 1893 is drawn from the southern hemisphere, where, by reason of perennial pastures, better in winter than in summer, wool can be produced cheaply, while in 1857 the bulk of the world's supply came from the northern hemisphere, where, owing to winter feeding, woolgrowing is costly.

New and extensive fields for woolgrowing have been opened in the Southern temperate zone that were idle in 1857. In March, 1893, double extra Ohio protected wool was worth over 60 cents scoured, and in free-trade London the same quality was worth 30 cents. If it were known that the McKinley law would not be disturbed, double extra Ohio wool in the fleece would again be worth 60 cents scoured (its value on the day that President Harrison left the White House), but with free wool the price of double extra Ohio would be the London price of 30 cents scoured.

AUSTRALIAN WOOL.

You say if Americans buy Australian wool it will lessen English supplies and advance English prices. This could not take place until the American clip is no longer produced. Then if we had enough protection upon cloth to cover the difference between English and American wages, so that we could compete with English cloth in our own markets, we would buy our raw wools in the London market as a matter of course, and the world's price for wool would advance. It might even advance to a degree that would make wool in the free-trade markets of the world as high as it is to-day in the United States under protection, but when this takes place the cost of the raw material in a suit of clothes must then be fully as great under free wool as it is to day with protected wool. Admitting that such may be the case, what has been accomplished? What has been gained?

You have destroyed the American wool industry, worth to the nation $200,000,000, and lessened the ability of the American woolgrower to purchase clothing. You have destroyed a market for 45,000,000 bushels of corn and 200,000,000, pounds of hay previously consumed by our 45,000,000 sheep. You have lessened the value of the sheep farm; you have paid an awful price for free raw material, and at the end of ten years, after destroying the American wool supply, which is one-eighth of the world's product, wool becomes scarce and dear, and owing to the advance in the wool markets of the world clothing would be as dear or dearer than it ever was under the McKinley law. Now, if clothing is not to be permanently cheaper, what advantage is there in paying such a price for the experiment?

When the free trader has realized to the fullest extent all that he ever hoped for from free trade, the cost of obtaining it will have been found to have been so great as to have counterbalanced more than hundreds of thousands of times over the supposed free-trade advantages. You can not destroy a great industry in which at least five million people, directly and indirectly, are interested without causing much misery to many men, nor without crippling to a greater or less degree every other man.

The prosperity of this country under the McKinley law has been the greatest in its history. Why should we, therefore, repeal that law under which the American nation has been not only the most prosperous nation of the world, but during that time the only prosperous nation of the world?

This letter of Mr. Justice squarely meets and triumphantly answers each and every argument which has been made on this floor during this debate.

The following is the table to which I have referred. It shows that the difference between the price of the Ohio product at the seaboard and the price of similar wool in London has been about, generally, the tariff on the London wool at the port of New York:

The woolgrowers of Ohio will suffer an irreparable loss if this bill passes. There are thousands of acres of land in Ohio, profitable for sheep husbandry under just protection, which will be become almost worthless if the industry goes down. Sheep husbandry furnishes occupation for thousands who if it fails will be driven to crowd the markets for other forms of labor. Wool has for many years been the source from which much of the ready cash of the Ohio farmer came. Destroy the industry and I do not know where he will look successfully for a substitute source of revenue.

This bill discriminates against this Northern industry. Rice is to be strongly protected, wool to be destroyed. Rice grows in Georgia and other Southern States. Wool grows in Ohio and other Northern States. I denounce the whole scheme as an unpardonable wrong. It is a blow at one of the greatest agricultural interests of the country, and as a representative of an agricultural constituency, I condemn it.

The scheme is unwise, un-American, unpatriotic, sectional, vicious, partisan, and Democratic.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. Mr. Chairman, I have received some petitions yesterday and to-day signed by reputable and intelligent citizens of Parke County, Ind., and since I very heartily concur in the statements set forth in the petitions, I desire to send to the desk one of them that I hold in my hand at this time, and ask to have it read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

To Hon. E. V. BROOKSHIRE:

In view of the misrepresentation being made by the enemies of tariff reform in their desperate efforts to defeat the will of the people, as expressed by their votes at the last national election, we, the undersigned, Democratic voters of the Eighth Congressional district, would earnestly urge you as our Representative to vote for the exemplification of the Chicago platform as far as is possible to be secured in the Wilson revenue bill, viz:

That tariff taxes be reduced to the lowest point that will yield the greatest revenue necessary to meet the requirements of economical government, and that customs duties be ad valorem.

We further request that you keep in mind that so-called "protection" is a fraud and a robbery of the great body of the people for the benefit of a few, and wholly inconsistent with that Democratic principle: "Equal rights to all; special privileges to none."

We desire that you use your best efforts to secure a tax on incomes.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. I will now send to the desk and ask to have read an editorial article from the Rockville Tribune, published in the State of Indiana, an ably edited paper, that has direct reference to the matter under consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE WOOL HUMBUG.

"In 1854, under low tariff, 2½ pounds of Parke County wool would pay the taxes on one hundred sheep. In 1893, under the McKinley bill, it takes 20 pounds to pay on the same number."—Tribune.

"It is child's play to make assertions. 'There's a great big bear! He'll eat you up! Look out!' says the little boy to his companion, but really there is no bear at all. We desire to see and most respectfully ask the Tribune to give us the figures to prove the above remarkable assertion. We want the price of sheep, the price of wool, and the rate of taxation in 1854 in Parke County, and the same things for 1893. We want information on this matter, not rash assertions. Will the Tribune give it?"—Republican.

The Tribune will cheerfully give the information, and having taken the time to get the facts asked for by the Republican, will that paper have the honesty to print them? We think not.

The returns of the assessors for 1854, on file at the auditor's office, show that 42,611 pounds of wool were valued at $10,878—a little more that 25 cents per pound. The same returns show further that during the six following years of low tariff the price averaged nearly 30 cents, being lower in 1854 than the average. So much for the assessed, not the market value of wool, which was no doubt higher.

In the same year 20,473 sheep were valued at $18,568; 100 head being valued at about $93. The rate of taxation was 57 cents on the $100, so that less than 2½ pounds of wool paid taxes on 100 sheep, even if we take the assessed value of wool as a basis, and not the money the farmer received at the factory.

In the year of our McKinley, 1893, 100 sheep are assessed $300—the lowest figure. The rate of taxation will average $1.36 on the $100. Twenty pounds of wool at 18 cents a pound will pay taxes to the amount of $3.60, while the taxes on 100 sheep are $4.08.

Instead of overdoing the thing in our unofficial statement, the undisputable evidence of the records shows that we did not put the tax paying power of wool high enough for 1854, while we put it too low for 1893. If the rejoinder is made that our taxes are higher than they were in 1854, by reason of improvements, why is it that land was then appreciating in value, while for twenty years it has been depreciating, in spite of all we have paid and are paying in taxes with a view of adding value to our farms.

The whole tariff humbug can be so well shown up in the wool discussion that we are prompted to give its exchange value when it comes to buying back the highly "protected" woolens. During the period of low tariff there were several factories in Parke County, and just over its borders. The farmer, when he took his wool to market, got 1 pound of yarn in return for 2 of wool. Now the factories are gone—driven to destruction because they could not put good woolens on the market in competition with shoddy—and the farmer's wool, exchanged at the factory of some Eastern plutocrat, must go at the rate of 4 or 5 pounds to 1 of yarn, if he gets the same quality he received thirty-five years ago. Does it pay to tax ourselves that we may grow 18-cent wool on three-dollar mutton?

If we take wheat we find the same story, for only once from 1855 to 1860 did it get below $1 a bushel on the Wabash Canal. A half bushel of wheat would buy nearly as much goods in 1890 as a bushel will buy now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman one question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the petitions which have just been presented and read from the Clerk's desk. The last one was apparently somewhat of an innovation, not only upon those read yesterday, but, I take it, it is one of a very few in that line.

Now, the petitions presented by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] as coming from the State of Nevada and the Pacific coast generally present exactly the interests and condition of the sheep men and wool-raisers in that region. Having lived among them for ten years, I hope I am somewhat acquainted with the business as carried on in the Western country, as well as with the condition and necessities of those engaged in the business of sheep-raising and wool-growing.

Now, there is one thing which must be borne in mind, which is that so far as the great sheep-owners of the Pacific coast are concerned, that they are farther removed from market than any others, that it costs them vastly more to get their products into the market than it does those who live nearer the Eastern seaports of the United States—the market for the American wool.

Now, putting wool upon the free list brings those of the Pacific coast as well as all other wool-growers into competition with the wool-growers of Australia, New Zealand, and the Argentine Republic, there now being over 100,000,000 sheep in Australia, and between 50,000,000 and 60,000,000 in the Argentine Republic, against 45,000,000 in the United States. These countries can lay their wool down in the market upon the Eastern seaboard markets of the United States at about three-fourths of a cent a pound, while it costs the Pacific coast wool-grower from 3 to 4 cents a pound, commission and insurance included, to lay his down in the Boston and Philadelphia markets.

Then, another thing, there is a vast disparity between the wages paid here and the wages paid in Australia and the Argentine Republic. We pay the shepherds of our country from $30 to $40 per month, while in Australia, in the most favored country of all that section—New South Wales—according to the special consular reports on Australian sheep and wool, compiled by George H. Wallace, consul-general of the United States, Melbourne, Victoria, August 5, 1892, page 41, they pay not to exceed $20 per month for the best white labor; and there one man cares for about 2,000 sheep, while with us it takes one man to every four or five hundred, to look after them properly.

Another thing, sheep in our country must bear their share of taxation. They are taxed the same as any other commodity or article, while in New South Wales there is no taxation upon the sheep. The sheepmen there pay a mere nominal land tax and sheep are exempted from taxation.

Now, gentlemen speak about wanting the duty on wool removed. How do other countries treat us as to being liberal to those engaged in the sheep business? If we desire to export sheep to Australia, what must we do? By referring to page 32 of the report to which I have alluded I find in the language of that report that—

The direct importation of sheep from the United States, which had grown to considerable proportions, was brought to a stop by the regulation adopted in 1880.

Under that regulation if we wish to send American sheep to Australia we must not only show that they have been held in quarantine for ninety days, but in the language of subdivision 1, of section 33 of the act, must further show, "That they (the sheep) have been in the country from which it is intended (i. e., the United States) to introduce them for a period of sixty days, and not less than fourteen days in Great Britain or Ireland."

In other words, if the American sheep producer wishes to send sheep to Australia he must not only show that they have been held in quarantine for the required number of days, but that they have been shipped from England or Ireland instead of sending them directly across the ocean to the market; that is, that they must go by way of Great Britain and be held fourteen days there.

It occurs to me, Mr. Chairman, when we come to look at this bill, that so far as the wool-grower of the West is concerned he must suffer a great hardship indeed; his product is classed as "raw material" and his hope for success ruined. It is proposed to give us our wool free and keep a tariff upon our woolen goods. By this bill even sheepskins are put upon the free list, while you impose a duty upon the gloves manufactured from these skins. The shepherd is to have no protection upon his wool or pelts, but there is a duty on his woolen clothing and sheepskin gloves.

To compensate him for this loss, what do you propose to do? You propose to reduce his wages, to drive him out of business; but in order to let him down easy you give him cheaper champagne. You reduce the duties on laces and embroideries; you let him have his silks and plushes at lower prices. You make kid gloves cheaper, also ostrich feathers and artificial flowers. That is what you propose to do for the sheep-owner in the West in this bill. You propose to reduce all these things to benefit the poor sheepman and at the same time wipe out of existence the very industry upon which he depends not only for the luxuries of life (still made dutiable by this bill), but for the necessaries of life he must have in order to support and educate his family.

I am free to say, Mr. Chairman, that the Western wool-grower can not continue in this business if this bill becomes a law. Its effect is already being felt, and that effect upon the people whom I have the honor to represent is dire indeed. In 1892 they were able to realize at home some 14 cents for their wool. To-day wool is a drug upon the market at 7 cents. I have a letter here from a constituent of mine, and a very intelligent man, who, in writing upon this subject, speaking of the effect of this tariff agitation, says:

PRINEVILLE, OREGON, December 16, 1893.

DEAR SIR: * * * I desire to say that it had a most disastrous effect, and to fully explain I call your attention to the figures below.

To be brief in the matter, I refer to the year 1892 and take for a basis good average wool-scouring, 60 to 65 per cent which, during the season of 1892, averaged our growers 14 cents from sheep of an average value of $3 per head. This season of 1893, under tariff agitation, the same staple of wool averaged growers 7 cents and same class of sheep declined to $1 per head. So you will readily see what the effect of the recent tariff agitation had on our industries and what losses were attributed to the decline in values. But to show more fully how it affected a small community like ours, we had in our county 200,000 sheep and a wool clip aggregating 1,500,000 pounds. On wool the loss was one half, or 7 cents per pound.

Loss on wool	$105,000
Decline on value of sheep, at $2 per head	500,000
Total loss in one season	605,000

From the above you can see what loss we have sustained only for one year.

Yours, truly,

J. H. GRAY.

Hon. W. R. ELLIS, Washington, D. C.

That is in a county large in area, which contains a population of less than 4,000 inhabitants, and it suffers a loss of $600,000. If by reason of the agitation of this measure the loss is so great, what will it be if this bill becomes a law? I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], referring to the price of wool, has properly explained why there has been a decline in the price of wool under the McKinley bill. Wool, like any other commodity, declines according to the demand for it in the market; and I claim that while there has been a small decline in later years, I think the decline has not been as great here as in the London market. I submit here a table showing the monthly price of Ohio medium unscoured in the seaboard markets of the United States and the New Zealand unscoured in the London market, the two being practically identical.

From this table it will be readily seen that the relative difference in price is maintained in this country, although there had been an apparent decline in price. A Western paper, to my mind, has well named this bill when it speaks of it as a "bill for the free coinage of panics." It seems to me that that would be a more appropriate title than the present one. And now, Mr. Chairman, I think that the time has come for us to put an end to booming charity, which is about the only thing that has received a boom by reason of the probability of this bill becoming a law. I believe in charity, but would much prefer that there were no necessity for it. The time has come when we should quit booming charity and monarchies and to do something to boom American industries and furnish work at remunerative wages to the American workingman. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, there are a few points in this discussion of the tariff that have not yet been mentioned; but, before I come to any of them, I desire to congratulate the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] for having joined the "Calamity Howling Party." Out in Kansas Third Party men are called "calamity howlers." I have listened to their earnest and just complaints, and we have earned that title, perhaps justly. But, sir, I never have heard so long, so persistent, and a more truthful calamity howl than we heard yesterday afternoon in this House. Certainly I never heard it more strongly from a single industrial interest than the gentleman has repeated respecting the sufferings of the wool-growers of this country.

I want to say, in addition, that, what the honorable gentleman said was true. While I disagree with him as to the cause of the trouble I repeat that, all he said was true, and all that his correspondents have said is true; but as to the cause of their distresses of course we differ.

I desire to say that while wool has fallen in price, and while that industry has got into a bad condition, it is in no worse condition than other industries. While wool has fallen in price, so has wheat; while wool has fallen, so has cotton; so has corn, so has beef and pork, so have all the products of industry for the last eight or ten years. Take the State of Illinois, one of the richest States, one of the best agricultural States in the world, with her agricultural wealth and her manufacturing industries, and yet in the State of Illinois we find that there are industries which are so depressed that we are led to believe there is very little prosperity there; when, with all their natural advantages, the people of that State are carrying $384,000,000 of mortgage indebtedness on their lands.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield for a question.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Is that mortgage indebtedness limited to farm lands?

Mr. DAVIS. I did not say so, Mr. Chairman; it is on real estate.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. But does not the gentleman know that a large part of that mortgage indebtedness is on property in the city of Chicago?

Mr. DAVIS. It does not matter about that; there is great industrial depression.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Yes; but——

Mr. DAVIS. I did not yield for an argument.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. But the gentleman, in speaking of the farmers of Illinois and their condition, must not load the mortgage indebtedness of the city of Chicago upon their backs.

Mr. DAVIS. I repeat, sir, that in 1890, a long time before the tariff scare on account of the domination of the Democratic party occurred, there existed on the real estate of Illinois a mortgage indebtedness of $384,000,000; and I suppose that in Illinois there are other men besides farmers who try to own their homes and are compelled to mortgage them.

Then, in the State of Pennsylvania, that land of protection, that land of prosperity, supplied with ores and coal, and with all the requisite resources of wealth, the people are loaded with $613,000,000 of mortgage indebtedness on their real estate; and the mortgage indebtedness of the great State of New York is $1,600,000,000, more than half of the original debt of the United States at the close of the war. Those debts do not proclaim prosperity.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Now, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me a question there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. DAVIS. For a question only.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The gentleman says that these mortgages do not indicate prosperity. I will ask the gentleman if he does not believe that its mortgage indebtedness is one of the great causes of prosperity of the city of Chicago; and I will ask him, further, if he believes that that city could have been built up after the great fire in 1871 had it not been that the credit of the business men in that city was such as to enable them to secure such large loans that have been used by them to construct those magnificent buildings that are an ornament to that city to-day?

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I find a circular issued by a banking firm in New York City which states that wheat-raising has not paid since 1884, and that the farmer must now give 2 bushels of wheat to get possession of the same coupon that he could formerly have obtained by giving 1 bushel. I am stating general principles. There are exceptions to all rules, but I am arguing the general question all over this country. I submit the following statement:

A year ago we wrote, saying, "In attempting to forecast the future we look for higher prices for wheat the coming six months." No time during four months following did the price decline more than 1 cent below quotations in Chicago, December 23, 1892, and it did make more than 10 cents, and remained for many weeks above that advance. We again feel like renewing last year's forecast, especially so as values are more than 16 per cent less and far below cost of production everywhere where wheat is grown or consumed. Bears and consumers have had a long inning. It is about time the producer be given a chance. Since May, 1893, economies gowing out of the Baring failure in Europe in 1890, and those emanating from effects of the ukase in Russia in 1891, Hatch bill proceedings in Washington in 1892, and later "the object lesson," or credit panic, coupled with a surplus from the 1891 and 1892 crops, plus the two largest rye crops grown, and an unusually large root crop the world over, evidently prevented Chicago cash wheat from getting above the "dizzy heights of 70 cents" since early June. The average price has been about 63¼ cents.

Only three Mays in the past thirty years has wheat sold under 80 cents in Chicago. No punishment in any calling has been longer endured or more severe and steady than that of the wheat-grower, who has sold at a loss yearly since 1884, occasionally giving 2 bushels where he used to give 1 to get possession of the coupon from off his mortgage after reaping but 2 bushels where in 1891 he thrashed 3. The above seven reasons terminating around the ending of seven years has forced a large part of the world's supply into city elevators (where expenses for carrying each 5,000 bushels or contract per day is slightly more than $2.50). Our visible and the world's visible will likely soon reach the largest amount ever known. January 21 last it was then the largest, 82,250,000 bushels. We believe consumption and waste is about at the maximum the world over; that speculation is about at the minimum point with bull sentiment about "all gone." Doubtless consumers' "cupboards" have smaller and less flour sacks than years ago, jobbers less barrels of sacks in store. The flour visible is less than last Christmas. The milling output this month is about the same as in December, 1892; for November the output was never larger; for the calendar year it will fall short of 1892 about 14 per cent.

Since 1869 Great Britain's millers, farmers, or land owners have not prospered; then England took off protection for imported bread food. July wheat in Chicago is selling only about 1 cent over May, and at the lowest price at this season of the year ever known; in Minneapolis cash wheat commands May prices; their stocks are about 18 per cent less than a year ago. Minneapolis and Duluth have but 18,000,000 bushels, against 20,000,000 last year. It is reported in the Northwest that their visible is 35,000,000 bushels less. The world's visible will show but little gain this month. (Weekly market letter, Clapp & Co., bankers and brokers, 60 Broadway, New York, Friday morning, 9 a. m., December 22, 1893.)

Mr. HICKS. Does your estimate of the mortgages of Pennsylvania include building association mortgages?

Mr. DAVIS. I take the figures as I find them. I will submit a table from the United States census report showing some facts along with my remarks.

Mr. DALZELL. Does not the gentleman know that that mortgage indebtedness in Pennsylvania rests mainly upon property in the large cities, and not upon the farms?

Mr. DAVIS. Now, Mr. Chairman, covering the point that debts indicate prosperity, I will say that I know of but one calling in which debts indicate prosperity, and in which men do live on the interest of their debts, and that is the national banking business. [Laughter.] But, sir, all debts, bonds, and mortgages ultimately rest upon the people as a burden. They do not indicate prosperity for the people.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has been interrupted repeatedly, and I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended ten minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, in order that we may understand the significance of that statement of the mortgage indebtedness of Pennsylvania, will the gentleman tell us what percentage it represents of the total valuation of the property in that State; for otherwise it does not give us any information.

Mr. DAVIS. I have here a statement of the per capita indebtedness of several of the States. I find that in Pennsylvania it is $117 per capita; in Colorado, $206 per capita; in my own State, $170 per capita; in New York, $268 per capita. These debts rest upon the people most certainly, somewhere and somehow, and gentlemen may apportion the burdens as they please; I will not subdivide this indebtedness in a short speech like this. It all rests upon the people.

New York has a per capita mortgage debt of $268, and in this respect exceeds twenty other States that have been tabulated, as appears in the following comparative statement:

[Extra Census Bulletin (United States Census) No. 54, August 30, 1893.]

Alabama	$26	Kansas	$170	New York	$268
Arkansas	13	Maine	49	Oregon	73
Colorado	206	Massachusetts	144	Pennsylvania	117
Connecticut	107	Minnesota	152	Rhode Island	106
Illinois	100	Missouri	80	Tennessee	23
Indiana	51	Nebraska	126	Vermont	84
Iowa	101	New Hampshire	50	Wisconsin	72

Mr. Chairman, I am told that Illinois farming has not paid for years. I have been told by a gentleman from Illinois that the last eight or ten corn crops have been a losing game to the amount of $10,000,000 per annum.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can not truly represent the State of Illinois by any such statement as that which he has just made. I say that farming does pay in Illinois, and I say there has not been a corn crop raised in that State since the Republican party came into power in 1856 in the State of Illinois that has not brought wealth to the homes of the farmers of that State; and any figures which the gentleman may present here, showing that the farmers of Illinois have generally raised their crops at a loss, are totally unreliable.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not yield for a speech, Mr. Chairman. In the South we find that cotton and wool are failures as paying crops. Cotton has been sold at a loss, and last fall, sometimes, it could not be sold at all. In my own State wheat has been sometimes carried to market and home again without a bid. It could not be sold at all. We find, then, that cotton has not paid, wheat has not paid, and corn has not paid. And, sir, we find that the silver-mining industry has been closed up entirely. Now, in the face of all these facts I declare that the tariff is not the cause of our distresses. The tariff does not touch corn, nor many other articles which have fallen in price. Sir, there is an underlying cause which has produced this general shrinkage of prices. Sir, it has been a contraction of the currency of the country, causing falling prices, general indebtedness, and general inability to pay. The people are carrying monetary obligations beyond their ability to pay. Farmers are losing their homes with frightful rapidity through mortgage foreclosures and the sheriff's processes.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another point that I wish to touch upon. A false impression seems to be abroad in regard to the effect of the tariff on wool. The arguments and complaints that we heard here yesterday are almost identically of the same character as those that came from the English farmers when it was proposed there to remove the tariff on wool. They said that it would destroy the sheep industry. But the tariff was taken off, nevertheless, and the English sheep industry increased in consequence of free trade in wool. Free trade in wool will not lower the price of American wools. It will not admit foreign wools which will compete with our best wools; but it will bring in foreign wools fit to mix with our own; thus causing a greater use of our wools and the manufacture of a greater variety of goods; and if we get those foreign wools cheaply our American manufacturers can afford to pay more for our home wools, and there will be an increased demand for our home product. These are not my own theories or ideas. They are the lessons of experience and history. If gentlemen who are willing to learn will look over the debates in 1857, they will find these sentiments uttered by such men as Charles Sumner and Henry Wilson, and others of the New England States. Those statesmen evidently believed that in some cases free trade was the best protection for the people.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what is the true position on the tariff? In my opinion, we ought to say as Garfield said, "I am a protectionist; I am in favor of protection; I am in favor of that protection which leads to ultimate free trade." That was the statement of Gen. Garfield in July, 1866. It was then good Republican doctrine.

As a general result, it has been found that there are no wools raised anywhere abroad for export that will compete with our American middle wools, such as are produced on the Oxford sheep, the Southdowns, and the like breeds of sheep; nor with our combing wools of the Liecester and Cotswold breeds. Every country producing these classes of sheep produces them primarily for their mutton, and secondarily for their wool; and each country needs more of that quality of wool than it can produce, so that none is exported to this country or to any other country in the unmanufactured condition.

Mr. HARTER. Is it not a fact that those grades of wool about which the gentleman is now talking have averaged a higher price per pound for the last eight or nine years in the London market than in the market of the United States, in which they are grown?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; I believe that has been more or less true ever since the Crimean war. One other point. Take the merino wools of South America and Australia, which come from a different atmosphere, from different soils, and from different climates from ours; when they are brought here you find that they are fit to mix with our native merino wools, and they do not directly compete. The facts of history show that after free trade in wool was established in England wool did not fall in price, but was in greater demand than before, and that more sheep were raised in England than ever before.

In this country, where lands ought to be higher, it is not profitable to raise large flocks of merino sheep. They may be raised for breeding purposes, but not for wool purposes alone. The profitable sheep in this country are those which are raised primarily for mutton and secondarily for wool; and the wool of these classes of sheep will not fall in the market from any change of tariff. If it falls, it is from the decrease of money, causing fewer dollars to buy a given article of property, compelling men to sell the products of their labor for lower prices, in order to meet their debts and taxes and general expenses.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that our industries are safe when they are founded on the fickle policy of raising or lowering the tariff; because no matter what tariff you may adopt, there is the continual fear that it will be changed. And the tremor now exhibited all the time by gentlemen interested in the protected industries proves that the tariff is not a safe foundation for prices. Let us have a solid foundation that does not care at all for a low tariff or a high tariff. We can do this by removing the present system of tariff taxation and adopting a juster system. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say before I sit down that it is impossible to maintain an equitable distribution of property in a country where the revenues are gathered through tariff taxation. Ten men owning $1,000 each, and each having a family of six persons, pay tariff taxes on the consumption of sixty persons. One man with $10,000 and six persons in his family pays a revenue on but six persons. Hence, tariff taxation taxes property in many hands heavily; it taxes property in few hands lightly. That being so, these ten men with ten families, paying on consumption rather than on accumulations, pay ten times as much taxes in proportion to property as the one man with $10,000 pays. Now, let that one man be a millionaire, and then see how much greater the difference is. If the $1,000,000 be in the hands of one hundred persons, they pay one hundred times as much tariff taxes on that property as would be paid if the same property were in the hands of one person.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois obtained the floor.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Before my friend from Illinois begins to speak, I trust we may agree upon a time when the vote shall be taken on this question.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I wish the gentleman would bring that matter up a little later.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I do not want to take my friend off the floor or curtail his time; but can we not agree to have a vote at 1 o'clock?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Extensions of time have been pretty liberal on both sides of the House, and I would be glad if the gentleman would withhold for ten or fifteen minutes his proposition as to taking a vote.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I do not want to prevent the gentleman from Illinois having as much time as he may desire.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask that the gentleman from Illinois may be allowed to speak for fifteen minutes.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. There is no objection to that. I am only trying to see whether we can not now agree upon some time for taking the vote.

Mr. BURROWS. We will try to come to some understanding on that point after the gentleman from Illinois has concluded.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] be allowed fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I shall want so much time as fifteen minutes, unless I can have more.

This question in its economic as well as in its financial aspect is peculiar. It is, as the gentleman from Massachusetts said yesterday, purely, from time to time, a question of business. A wise policy for Great Britain is not necessarily a wise policy for the United States. Note the difference between the two countries. Great Britain, a country of vast age, of small territory, fully settled, with 36,000,000 of people, with great accumulations of wealth, finds the markets for her products all about this earth. She has to journey everywhere at great expense to find her markets, which are far inferior in amount and quality than we find amongst ourselves in our own markets.

Mr. DINGLEY. And at the same time wages with us are larger.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes, wages are larger. What is true of Great Britain is true of Belgium and of all the countries in Europe. But in the United States we have not far from 70,000,000 of people at the present time; and the increase of population in the United States since 1860 is equal to the whole population of Great Britain. If we could fully utilize the market afforded by this increase of population alone in the United States since 1860, we would have a market equal to that which we would have in Great Britain if we monopolized her markets for all kinds of consumption. We are in a period of development. In the next hundred years our 70,000,000 of people are to grow to 250,000,000. Now, if we can dominate the market from this time to that, amongst ourselves with our own products, we will continue to have the best markets of any nation in the world, even if we do not sell one pound, one yard, or one bushel abroad.

This can only be done by developing all our resources—diversifying agriculture and diversifying all other industries. So that it is sound business policy to utilize our present markets and the markets to come. It is an unsound business policy to throw away a market of 70,000,000 of our own people, soon to be increased to 250,000,000, in order to compete in a market that is not one-twentieth as large elsewhere. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I will admit, in the fullness of time, when we shall have 250,000,000 of people instead of 70,000,000, as now, the time may come, and probably will come, when we shall dominate the markets of this country and this continent, and that we may then change our policy. But we ought not to change it until that time does come.

Now, then, on this foundation rests the whole policy of protection, in my own mind, so far at least as I am concerned.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, I will yield for a bare question.

Mr. COX. Only a question. Then your conclusion is that it is only a question of time when you can come to the Democratic doctrine?

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, no; when he comes to our doctrine.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. We will never get to the Democratic doctrine.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Let me answer now.

Mr. COX. Very well, let us know.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will answer, and hope I will not be interrupted to any great extent. When the time comes for us to change our policy, if it ever does, and in changing it we can gain for our people more than we lose, then I shall be for changing it, call it what policy you please. [Applause on the Republican side.]

A step farther. Much has been said about wheat. Wheat is cheaper now than it was formerly. Why? Because there are only two countries in Europe that buy wheat of us or of anybody—and I hope I shall have attention. It is shown by the reports of the Agricultural Department that those two countries are Great Britain and Belgium. Who sells the wheat in that market in competition with us? I answer Roumania, Russia, India, and the Argentine Republic. It is a very small market. In the year 1890 we sold 36 per cent of our wheat product abroad, whereas we sold less than 5 per cent of our other agricultural products abroad. What is the true remedy? Wheat is sold at ruinous prices. The true remedy is to broaden our market at home. How? By giving everybody employment. Then everybody will be a generous customer instead of a starvation customer.

But again. We should further diversify agriculture in sugar, wool, and everything else. We should also further diversify our manufactures, because as we diversify our industries we make customers for the farmer and customers for all producers. It is better for the farmer to sell to customers at home the wheat he has been raising rather than to have more men on the farm to raise more 50-cent wheat to compete in the markets of the two countries in the world where we sell our wheat. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr SIMPSON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. SIMPSON. Does the gentleman not admit that we are now competing in Europe with the different countries of the Old World for the sale of our wheat?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly; with Roumania, Russia, and India.

Mr. SIMPSON. Then the gentleman will admit that the price we receive there fixes the price of our article not only in the United States, but in the foreign markets?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly; all prices are regulated by the prevailing market wherever it is. But let me tell the gentleman this: If you increase the demand for our wheat in the United States by making more customers and fewer farmers—less men engaged in the raising of wheat and more men employed in other industries to consume wheat—we will soon have a market of our own and be absolutely indifferent to the foreign market. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SIMPSON. One word further, if the gentleman pleases.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, please make it brief, as I have but a few minutes.

Mr. SIMPSON. I only want to get at the truth of this controversy.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Very well.

Mr. SIMPSON. I want the gentleman to explain if he can in his speech how it is that so many millions of people are crying for bread in this country, while the price of wheat is so low. What is the matter with the law of supply and demand?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will answer the gentleman, and very fully. Twelve months ago there was no crying for bread—— [Cries of "That is it!" and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. That is correct.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois (continuing). There was not only no cry for bread, but the prices of wheat were higher by one-half than they are now, and everybody who wanted employment was employed at remunerative compensation. The trouble is that when this "Old Man of the Sea," Democracy, came into full power [laughter and applause on the Republican side] with its old threats of interference with the industries of the people, then there was a stop to all enterprise, because the people said "They have promised to wreck our industries, they have promised to reverse our policy, we can not go on and produce because we do not know that we can get the cost of production;" and factories and mills and manufacturing establishments closed down everywhere, so that there was stagnation in every branch of trade and at the same time a cessation of the liberal orders of the customers that had formerly prevailed in this country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KYLE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Take it in Illinois, with a half crop this year of corn and other products; it is the first time in the recollection of anybody when a half crop in Illinois did not bring an increased price, but with a half crop there on the farm the price has decreased. Why? Because the millions of men that were fully employed a year ago, who were the customers of the farmers, are now subsisting on short wages and short employment, or starvation relief at the hands of charity.

Mr. SIMPSON. Just one point more. I think I am helping the gentleman out in his argument.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. My time is very short.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. DAVIS. Which crop do you refer to?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] yield?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If my time can be extended a little bit I will be glad to yield. I have not vexed this House much in this discussion. I will yield, trusting to the generosity of the House to give me a little extension.

Mr. SIMPSON. I just want to ask one more question? When we were called together in extra session, was it not agreed between Republicans and Democrats that the great cause of the hard times that had come suddenly upon us, was the fact that the Government was buying 4,500,000 ounces of silver every month? [Cries of "No!" "No!" on the Republican side.] And did not the Republicans vote with the Democrats on that theory?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appeals to gentlemen to preserve order and to resume their seats.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, Dr. SIMPSON has given the patient fits, and he is the devil on fits! [Laughter.]

A word finally in reply to my friend, and I say it in kindness. I have listened to his speeches here when he proclaimed the poverty in my State of Illinois. Why, my friend, it is a standing wonder and amazement to the multiplied thousands of farmers of Illinois, well-to-do up to the last twelve months, industrious and prosperous as never before in the history of this country—it is a standing matter of wonder and amazement to them how their brethren in Kansas in an evil hour could have sent a gentleman with the peculiar views of my friend from Kansas to represent them on this floor. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. DAVIS. I would like to give the gentleman a little information about Kansas.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. If it is no more valuable than what the gentleman has attempted to give about Illinois, it is not worth listening to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Figures do not lie only when they lie on your side!

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I say in an evil hour these gentlemen were sent here to represent the State of Kansas, but by the mercy of God and the awakened and enlightened thought of their constituents, they soon are to represent that State no more in my opinion, unless they reform. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. SIMPSON. Be careful how you enter the domain of prophecy, for it may come home to yourself.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Possibly it may; if so, I will die fighting for the right policy. Now, Mr. Chairman, a step further. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARTER], and that headlight on economic questions, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARNER], and others, have proclaimed the magnificent condition of the people of Great Britain. I am not here to quarrel with the policy of Great Britain. I think very likely for herself it is a wise policy, but wise as it may be from her standpoint, what has it brought her? I call the attention of my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], to this fact, and I ask him to pick up the Red Book and see what he will find: 800,000 paupers in Great Britain in a population of 36,000,000, to maintain whom requires $50,000,000 a year. Is that the kind of prosperity the gentleman wants in this country?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to one fact? I understand him to say there are about 300,000 paupers in Great Britain.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Eight hundred thousand, and they cost $50,000,000 a year to maintain.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Does not the gentleman know that before the passage of the Peel reform act in 1841, out of a population scarcely half as large, they had in Great Britain more than a million paupers?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not know, and in my judgment the gentleman does not know. [Laughter.] I speak now by the card when I speak of 800,000.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Go back further and you will find still more.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. But I know another thing. In the United States, with nearly double the population of Great Britain, with our higher wages and under our policy, the paupers in this country are only 75,000 as against 800,000 there. [Applause on the Republican side.] Now, somebody says, "Let us buy cheaper." With what shall we buy? With the farm products, they say, and they tell us that we have fine natural advantages to produce them. Drive our seventy millions of people out of their daily employments in order that they may buy cheaper under other conditions abroad; drive them onto the farm to compete with those people who are making 50-cent wheat now.

There is the logical standpoint from the other side, and it is fairly presented by some gentlemen and unfairly presented by this bill. Take my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BLACK]; take the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], as well as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOHNSON], and they have the courage of their convictions. They walk up and say they will vote for this bill, but it is not what they want. They proclaim one and all that they believe in the "fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man." [Laughter on the Republican side.]

The gentleman from New York said in substance that he would make trade absolutely free with all the people upon this footstool "for whom Christ died." [Laughter.] Beautiful! Magnificent! Splendid! Why is it with this magnificent announcement the gentlemen on that side of the House vie with us on this side of the House to exclude the 100,000 Chinese from this country? Did not Christ die for them? The reason is that we can not compete with these Chinese. We have the home, the fireside, the family, the school to maintain. They do not help bear the burdens of government. We do; therefore we exclude them. And in the next breath the Democracy, including my colleague, Mr. BLACK, want to let the product of 400,000,000 of Chinese come into our markets free, without one cent of tax, to compete with the products of our labor.

The gentleman from Illinois, my colleague [Mr. BLACK], said in substance that if we were paying more wages here than like labor received abroad, which promoted immigration from abroad, that he would stop the immigration by cutting off the wages of labor here so that there would be no temptation to the foreign laborer to come to our shores.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I would like to have five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, then, wages are higher here than abroad. Prove it. Yes. The 500,000 to 700,000 who cross the great deep annually, as your fathers and mine crossed it, come here to find homes. Why? Because they better their condition: because the wages are better. We get some immigration, notably the Chinese, whom we are trying to exclude; and some immigration from Poland, and some from Italy that we do not like; and we have passed our laws sifting the immigration. It is wise legislation, but gentlemen declaim against that immigration, and to cure it my colleague from Illinois [Gen. BLACK] would reduce the wages of the man who lives by the sweat of his face in the United States to an equality with the man who labors in Europe, and then he says there would be no wage incentive for the foreigner to immigrate. All this he and the Democratic party propose to accomplish, as they proclaim, by absolute free trade.

In other words, the labor of other countries is to sell its products in our markets free in competition with our labor engaged in making like products. For what? Oh, that we may establish "the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man." Absolute free trade, "with everybody that Christ died for" [laughter], except the hundred thousand Chinese that these gentlemen are with us trying to exclude——

Mr. LOUD. I suppose Christ did not die for them?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I too believe in the "fatherhood of God" and the "brotherhood of man." This brotherhood is being established on a large scale by and through a Government of the people in the United States.

The people are sovereign, and if the sovereign rules wisely there must be character, patriotism, intelligence. This means the fireside, the home, the school, the church, the book, the paper, and something of leisure for thought and Government. All this demands a better return for labor than will barely keep soul and body together.

If the cheaper labor of the Old World sends its products to the United States free, and sells them in our markets in competition with like products of our better paid labor, this would not elevate their labor, but would pull down all labor. If the Old World wants free trade with us, let it place its labor on an equality with our labor, and until this is done, let us protect our own, and in the fullness of time all mankind will be benefited by the remainder of the world being elevated to our level.

Now, Mr. Chairman, upon this wool amendment. We grow one-half of the wool we consume. This is grown on large ranches in the West, in part; but in the thickly settled States the small farmers have, as a rule, a few sheep—in the aggregate a great many; and I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. HUNTER, and to the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. LANE; to the gentleman from Illinois, Gen. BLACK, and all of these other people, who are trying to muddy the water like a cuttlefish and swim away, that they may excuse their vote for this bill, but that the multitude of small farmers of Illinois, who have seen their flocks shrink in price three-fourths and their wool product substantially one-half in the last twelve months, when 1894 and 1896 come, will show them by their votes that their economic policies have been "weighed in the balance and found wanting." [Applause on the Republican side.]

Think of it! Forty per cent of protection for the manufacturers of wool and nothing for the men who produce one-half of the wool that goes in those products. And then the Democrats are crying about wheat! Too much wheat produced! And to remedy that they turn around and wipe out the wool industry. And so it is all along the line. Would to God men had eyes clear enough and brains strong enough and a vision broad enough to look at the situation of this country according to the extent and territory of the United States. Canada on the north, Mexico, Central America, and South America upon the south, with the 250,000,000 of our people that are to come in the next century in our present territory. We must promote here all production that is practical, and the cheapest and best market is first to supply our own wants.

In the coming century our hive will swarm; our children will find homes to the northward and to the southward. Wisdom dictates that we develop and commercially dominate this continent rather than enter into competition with the overpopulated countries of Europe and Asia. This is the period for broad statesmanship; this is the time to construct the Nicaragua Canal and to secure a naval station in the Pacific Ocean by dominating the Sandwich Islands. But in place of all this, you Democrats are in power; you borrow 850,000,000 to-day to carry on the Government and at the same time press this bill, that will reduce the revenues $75,000,000 more, and your WILSONS, COCKRANS, and BLACKS call this statesmanship. You disturb the air proclaiming your little shortsighted policy. We denounce your policy as inefficient; and inefficency clothed with power is criminal. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. OUTHWAITE was recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I rise for the purpose of making some remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] is recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I only rose, Mr. Chairman, because the Chair had informed me that I would be recognized in a certain order, and the time had come.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is certainly mistaken in saying that the Chair had promised to recognize him at any particular moment. The Chair said he would recognize the gentleman as soon as possible, but the gentleman must remember that the Chair can not control the matter absolutely. The committee has already given the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] twenty-three minutes, and the Chair feels bound to recognize a gentleman on the other side.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I have no desire to come in conflict with the Chair. I simply repeat what the page told me.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has reiterated one of the statements which I regard as false, but which is continually made on the other side of the House, as to the purpose and effect of this bill, namely, that it is intended to reduce the wages of the laboring people of this country. The leader of that side of the House, the gentleman from Maine, ignores entirely the law of supply and demand in relation to this question, and I wish to quote as against him a statement which I find in a speech made by the Senator from Maine, Mr. FRYE, in the city of Detroit, during the campaign of 1888. He said:

> Where there are two men seeking one job wages will be low. Where there are two jobs seeking one man wages will be high.

He then proceeded to illustrate the tariff and the effects of it upon wages in Europe. He cited the fact that upon the continent of Europe, in the woolen factories, there were women working at 20 cents a day and boarding themselves.

A few moments later he cited the other fact that there were 90,000 women working in the factories in Manchester, England, at from 35 to 40 cents a day. The Senator knew that the part of his audience that was most interested in the discussion of this proposition would take the latter statement as a reflection upon free-trade England, and he knew that that audience would not stop to compare the two sets of figures that he had given, that they would not observe that in the protected countries on the continent, according to his own statement, the wages of operatives were but 20 cents a day, while in free-trade England the wages paid for the same labor were twice as much.

He forgot, too, that the application of the rule he had just laid down as to the influence of supply and demand upon wages would show the fallacy of his argument. There are 361 people to the square mile in England, while there are but 20 to the square mile in this country. I do not intend to say that density of population alone determines the wages of labor, but it bears considerably upon it. The Senator also forgot to mention the fact that wages in free-trade England had increased from the very day that the free-trade policy was adopted until this hour. There is as much difference between the wages in one part of this country and the wages in other parts as there is between American wages and English wages in some of the trades.

Mr. HARTER. I would like to ask the gentleman whether it is not the fact also that the prices of agricultural products advanced in England after the repeal of the corn laws?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. That is the fact: but it is not pertinent to the proposition I was discussing. Wages in the protected employments in this country are not any better than wages in the unprotected employments. The wages of those people who can not be affected directly by your protective tariff are better in this country than those paid in Europe to a greater extent than are the wages of our people engaged in protected industries.

What do I mean by unprotected labor? I might say the farmer constitutes the largest portion, because protective laws do not favorably affect the price of his products. The markets of the world, under the rule of supply and demand, fix their prices. But there are millions of others in this country the product of whose labor, or whose labor itself, can not be protected or increased by tariff laws—the teacher, the lawyer, the doctor, the minister, the railway employés, both street and across country, all men engaged in building trades, all workers as clerks, bookkeepers, and salesmen in stores, and the great class known as day laborers. Yet the wages of all these are greater here than anywhere else in the world.

Taxing their necessaries and comforts of life or the materials they use can not increase the pay they receive for their labor. They all belong to the Wool Consumers' Association. The differences between the wages paid workers in all the ways I have just mentioned in this country and that paid the same class of workers in Europe is as favorable, if not greater, than the difference between the wages paid in the woolen industries and other protected industries here and in Europe. The wages of workers in the woolen industry in England are better—nearly double—those paid the workers in the same industry in the countries of Europe which have high protective tariffs. These facts you do not controvert. Explain them without weakening your plea for a protective tariff if you can.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Now, will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I will, in a moment. The wages in the Argentine Republic are better than the wages in any of the protected countries of the world, in some employments.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I would like to have ten minutes additional in which to discuss the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. O'NEIL). The gentleman from Ohio asks ten minutes' extension of time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Now, as to another proposition of the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me a question before he leaves the matter of wages of labor?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Yes, I will yield for a question.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to this fact as to the prices of labor in Great Britain and Germany that the disparity in price was because of the factory system in England——

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I did not yield for an argument.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Then I will ask a question. Does not the gentleman know that from 1880 to 1890 wages increased in Germany much more rapidly than they did in England——

Mr. OUTHWAITE. That may be so; yet in many instances they are still not half as great as in England in some classes of employment.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. And the reason is that Germany is just emerging from the hand-made system to the factory system.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who has just taken his seat, stated that it is the apprehension of the action of the Democratic party with regard to wool that has caused this business depression and this depression in other industries with the consequent loss of wages in this country. He forgets that ever since 1885 the Democratic party of this country has been pledged that as soon as it could obtain the power it would place wool upon the free list. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

He forgets that the message of the Democratic President of the United States in 1888 declared positively in favor of free wool, and that the Democratic party has from that day to this fought upon that platform. He certainly will not plead that the people of this country were ignorant of what they were voting for when they voted for the Democratic platform in favor of a tariff for revenue only and voted for the man who had assumed the leadership of the party with his pronounced record in favor of free wool as a constituent part of its platform.

I will give the gentleman some facts and statistics as to the cause of the depression of the grain and cotton market in this country. I take the annual report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics upon foreign commerce, and on page 17 I find this statement under the head, "Domestic exports by countries."

The mere statement that the value of domestic exports to Europe fell off $189,106,919 by itself almost tells the story, for it points immediately to diminished exports of breadstuffs, provisions, and cotton. In 1892 the United Kingdom took $68,704,503 in wheat; in 1893, $57,853,514, a difference of nearly $11,000,000. In 1892 it took $20,293,642 in corn; in 1893, $9,048,469, a difference of more than $10,000,000. In 1892, Germany took $7,842,902 in wheat and $7,481,125 in corn. In 1893 it took $2,569,261 in wheat and $2,794,689 in corn. The experience of these two countries could be extended so as to cover nearly all the countries of Europe depending upon foreign supply of grain, and applies with equal force to breadstuffs, to provisions, and to cotton.

Mr. SHAW. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I yield for a question only.

Mr. SHAW. Will you turn to page 12 of that same report and look at the list of agricultural products and their prices? You will find, as any gentleman will, who may read it——

Mr. OUTHWAITE. This is not a question; and I do not yield.

Mr. SHAW. That the price of every agricultural product has been advanced.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The gentleman does not put a question; and his suggestion is not pertinent to my argument, and his statement is incorrect.

Mr. Chairman, a few remarks with regard to the paragraph immediately under consideration, or the amendment offered thereto. Remonstrances have been sent up and read in the presence of this House, which simply show to what length protection will run in its madness, or what people will ask protection against.

In one of these petitions it is stated that the destruction of the sheep going on in some parts of the country is the result of the impending bill. Was the destruction of the sheep in 1868 in Ohio, when sheep were driven to the shambles by the hundreds of thousands, the result of the tariff of 1867? The destruction of sheep that is going on in some portions of the country to-day is no more to be attributed to the pendency of this bill than was that destruction in Ohio in 1868 attributable to the increase in the tariff in 1867.

Another of the reasons why they ask for protection is because of local taxes upon sheep. Another is because there is a head tax in Nevada of 5 cents per head on sheep; therefore the Government must tax the individual consumers of wool to put that money back into the pockets of the sheep-owners. Another is that in some tropical countries—I believe Australia was alluded to—the government fences the land, and therefore the Government must tax the people of this country in order to fence their land.

In another case it was the difference in altitude; that they were raising their sheep at a higher altitude, away up in the air, while the ranchmen were raising sheep wool in Australia and probably in the Argentine Republic at a lower altitude, therefore the Government must tax all wool-wearers in order to protect them on account of this difference in altitude. There is also a difference of moisture in the air, and there are differences of other climatic influences, all of which must be protected against by a tax on the consumers of wool. It is also said in one petition that the waters of their territory were alkali; that you must therefore tax the people in order to furnish them with fresh water with which to wash their wool.

Another was the difference in the cost of transportation. That is a new argument, or is presented as such on the part of the protectionist, that having legislated to protect labor and having legislated to protect capital we must now begin to protect one part of the country against the transportation facilities of the other part. The complainants from Nevada complain that they can not compete in the raising of sheep with Ohio and New England, and complain that Australia sends her wool to our market by water, and therefore that the people of the country at large are to be taxed in order to pay for the transportation of their wool so that they can compete with the wool grown in Ohio and in New England, as well as that brought from Australia.

My colleague asks why not levy a tax upon wool as a revenue tariff? Because it is not and can not be a good subject of revenue tax; because it does not yield as a revenue tariff as much as many other articles that can be selected.

If the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois is correct, that about one-half the wool that we use in this country is raised here, what would be the effect of the imposition of the tax if the fact be as the gentleman claims, to increase the price of a pound of wool to the wool-grower? Would it not increase the price of the pound of wool to the wool-user as well? This tax on wool would result in raising revenue in such a manner as that for every dollar of tax that would go into the Treasury of the United States to pay the expenses of the Government, one dollar would go into the pockets of the wool-raiser; and that is the serious objection to it.

Another objection, Mr. Chairman, is that it is made the pretext to increase the tax on the finished goods, or the products of woolen manufactories. In the McKinley bill is a direct recognition of that fact—worse than a recognition of it—an attempt not only to protect the manufacturer but also to assist him to levy tribute on the people of this country. In some instances the tax is described as so many times the tax upon a pound of new or unwashed wool and then so much ad valorem. The little tax upon wool is made a pretext for a big tax on woolens. Most farmers would be compelled to pay far more to the woolen manufacturer in the protective tribute he would lay on them than they would get back through the tariff on their wool.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE was recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. O'NEIL in the chair). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I wish to know what the rule of the House is, when a member rises in good faith in his seat before any other member and addresses the Chair in a respectful manner for the purpose of discussing a subject before the committee, as to the matter of recognition by the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. But I made the parliamentary inquiry in good faith, and hope the Chair will answer it. I wish to know what the rule of the House is, when a member in good faith rises in his place before any other member, addresses himself respectfully to the Chair—"Mr. Chairman"—and asks recognition in that manner for debate on a matter pertinent and pending? What is the rule of the House about recognition?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the question of recognition was settled on yesterday. The Chair is also of opinion that the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Pennsylvania rose about the same time, and the Chair recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I submit to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I rose before he did, and I think twenty members of the House must have observed it.

But a further parliamentary inquiry: In what way can a member who desires to address the House on a pertinent subject before it address the present occupant of the Chair so as to secure recognition?

Mr. ENLOE. By respectfully addressing the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to be fair. He does not consider the gentleman's last remark a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I am not attempting to reflect upon the fairness of the Chair. I desire to get the floor, and I am proceeding upon the theory that there is an equality among the members here upon this floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] is recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I hope the Chair will direct his attention this way. I propose to try to get the attention of the House when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] shall have concluded.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE].

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, the question of tariff for revenue, or for revenue and protection, must be considered as applicable to this country only. Its experience in any other country will form no guide for its application in this. Our country is so large, our industries so numerous, our climate so varied, our soil so different in different localities, producing in one State what it will not yield in another, that the question should only be considered by its history and experience in this country. If this country consisted only of the State of Pennsylvania the policy of England as to tariff might possibly be considered with advantage. We would then have to import many articles of necessity which we now obtain from our sister States; but having nearly fifty States and Territories averaging in extent nearly or quite as much surface as Pennsylvania, and having free commerce between them, our policy should be so to legislate upon this question as to encourage the production of the principal products of each State by confining the consumption to our own home productions. In this way the products of Pennsylvania find a market in other States, and the cotton of the South and grains and meats of the West find a market in Pennsylvania.

It can not successfully be denied that this country has prospered under high protective tariffs. It can not successfully be denied that the country has suffered great business depression under low tariffs.

A reduction of tariffs necessarily means a reduction of wages, and this bill should be entitled "A bill to reduce the price of labor." It would be a reflection upon the intelligence of its framers to suppose that they expect or intend that the prices for labor prevailing during the past few years can be maintained under it. They do not make any such claim. It would be ridiculous to do so. The report of the committee says:

> Such a reform of the tariff must quicken every industry, must open a larger field for the employment of labor, must secure to it more working days at steadier wages.

Its framers expect more work at steadier wages; they do not say at higher wages.

Reduce the wages of our workmen to the price paid for labor in foreign countries and this country can undersell any country in the world; we have many natural advantages over the foreign producer. But the Republican party does not want to reduce wages in this country to the price paid in foreign countries.

The Democratic party by this bill declare their intention and desire to reduce the price of American labor. They admit that reduction of tariffs and putting articles on the free list will decrease the production of those articles in this country unless the cost of the labor in their production is reduced.

They say in their report:

> Logs are already on the free list; we have gone a step farther and put undressed lumber generally on this list. This may serve to cheapen and improve the dwelling houses of some of our people, but it is justified if it shall accomplish nothing more than to delay the rapid destruction of American forests.

Here, then, it is squarely admitted that the putting of undressed lumber on the free list will accomplish just what the Republican party claim that it will accomplish, viz, stay the manufacture of our own logs into lumber and supply our demand by foreign lumber. The American forests can not be preserved without ceasing to cut American trees, and putting lumber on the free list is to stay the cutting of American trees. It will do it. Put lumber on the free list and the American forests will be preserved. You allege it. We admit it. There is no dispute between us as to the effect of this bill on the American forests. There is no disguise about it. You openly say that your purpose in putting lumber on the free list is to preserve the American forests. You claim that it will do it. No one disputes you. You say nothing about the thousands of American choppers and sawyers that will be turned out of employment, nor how they are to be preserved. But the preservation of the American forests is far dearer to you than the preservation of the American workingman. Your object is accomplished. The trees will stand and the workmen will fall.

But if putting lumber on the free list will preserve the American forests, why of course putting coal on the free list will preserve American coal. There can be no escape from the argument. If, as you say, lumber on the free list will preserve the trees in the forests, why of course you admit that coal on the ree list will preserve the coal in the mountains. These great coal deposits will be preserved: so with our ore, and so with the many other articles which you put on the free list. The Republican party wants to develop the coal and the ore, but you do not. You want to keep it in the hills, to preserve it.

You are opposed to the development of the natural resources of the country. Keep the trees standing in the forests, keep the coal in the mines, keep the ore in the banks. That is your position, and you can not gainsay it.

You are behind the spirit of the age. You are not capable as a party of administering the affairs of this Government. Under your management the country will speedily relapse into a condition of innocuous desuetude.

I know that you spin beautiful theories, clothed in eloquent language, and it is a misfortune to the country that so much eloquence and logic is found in your ranks; but all of your eloquence and logic is dumb beside a starving man and an idle mill.

Of what use is it to argue to a man whom you have deprived of labor, and whose children are crying for bread? Anyone, it seems, would see the distress which you are bringing on the country. Any political party ought to see it, but you are joined to your idol of revenue reform—you are deaf to the cries of the people, you ignore their distress and their sorrow.

You say that you must use the surgeon's knife and amputate to save the patient's life; and yet the limbs which you are to cut away were healthy, in the full exercise of their functions, until you produced your surgical implements. I know that the schoolmaster is abroad in the land, and unfortunately for the country, he is in this House; but that his propositions are wrong, that his theories are wrong, and that his logic is false is demonstrated every day by the country.

You think that you have been sent here by the people to pass this bill; but the people who sent you here have changed their minds upon this matter and now call you to stop.

Abraham was sent to the mountain by God, to offer his son Isaac as a sacrifice, but Abraham listened to the voice of God and stayed his hand. Why will you not listen to the voice of the people and stay your hand? Your own party calls you to stop, and you, of all the Democrats in the Democratic party today, persist in going on. The people who sent you here have made a mistake, and they told you so last November most emphatically.

Are you so blind as to think that the people do not now and then make mistakes as well as their representatives?

The people made a mistake in making it possible for Congress to pass this bill, and they now see it. Let us grant your position, for the sake of the argument, that you have a power of attorney from the people to pass this bill: but do not you know that a power of attorney can be revoked? The people revoked your power of attorney last November, and they will revoke you next November if you pass this bill.

We are representatives of the people; we are here to represent their wishes, not our own theories obtained by reading Henry George and other writers, but the views of those who sent us here, coined from their own practical experiences; and I deny that you Democrats from the North, East, and West represent the people who voted for you when you vote for this bill.

I will not go into a discussion of the relative merits of this bill and the McKinley bill. I point to the condition of the country—that is my answer to all the eloquence and argument which have come from the supporters of this bill since the debate began.

I was impressed with the argument of my eloquent friend from Illinois, Gen. BLACK. He presented a new phase of this question. His theory is that this bill will restrict immigration; and he is entirely right. Of the many bills introduced in Congress during the past several years to restrict immigration not one of them has proposed to do it in the way he suggests, and he is entitled to the credit of having solved the problem that has so long troubled the gentleman from Alabama and others. His idea is that the half-million who annually come here do so to get the high wages paid under protective duties, and as this bill which reduces the protective duties would also reduce the wages, these foreigners would no longer have an inducement to come, and would stop. The American people are suffering from unrestricted immigration, it is true; but they do not wish to restrict it in that way. They do not want to take away the desire of foreigners to live here by making it undesirable to live here themselves. A famine here could restrict immigration on the same principles.

The cholera scare in 1892 restricted immigration. There is no doubt but that the good wages paid here has encouraged immigration, and there is no doubt but that immigration will decrease if you reduce the wages. My friend from Illinois is entirely correct in his reasoning, and no doubt if he wants to restrict immigration the passage of this bill will do it.

His reasons for his support of this bill are the most logical that I have yet heard advanced. He can go back to Illinois—to the workingmen of Chicago—and say, "I know that you are oppressed by foreigners who come over here to share your wages; well, we have stopped that; we have passed a bill to lower your wages to the same figures now paid these foreigners in their own countries, and they will no longer have any inducement to come over here to work"—and these Chicago workmen are expected to throw up their hats and hurrah for the Wilson bill and tariff reform.

They should be grateful. The Democratic party has restricted immigration. Great is the Democratic party, a friend of the people, especially the working people.

My friend from Illinois says if he was pursued by bees he would throw down the honey. In his illustration, so happily used, the honey is the high wages paid our workingmen under the McKinley bill, and the bees are the foreigners whose immigration he wishes to restrict. If my friend from Illinois with his hands full of honey pursued by bees should throw it down, the bees would get it; they would get it all, and then we would have no honey. How true his illustration is, and how aptly it fits this bill. Under it our workmen will throw down their wages and the foreigners will get them. He will not be pursued any longer by foreigners, for the wages of the foreigners in their own country, under the stimulus of making our wares for us, will be better than the wages of our workmen.

Our workmen have lost their wages, lost their honey, it is true; but then they are no longer pursued by foreigners, the bees, and that is consolation.

Advocated by such high Democratic authority—it may be Democratic, but it is not American.

The American idea, the Republican idea, is to hive the bees in their own country by laws restricting immigration that will restrict, and protect our working men and women in the enjoyment of their wages, their own honey.

God pity the American workingman if he trusts his political future to a party advocating such a measure! [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I only wanted to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that I am still in existence, and that I hold the promise of the Chair, which is as good as his honor, to have recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is not in order. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I hope I am not to be subjected to the same treatment as the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I shall endeavor to get recognition some time this afternoon.

Mr. FITHIAN. Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand the copy of a resolution which I have received in the mail this morning, of the action of the Brooklyn Democratic Club, in which they have resolved that the inaction and delay of the Democratic majority in Congress in redeeming the pledges made by the Democratic party to reform and reduce the tariff is causing serious injury to the business of the country, and as a consequence is creating a feeling of deep resentment and indignation among the people, which threatens disaster to the party. I want here to resent the imputation that is cast upon the Democratic majority of this Congress, that it has been guilty of inaction and delay in redeeming the pledges made by the Democratic party to reform and reduce the tariff. The first day fixed by the law at which this Congress could have assembled after its election was the first Monday in December, 1893.

The only way that Congress could have been assembled sooner to deal with this question was by the proclamation by the President of the United States convening Congress in extraordinary session. This Congress was called in extraordinary session in the month of August of last year to deal—with what? Not to deal with the tariff question, but to carry into force the views of the present Executive of the United States upon the financial question; and this Congress was held here after the bill proposed by the Administration had passed the House to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman silver law from day to day awaiting the action of the United States Senate upon that bill. The close friends of the Administration even joined their forces with the Republican minority of this House to prevent taking up the bill to repeal the Federal election laws until driven from their position by a caucus of the Democratic members of this House and the indignation of the Democratic masses.

Then, if the blame rests with anybody, it is not with the Democratic majority of this Congress, but is with the President of the United States, who, as the recognized leader of the party, is under equal or greater obligations to redeem the pledges of the party in carrying into effect tariff reform than the Democratic majority of this Congress. But instead of tariff legislation being taken up at this extra session Congress was forced to take up the financial measure of the Administration, to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman law, and the people were told that the moment that repeal went into effect great prosperity would come at once to the people of the United States, and the boom would be such that the complaint and dissatisfaction that was resting in the minds of the people would at once be dispelled.

That repeal act has been in effect for more than two months, yet the prosperity we were told was so soon to come has not come. The trouble and dissatisfaction of the people is still heard all over the land, and now for a so-called pretended Democratic organization to insult the Democratic majority of this House by passing a resolution of this kind ought to excite the resentment of every Democratic member here who has been ready and willing at all times to carry into effect the pledges of the Democratic platform in favor of tariff legislation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FITHIAN. I ask five minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

There was no objection.

Mr. FITHIAN. Now, sir, after the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman law, what other demand is made of this Congress before tariff legislation shall be put into effect and before the pledges of the party shall be redeemed upon the great issue on which we were successful in the campaign of 1892? They got the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman law, and now, to bring about the prosperity which they predicted would follow that repeal, but which has not followed it, they propose in a time of profound peace to issue interest-bearing gold bonds, to buy more gold to put into the Treasury of the United States. It is bonds that Wall street wants; and it seems to me that the Administration is more disposed to please Wall street than it is to bring about speedy tariff reform. Wall street does not want tariff legislation. They want bonds. More bonds! is the demand of these gentlemen. And the men who are demanding bonds are the men who are behind this so-called Democratic organization, the Brooklyn Democratic Club. [Applause.]

I see by the morning papers that the Secretary of the Treasury proposes to issue bonds, and has already invited proposals for the purchase of the bonds that he intends to issue, under a law which gives him no more authority to issue United States bonds than I have, except for the purposes set forth in the resumption act. Why, sir, if the Government of the United States is in need of money to meet its current expenses, the Secretory of the Treasury has no right to issue a single dollar of United States bonds to raise money for that purpose—not a dollar. [Applause.]

Mr. REED. Let us impeach him. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITHIAN. If the United States Treasury is in need of money to pay its current expenses, and the Administration will ask the Democratic majority of this Congress for authority to coin the seigniorage now in the vaults of the Treasury, over $50,000,000 can be made available for the purpose of meeting the current expenses of the Government.

Mr. BLAND. Let me say to the gentleman that we intend to pass that bill whether we are asked to do it or not.

Mr. FITHIAN. I hope so. But, Mr. Chairman, it may be said that the capacity of the United States mints will not permit us to coin the seigniorage fast enough to meet the wants of the Treasury.

Mr. SNODGRASS. What did they stop it for, then?

Mr. FITHIAN. Yes, what did they stop it for? But, Mr. Chairman, we can issue Treasury certificates against that seigniorage, and those certificates can be made available immediately, as fast as they are printed at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and this Government will thus be put promptly in possession of enough money to tide over any deficiency which exists at the present time.

Mr. SNODGRASS. But that would not increase the interest-bearing debt.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of my colleague be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois that the time of his colleague be extended five minutes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the gentleman is scoring a Democratic Administration, I will make no objection.

Mr. FITHIAN. Oh, the gentleman need not trouble himself about the present Administration. I want to call his attention to the fact that it was the legislation of his party that has brought about the present condition of the Treasury. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When Mr. Cleveland left the Presidency and turned the Government over to President Harrison there was in the Treasury a surplus of more than $100,000,000. During the four years of Republican administration you squandered that surplus and left the Government with a deficit for the Democratic party to take charge of.

Mr. HAGER. They ought to know how to handle a deficit, as they have never had anything else as the result of their administration of affairs. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITHIAN. So, Mr. Chairman, all the blame of the present condition of affairs can not be laid upon this Democratic Administration. I am calling the attention to the shortcomings of this Administration since it came into power, but I also condemn the Administration of the Republican party which has brought about our present condition as much as I do the shortcomings of this Administration.

But, Mr. Chairman, the great cry is, "Bonds! More bonds! We must have more bonds!" to satisfy the appetite of the grasping Shylocks of Wall street.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. FITHIAN. It is not so much the purpose——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITHIAN. No, I do not. I have only a few minutes. The gentleman can follow me in his own time. This demand for bonds is not so much for the purpose of obtaining revenue to pay the current expenses of the Government, because that revenue can be obtained without the issuance of bonds, but it is to satisfy the greed of the Shylocks of Wall street who want these bonds.

Mr. BOEN. And the commissions for those who have the sale of the bonds.

Mr. FITHIAN. But, Mr. Chairman, is the United States a bankrupt institution? Is the United States so poor that its obligations will go begging in the money markets of the United States and of the world? If we need more money to meet the current expenses of the Government, is there a gold bug here so foolhardy and so steeped in his greed for United States bonds as to say that if the Government should issue $100,000,000 in United States Treasury notes that they would not be worth dollar for dollar? [Applause on Democratic side.] That they would not be received for every demand against the Government? Would you not take them in payment of your salaries?

Mr. BOEN. Certainly.

Mr. FITHIAN. Could you not pay your debts with them?

Mr. BOEN. Certainly.

Mr. FITHIAN. Would you not take them from any gentleman who owed you a debt?

Mr. BOEN. Yes.

Mr. PICKLER. We always have.

Mr. FITHIAN. And do you doubt the power of the United States to levy an income tax, to levy internal-revenue taxes, to levy customs duties, enough to redeem every obligation that might be made by the United States by issuing noninterest-bearing Treasury notes in sufficient quantities to tide us over for the present? [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as I have not occupied the attention of the House before during this session, and inasmuch as I have had some difficulty in getting the floor on this occasion, and because of the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FITHIAN] has challenged us to a discussion of the question as to who is responsible for the necessity of issuing bonds by the United States at this time, I ask unanimous consent of the House that I may have twenty minutes in which to enter into a discussion of this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] asks unanimous consent to address the committee for twenty minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the McKinley law was enacted in 1890, if I remember aright, and it was about that time that the Sherman law was also enacted. Therefore, the country had been under this Republican legislation for a little over two years when the present Democratic Administration came into power. If there was anything deleterious in that legislation ample time has elapsed in which to demonstrate it to the American people, but the fact is that during all this period of two years the country was in an exceedingly prosperous condition. Capital was buoyant and hopeful and was profitably employed. Our manufactures were all running. Our machinery was in full blast. There was not a single man in this land—North, South, East, or West—who desired to work, who did not have the opportunity presented to him to do so at remunerative wages.

Never, sir, was there a period in the history of the American people when they were more prosperous, or making more rapid strides upon the highway of material development than from the time of the enactment of those two measures, the McKinley bill and the Sherman act, up to the time the Democratic party came into power. The receipts of the Government were sufficient to meet its expenditures and the gold reserve was at its maximum. It is, therefore, I submit, a little late now for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FITHIAN] to come into this House and undertake to arraign the Republican party for the condition in which the public Treasury is found at this time.

Mr. Chairman, the prosperity that existed in this land up to the time that the Democracy assumed the reins of government is, I repeat, a refutation of that statement stronger than anything I can put into the form of language myself. If there was extravagant Republican legislation which caused the existing condition of the Treasury, why did not the Democratic party in this House, during the Fifty-second Congress and before the last election, introduce some measure looking to the repeal of such legislation? The effort at least could have been made. But nothing of the kind was done. By their failure they substantially admitted the justice of all those Republican laws of which they complain. What particular piece of legislation was it that they thought was wrong and extravagant? Let some one name it. With their declaration that the Republican party had been prodigal in laws which squandered the public funds, the Democratic party never sought then by legislation to change the condition of affairs which existed; and they have not done so since Mr. Cleveland came into control of affairs. Why, Mr. Speaker, the very Democratic House which complained most of the extravagance of the so-called "billion-dollar Congress" imitated its example and piled up its appropriations to a much larger amount.

Mr. Chairman, the real cause of the present condition of the country is apparent. Even a schoolboy can comprehend it. The very moment it was understood that a party pledged to reverse the existing condition of affairs was to assume the reins of government, that very minute apprehension and distress took possession of the American people; capital became despondent; business was arrested; labor went unemployed; our factories ceased their operations; and in less than two months after the Democratic party had assumed the helm of the Government starvation was threatening many of the American people, and brave and honest men who were anxious and willing for the opportunity to work—men who had never known idleness before—stood upon the street corners of our cities and towns crying for daily bread, their necessities being relieved only by the charities of their countrymen. And now, in place of a revenue equal to the expenditures of the Government, as under Republican rule, in place of a surplus in the Treasury which the Democratic party once decried, but for which the Democratic Administration is now sighing, we find the receipts have fallen off, and that the Government, like its citizens, is in need for the very necessities of life.

Contrast the present condition of your Treasury with its condition when Benjamin Harrison went out of office. According to the estimate of your own official the revenues have so fallen off—and fallen off, as I insist, because of the advent of your party—that according to his first calculation there will be at the end of this fiscal year a deficit of $28,000,000, and according to his revised figures a deficiency of $78,000,000. Upon this admitted deficit you are seeking to establish a still greater deficit by the character of the legislation now pending before this committee.

Now, how do you propose to supply this deficiency? By simply letting the tariff bill alone and raising revenue as the Republican party did to the extent necessary to meet the just and proper expenditures of the Government? No; you are proposing to so levy tariff duties as to create a still greater deficit; and how are you going to supply this deficit? You are presenting to the country to day the miserable alternative either of voting to coin the seigniorage of silver now in the Treasury, every dollar of which is morally pledged to the redemption of the short-weight silver dollar now issued under the law, thus not only destroying this seigniorage as a reserve, but absolutely coining it into additional short-weight dollars, thereby increasing the indebtedness of the people—or you are presenting the other wretched alternative of doing in time of profound peace that which the exigencies of war alone required the Republican party to do—the issuing of bonds, payable principal and interest in gold, and increasing the weight of taxation to be borne by the people of this country irrespective of party.

What a beautiful spectacle the great Democratic party is presenting to the people of the country in this matter! To what unfortunate expedients it is resorting! You propose to do these things to meet the present urgent necessities of the Government. You propose to apply the gold for which you sell these bonds not only to maintain the reserve in the Treasury, but for the purpose of paying the current expenses of the Government; you are proposing by the sale of bonds to take gold into the Treasury with one hand, and then to pay the Treasury notes and greenbacks that will be presented the next minute with gold drawn from the Treasury with the other hand. Are you going on with this beautiful policy—putting gold into the Treasury by the issue of bonds, and then taking it out the next minute to redeem the greenbacks and the Treasury notes indefinitely? When and where do you propose to stop?

You realize that this thing can not supply the Treasury for any great length of time; that your permanent revenue must be sought in some other direction. You have repudiated one-half of the declarations of your Chicago platform; in the name of God why have not you the manhood and patriotism to repudiate the whole of it? Let the McKinley act alone; and in less than thirty days business will revive, the wheels of industry will again revolve in this country, unemployed labor will be employed, and the just revenues raised by this system of imposing duties will flow into the Treasury and save the necessity of resorting to these doubtful expedients about which you are now so divided. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Why, Mr. Chairman, we understand what is coming. In order that certain gentlemen may put into practice in this country their exploded theories, in order that gentlemen on this floor may revamp the principles of Bartial and Henry George, without giving them credit by way of quotation, you are proposing to strike down and destroy the protective policy. And behind all this, as a system of raising Government revenue for the purpose of paying Government expenses, you are throwing upon the horizon of the future your single tax on land values, which, as is well known in this House, has far more than one earnest supporter on the Democratic side of this Chamber.

Your President and your Secretary of the Treasury are recommending another method of raising revenue, in their anxiety to destroy the protective tariff. They are insisting on a tax to be levied entirely upon the income of corporators.

But there is another motley crew of you which propose to have this income tax individual in its character—a tax so graduated that it shall be assessed only on those whose incomes exceed $5,000 per year. Mr. Chairman, the Democratic party has steadily declaimed against war legislation; it is always crying out that we should strip from the statute books the last vestige of such enactments.

And yet the gentlemen who have been in the habit of denouncing these things are now insisting upon reviving what they once called the worst feature of war legislation, and which they said was justified only because it was necessary during the rebellion to raise revenue to preserve the Government. Now, in a time of profound peace, they are proposing to resurrect and place upon the statute book this alleged odious income tax, with all of its inquisitorial features and its premium to perjury and fraud.

Mr. Chairman, it has been declared time and again in this country, on the best of authority, and I assert that the logic of events has demonstrated it to be true, that the Democratic party has no constructive genius whatever. Its genius, if it has any at all, is purely destructive—destructive of that which is best and noblest in American civilization. [Applause on the Republican side.] It has not the capacity to formulate a sensible or patriotic policy. I believe a distinguished Democrat once characterized it as a party which could not flap its two wings together. It can not formulate a policy, and even if it could formulate anything, it has not the courage, tenacity, the patriotism and the common sense, to crystalize its ideas into the statute books, and to give the people laws under which the Government can be successfully administered. [Applause on the Republican side.] Your party is a party of indecision and of vacillation. It is composed of jarring elements; you are now fighting and quarreling among yourselves, both in secret and in public, and are airing your dirty linen, both in your committee rooms and on the floor of this Chamber, in the full presence of a thoroughly disgusted and indignant people.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I dismiss this subject simply with one suggestion. Time and again on this floor, during the progress of this debate I have heard gentlemen assert that the American people have on two occasions decided in favor of tariff reform and against the principles of a protective tariff. It seems to me that the gentlemen who make this declaration ignore that which is nearest to them and remember only that which is in the shadowy past.

Surely it ought to dawn upon the somewhat benighted understanding of these gentlemen who are constantly iterating and reiterating this thing in this Chamber, that last fall the people came to the polls in this country and with a full opportunity to pass upon the very subject of tariff reform, with the gauntlet thrown down by the Republican party and taken up on the part of the Democratic party, in all sections where there was an opportunity for an untrammeled ballot the American voters reversed their verdict of two years before, and declared absolutely and unequivocally in favor of the system of a protective tariff and against the free-trade theories now so pertinaciously advocated upon this floor. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I want to advert to a subject which was the original reason of my asking recognition upon this floor. My distinguished friend and colleague, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROOKSHIRE], I observed, arose this morning and sent to the Clerk's desk a petition in favor of the passage of the Wilson bill, signed by certain of his constituents. He asked that that petition might be publicly read from the desk in the hearing of the House, and his wish was complied with. I do not rise for the purpose of censuring my friend for that act. Indeed I think it is a matter to be commended. The right of petition is a very old and a much revered one in this country. I remember that one of the most distinguished Presidents of the United States, who, having retired to private life, was subsequently elected to this House, vindicated this right on this floor in language very emphatic in its character. It should be promoted, for it is one of the very best avenues whereby the people may make known their wishes to their servants, concerning matters in which the people are profoundly interested.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is very apparent to my mind, and I think will be to the House and to the gentleman himself, that the value of this right on the part of the people depends upon the impartiality with which it is recognized by their representatives. Now it so happens that sometime ago my distinguished friend got a petition from certain of the manufacturers and laboring men in his district, citizens of the county of Clay, in the State of Indiana, protesting against the passage of the Wilson bill. That petition was numerously signed not only by the manufacturers, but by their laborers and by men of all shades of political opinion. The gentleman failed to present that petition to this House in any manner, shape, or form, and after the lapse of a considerable length of time——

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. May I ask my friend a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. I hope the gentleman does not wish to be unfair.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Certainly not.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. On page 594 of the RECORD the gentleman will find that that petition was referred according to the rules of this House——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Unquestionably. I will reach that point; but the fact nevertheless remains that after quite a long while, with ample opportunity to present that petition to this House, the gentleman failed and neglected to do it. Now, it turns out——

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. Some of these petitions were sent to me, not directed to the Congress of the United States nor to the House of Representatives, but directed to me personally, and I think the petition to which the gentleman refers was directed to me personally. When I received information that the petitioners desired that that petition be referred to the committee I had it done.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The gentleman anticipates me. If he will wait until I am through, he will see that I am doing him no injustice. That was not my purpose in rising. It seems that some of the signers of that petition, ascertaining that the gentleman had failed to present it to the House—having intended, whatever might have been its technical wording, that it should be so presented—having sent it for that purpose, wrote me a letter asking that I should see the gentleman, ask why he had not presented the petition, and request him to do so. In compliance with the wish of these petitioners, I saw the gentleman and called his attention to the matter, and he stated to me that he did not remember whether he had presented the petition or not, that it might be possible that it was addressed to him personally, and if so it ought not to be presented to the House, but that he would ascertain and let me know.

After rummaging among his papers, the gentleman eventually unearthed the petition and brought it to me, and indorsed a reference of it to the appropriate committee upon its back. Then he presented it, not in the open House, but had it deposited in the petition box, according to the usual rule, where, as everybody knows, it died, and no member of the House ever had any knowledge of its existence except the gentleman from Indiana and myself.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a member upon this side of the House can very seldom get unanimous consent to publish a petition in the RECORD. I have tried and failed; but a gentleman upon the other side of the House could very readily have obtained unanimous consent over on his side and no objection would have been urged on this, and that petition could very well have been presented and read in the open House, just as the petition was read that the gentleman presented this morning. The mere fact that it was addressed to him personally is no excuse for his not having it read publicly to the House from the Clerk's desk, for the reason that the very petition which he procured to be read this morning was also addressed to him personally and not to this House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I did not rise, as I said, for the purpose of making any stricture upon the gentleman, but for a twofold purpose. First, to show that the gentleman's own constituents had been petitioning him against the passage of the Wilson bill as well as for it. Secondly, for the purpose of showing that there is something defective about the rules of this House which enables one petition to be kept in the background and another to be presented. The very purpose of the presentation of petitions to this body is to give to the members of this House the sentiment of the people upon the particular subject petitioned for, and the rules, in my humble opinion, ought to be so changed that all petitions can be presented alike; if not, the very purpose and object of petition is destroyed. If no such rule can be passed, then I submit to every member of this House whether it is not a matter of the utmost and the nicest delicacy and importance—a sacred obligation, binding upon every member, to see to it that perfect equality is secured in the presentation of every petition which is forwarded to him by his constituents with a view of having it laid before this House.

Mr. ENLOE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. ENLOE. I would like the gentleman from Indiana to state to this House if he believes that it would be possible if all the time that we give to the sessions of the House was devoted to the reading of petitions that all the petitions that are sent to this House could be read.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that nine-tenths of the petitions presented to this House are very brief in character and could be read to the House; but that is not the point I am making. If one petition is read then another petition should be read. [Applause on the Republican side.] If a gentleman gets a petition from his constituents protesting against the passage of the Wilson bill, he should present it whether the sentiment agrees with his own or not, provided it is couched in respectful language, especially where he has presented petitions from others of his constituents containing prayers of an opposite character. And each petition should be presented in an equally open and public manner.

Mr. ENLOE. Will the gentleman answer another question right there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. ENLOE. I understand your position to be somewhat critical of your colleague for the action he has taken?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I am simply stating the facts. If anything like criticism results from a statement of the facts I can not help it. If any of the gentleman's constituents send a petition such as this to the House, it is due to this body that it should know what is the sentiment entertained by those people.

Mr. ENLOE. I would ask the gentleman what he thinks of the conduct of his colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], who absolutely declined to present a petition sent by his constituents, on the ground that they did not know what they were talking about?

Mr. WALKER rose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I want to say for the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] that he demonstrated yesterday so signally, in his debate with the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], his capacity to take care of himself that I have no doubt if he has an opportunity to do so he will answer that question satisfactorily to the gentleman from Tennessee. [Applause on the Republican side.]

So far as I am individually concerned I stand ready at all times to present to the House any petition which is presented to me, and which is couched in respectful language, whether addressed to me personally or to this body, whether I agree with its sentiments or not.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. I had the petition read in my own time this morning, and stated before the petition was read that the petition stated that a protective tariff, in the judgment of the petitioners, was a fraud and a robbery; and I indorsed that and had it read as a part of my remarks.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I know that. The point I am making is that certain constituents of the gentleman, who did not believe that protection was a fraud and a robbery, asked him to make their sentiments known to this House, and that he failed to do so, and to give to this House a knowledge of their position on this subject as he did to the others whose petition he procured to be read publicly here to-day. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PENCE. Mr. Chairman, I do not care at this time to break into this discussion as to its merits, but the utterances of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] make me feel that perhaps I have been entirely mistaken in all the proceedings that I have taken in respect to petitions since I have been a member of this House. While the gentleman stated time and time again that he had no desire to be unfair with his colleague from Indiana [Mr. BROOKSHIRE], he has been nothing but unfair, with respect to the course that his colleague has taken as a Representative here. [Applause on the Democratic side.] On the merits of this bill the views of the gentleman from Indiana command my sympathies to some extent——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Was it necessary for the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROOKSHIRE] to travel around by way of Colorado in order to say that?

Mr. PENCE. Mr. Chairman, I can not quite keep up with the rapidity of the words which fall from the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The gentleman would better try to keep track of my ideas.

Mr. PENCE. Well I do not know that I gather the ideas either, if they keep gait with the words.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. That is the gentleman's fault.

Mr. PENCE. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I learned a long while ago that the smaller the windmill the faster it runs. [Laughter.] I want to be fair. I am not now protesting in behalf of the gentleman's colleague [Mr. BROOKSHIRE]. I am protesting in behalf of myself and of scores of other members here who have believed up to this time that we were honest and candid and in the line of our duty when we filed in the petition box the petitions that were forwarded to us by our constituents.

This morning, for the first time, the gentleman from Indiana makes known to me that I am a deceiver, a pretender, a concealer of the wishes of my people, because I do not present their petitions in open House every morning. [Laughter.] I have not risen at this time to take part in the discussion of the merits of this bill, but to protest against such a line of criticism as the gentleman has indulged in this morning, evidently for political effect, against a colleague from his own State, and I make the protest simply because I do not propose to have the idea go out to the innumerable citizens of Colorado who have sent me petitions, which I have presented through the box in the honest belief that such action was in conformity to the rules and the practice of the House, that I have thereby been a party to concealing the expression of their views.

The gentleman from Indiana, who has just taken his seat [Mr. JOHNSON], has directed his criticisms to a colleague from his own State. Mr. Chairman, I was raised in the State of Indiana and I know what that means. An Indiana Republican is always hunting a chance to fight an Indiana Democrat, and vice versa. [Laughter.] They can not help it. It is bred in the bone. It is their nature. It can not be prevented. But the gentleman's criticism involves not only his colleague, but scores of other members of this House, and I want to put it upon record that my colleagues from the West have presented, and I have presented, petitions through the petition box in the belief that that was the proper course to pursue, and that in so doing we were not trying to conceal the expression of the wishes of our people. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana and Mr. MAGUIRE rose.

Mr. MAGUIRE was recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I trust the gentleman from California will yield to me for a moment, inasmuch as the gentleman from Colorado has referred to me so freely in his remarks.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I can not yield, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Then surely the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. PENCE] will give me a hearing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired, and the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE] is recognized.

THE SACRED RIGHT OF PETITION.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with what I desire to say on the pending amendment, I am charged with the duty of vindicating the right of petition here on behalf of certain of the constituents of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER]. Some of his constituents sent to him, to be presented to this House, their petition, in the form of a preamble and resolutions, recommending and requesting the immediate passage of the Wilson bill. The gentleman from Massachusetts, it seems, denied them the right of petition, because their petition did not support his own views, and practically advised the petitioners, by letter, not only that he would not file their petition with this House, but that they were foolish for signing it, practically telling them that they were not wise, because they did not understand that their interests could only be subserved by a policy which was calculated to take care of the rich and let the rich take care of the poor; the policy pursued by the Republican party down to the time of its final overthrow. His letter, which was read here yesterday by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON], not only denies a sacred right of citizenship, but is a gross and gratuitous insult to every labor organization in this country.

I have been requested by those constituents of Mr. WALKER to present to the House the resolutions which he refused to have filed on their behalf. I ask that they be read by the Clerk. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must remind visitors in the galleries that they must keep order; they are not permitted to participate in demonstrations of applause. The Clerk will read the paper sent to the desk by the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE].

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, is a parliamentary inquiry in order at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. The other day when I desired to introduce a memorial from my constituents, and asked the Clerk to read it, the Chair held that I must read it myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is utterly mistaken as to the ruling of the Chair. The Chair made no such ruling.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I was forced to read that memorial as part of my speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman certainly must have misunderstood the Chair.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I only wanted to suggest that "what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is certainly right in assuming that all members should be treated by the Chair with equal fairness. But the Chair has not at any time held that the Clerk could not be allowed to read a paper which a member desired to have read in the course of his remarks.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Then I may have misapprehended the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is altogether mistaken. The Clerk will read the paper sent to the desk by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolutions from the Central Labor Union of Worcester, Mass.

Whereas the Ways and Means Committee of the Fifty-third United States Congress have recommended for passage, by said Congress, the bill known as the Wilson bill; and

Whereas the said Wilson bill proposes to lift, in part at least, the burden of an oppressive and iniquitous indirect tax from the shoulders of the laboring masses of America: Therefore

Be it resolved, That we, the Central Labor Union, of Worcester, Mass., representing twenty-four labor organizations in Worcester and vicinity, tender our profound thanks to the members of the Congressional Ways and Means Committee for their manly and patriotic stand in the face of the clamors of interested monopolies, and in defense of the rights of the people; and

Resolved, That we heartily indorse the Wilson bill, although only a modicum of the relief demanded, as comprising as much of a concession to the wishes of the people as is available under existing circumstances; and

Resolved, That we recommend that the deficiency that it is claimed that the bill fails to provide for be made good by the enactment, by Congress, of a law providing for a special tax upon the monopolies of the natural resources of the country; and

Resolved, That these preambles and resolutions be given to the press of this city for publication, and that copies of the same be sent to our Senators and Representatives and the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee in Congress.

MICHAEL O'DEA, President.
DONALD SMITH, Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I would be very glad if my time could be extended for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for ten minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WALKER. I ask that I be allowed the same time in reply.

Mr. MAGUIRE. You have my permission.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. WALKER. I object, unless I can have five minutes.

Mr. MAGUIRE. The gentleman has my permission.

Mr. BURROWS. There will be no trouble about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again submit the request. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for ten minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, that petition the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] refused even to file in this House. I regret that the necessity for vindicating the right of petition here should arise in the case of a Representative from Massachusetts, my native State—a State famous for its constant defense of the principles of individual liberty and citizen sovereignty, and one of whose former Representatives on this floor presented the grandest vindication of the sacred right of petition that has ever been made in any legislative body in the world. It shows how the public spirit of Massachusetts, in some quarters, as it seems to be represented here, has degenerated since the time of John Quincy Adams. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

WHY WOOL SHOULD BE FREE.

Now, Mr. Chairman, gentlemen from the Pacific coast, speaking from the Republican standpoint, assuming to represent the wool interests of Washington, Oregon, and California, have denounced the proposition to put wool on the free list, and have urged on behalf of the wool-growers that the McKinley tariff on raw wool be retained. The greatest markets that the raw wool of the Pacific States ever had was furnished by the great San Francisco woolen mills, which between the years 1886 and 1890 were absolutely closed by the tariff on raw wool. The market for our Western wool was practically closed when the woolen manufacturers of San Francisco were obliged to close their factories and turn them into warehouses, because a heavy tariff barrier prevented them from securing the necessary long staple wool to mix in manufacture with the short staple domestic wool.

Those great factories will never resume operation again until freedom of trade shall be established in raw wool and bituminous coal.

If the domestic producers of copper should insist on a prohibitory duty on zinc, which is required to mix with their product in the manufacture of brass, they would be guilty of manifest folly, but they would not be more unwise than the growers of short staple wool when they insist upon a prohibtory tariff on the kinds of wool without the importation of which there can be practically no domestic market for their own. They burden the manufacturing industries by compelling them to pay a heavy tariff on the foreign wool required to mix with theirs, thus diminishing production in that line, and closing their best market against themselves.

We are told that it is impossible to raise wool in this country in competition with the wool-growers of Australia; and from every wool-growing State in this Union, it seems, a petition or a letter to that effect has been sent to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. In everyone of those petitions and letters, so far as I have seen, there has been a uniformity of statement, untrue in fact, but indicating that they all emanated from the same source, from the same pen, and were merely distributed for signature throughout the wool-growing States.

But all or nearly all of these petitions and letters declare that it is impossible to compete with the wool-growers of the Australian colonies, because the rent of the Australian sheep pastures is less than the tax upon the American sheep-grazing lands, and because the wages paid to the American sheep-herders and other laborers connected with the production of wool are so much greater in this country than in the Australian colonies.

Now, sir, it happens, as shown by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], that the wages paid in certain sections of the United States to laborers engaged in the sheep industry are far lower than the wages paid to the laborers engaged in the same industry in the colony of New Zealand. He has shown that the wages paid shepherds in New Zealand are greater than the wages of superintendents of sheep ranches in Texas.

The difference between the rental value of sheep land in this country and in Australia is probably true. Whatever advantages have resulted from the protective tariff, as it bears upon the sheep-raising or wool-raising industry in this country, has gone into the sheep-grazing lands, to enrich the mere owners of the lands, and not to the men conducting the industries. Where the sheep-raiser owns the grazing land as well as the sheep, he gets benefit, of course; but he gets it as landowner, not as a sheep-raiser. Thus it has ever been; the owners of the monopoly element of production control production and appropriate all benefits flowing from protective tariffs.

The enormous value, Mr. Chairman, that has attached to the mere monopoly control of American lands under the protective system represents the vortex into which the benefits of protection have been pouring during the past thirty years. While industry has been prostrated and commerce destroyed, and while both have been sinking under an ever-increasing burden of debt—now aggregating twenty billions—the monopoly value of the natural sources of production in this country has increased until it is more than equal to the value of all the wealth of the country. By wealth, I mean the stored-up products of labor. Land is not wealth. It is the natural source from which wealth is produced. The market value of land represents, in capitalized form, the tribute that landowners are enabled by their monopoly to wring from labor without giving any equivalent.

PETITIONS AND PROTESTS.

Mr. LOUD. Will my colleague yield for a moment?

Mr. MAGUIRE. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOUD. My colleague has gone to Worcester, in Massachusetts, to get a petition to present to this House. I would like him to say in all fairness what petition he has received from his own constituents relating to the woolen industry.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I have received some protests against the passage of the Wilson bill from gentlemen who, being protectionists and knowing my sentiments in favor of freedom of trade, presumably voted against me at the last election, and I presented them to this House. I present petitions coming from my district, from men of all political opinions, because I recognize the great right of petition as well when the petitions come from the minority as when they come from the majority. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LOUD. I would like to ask if one of the names signed here, that of Barclay Henley, is the name of a Republican——

Mr. MAGUIRE. I will state to my colleague that Mr. Barclay Henley, an excellent gentleman, whom I know and esteem, is largely interested personally in sheep-raising.

If he has signed a petition asking for a protective tariff on wool he has to that extent placed himself on the Republican side of the protective line.

If he has petitioned for a protective tariff on raw wool it was quite appropriate that he should have applied to the protectionists in this House to support that petition.

Mr. Henley has not addressed me on the subject. He has long known my position on this question, as have all of my constituents, and that may account for his having communicated with my Republican colleagues, and not with me. If he had sent me a petition or protest against the Wilson bill, addressed to this House, I would certainly have presented it.

Mr. LOUD. Have you received a petition from wool-growers——

Mr. MAGUIRE. My time is so short that I must decline to answer any other questions. I say, that I have received no petition from Mr. Henley.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that few petitions have come here in favor of the passage of the Wilson bill, and that many protests against its passage have been filed. Why should our constituents petition us to pass the Wilson bill? Why should they doubt that we will pass it? They elected us upon a solemn promise to pass such a measure. Why should they now insult us by sending petitions implying doubts of our fidelity to the promise on which we were elected? Our solemn pledge to that effect was made in the acceptance of the national platform, and it was repeated over and over again during the campaign. We are here to execute that promise; the people expect us to do it without further urging or petitioning.

The Republicans, on the contrary, not satisfied with the verdict rendered by the people who elected us and charged us with the duty of repealing the McKinley bill, persist in attempting to intimidate Democratic Representatives by clamor through their subsidized newspapers, through meetings called to represent their special interests, and by voluminous petitions and protests containing collectively fewer names than there are Republican voters in three Congressional districts out of the three hundred and fifty-six.

They are attempting to frighten us by exciting personal fears concerning the safety of our positions in the next campaign, and hope thereby to induce us to violate our promises and trample on our principles, by bowing down and worshiping the special interests which they represent.

We have promised, so far as possible, to wipe out the system of special privileges maintained by the Republican party, and establish in its stead "equal rights to all, with special privileges to none." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The people expect us, in this hour of conflict, not to hunt for places of personal safety, but to follow our standard to the end, regardless of personal consequences. Gentlemen say that the verdict of 1892 was reversed in 1893. I say there is absolutely no evidence of it; no Democratic vacancy in this House has been filled by the election of a Republican member of Congress. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.] The elections in which the Democrats were defeated in 1893 were contested on local issues. There was not an issue presented in the campaign of 1893 concerning the action of this Congress, or the principles which should control its legislation, except where members of Congress were to be elected to fill vacancies; and wherever they were to be so elected, the same verdict was rendered in 1893 that was rendered in 1892.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WALKER and Mr. WILSON of Ohio addressed the Chair.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio was recognized.

Mr. WALKER. I think I am entitled to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILSON] is recognized.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I should be very happy to indulge the gentleman from Massachusetts——

Mr. WALKER. Go ahead.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. But I know it is difficult to get an opportunity to speak during this discussion on this amendment.

I have listened with a good deal of interest to the gentlemen who represent the great sheep-growing interests of Texas and California. Yesterday afternoon the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] spoke openly in favor of free trade in wool. To-day the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE] speaks for his constituents in favor of free wool.

The State of Texas raises more sheep than any other State in the Union. The State of Ohio raises the next largest number. The State of California stands third. The great sheep-raising States ought to be together on the great questions affecting the interests of the people of these States. While I admit that the State of Texas has more sheep than the State of Ohio, I believe it was conceded by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] that the value of the sheep in Ohio exceeds that of the sheep in Texas.

Now, I can account for that only in one way, and that is because, as the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] and the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] would say, in Ohio the sheep have a higher degree of civilization than they have in the State of Texas. [Laughter on the Republican side.] They are of a better quality, and therefore are more valuable.

I am of the opinion, however, that the sheep in Texas are gradually approaching the standard of Ohio, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia, and that it will only be a little while before Texas will be clamoring for protection to the wool industries of that great State.

I am glad that Texas has progressed in civilization. She is represented on this floor by a most distinguished and able delegation, by men who stand in the front line of statesmen in this House, and I am surprised that they are willing that that State, whose greatest industry is that of sheep-raising, should go back to where it was a few years ago. I can remember when I was a boy, when people talked of Texas as if it was a bad State; and when a wicked man in our section departed, it was always a question whether he had gone to Hell or gone to Texas. [Laughter.] But Texas has come up, and to-day, if she would stand with Ohio and California and the new States, the sheep industry of this country would develop until the people of this country would supply all the wool that is needed for American manufacturers and for American consumption.

It has been suggested here that it has not been shown that protection helped the wool industry. I say it has been shown. Since the passage of the McKinley bill the sheep industry has grown, and to-day there are more than 4,000,000 more sheep than there were in 1890, when the McKinley law was passed. We have supplied within 129,000,000 pounds the wool that is necessary for this country; and if you will give protection to American industries, the vast plains of Texas and the territory of the West will be dotted with flocks of sheep, and on every farm in the older States there will be small flocks; and I say to you when you strike down that industry in Ohio you have stricken down one of the greatest industries we have.

All through the States the farmers have small flocks of sheep. Many farms which would never produce enough to make farming profitable were it not for the flocks of sheep are made profitable by the little flocks that earn the surplus of revenue for those farms. Take them away from the farms of Ohio and you destroy the agricultural industries and all the industries lying round about the farming interests. I therefore appeal to the majority of this House to stop, and for the sake of the people of this country and for the sake of the people who own 4,000,000 sheep in Ohio not to destroy that industry.

The time of Mr. WILSON of Ohio having expired, by unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. CALDWELL, it was extended five minutes.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that it would be for the interest not only of the sheep-growers of this country, but for the interest of the entire people of this country if there is protection afforded the sheep-raisers of this country against the lower wool of other countries. I believe it would build up the manufactures in this country until we would here have the labor which is now employed in the old countries; that here we would have consumers for the agricultural products of this country, and we already have more than enough consumers for the wool product.

Mr. CRAIN. Will the gentleman pardon an interruption?

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. CRAIN. If the high protective tariff would have such a beneficial effect upon wool manufacturers of this country, how does the gentleman account for the alleged decadence of the wool manufacturing industry? How does the gentleman account for the immense depreciation of the wool manufacturing industry since the passage of the act of 1867, and the passage of the act of 1890, both high protective acts?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The wool manufacturing industry has not decayed.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I do not admit that that is true. I understand that the woolen industries of this country, the manufacturing and the growing, have both increased. They are not now at the pinnacle, it is true. There was a time, however, a few years ago, when the products of the wool of this country were over 300,000,000 pounds, and it is now 285,000,000 pounds.

Mr. CRAIN. And has fallen off that way under protection.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Protection has been so uncertain. In 1883 there was a reduction in the tariff on wool of 2 cents a pound. The result of it was to intimidate and scare the wool-growers and the farmers of the country; and the Democratic party in Ohio, in their platform of that year, declared that the Republican party had destroyed the woolen industries of the United States, and that they ought to be driven out of power.

Mr. CRAIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him another question?

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. CRAIN. Why is it that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] offers an amendment substituting the tariff rate of the McKinley act for the wool schedule of this bill?

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. There is a higher protection afforded in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan than the rate proposed in the bill offered by the gentleman from West Virginia. I do not believe that the proposition to impose about one-half of the present duties on wool is sufficient to protect American wool-growers, or that it is a good revenue measure. The simple fact of lowering the duties below the protective point is the same thing as if it were put on the free list so far as the promotion of that industry in this country is concerned.

Mr. CRAIN. Does not the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] propose a protective rate, and is it not identical with the rate now in force under the McKinley act; and is it not claimed by your side that that is protection?

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. We do claim that that is protection; and if the Democratic party had not won the election of 1892 the sheep and woolen industry of this country would have been more prosperous than ever before in the history of this country. [Applause on the Republican side.] It is simply because of the impending changes in the tariff, and the threats of the Democratic party against the woolen interests that is closing the woolen manufactories all over the United States.

That is the trouble. It is the threat to destroy the woolen industries. I admit that the gentlemen from the South are compelled, perhaps, by their associations to go along with the majority here in favor of free trade. It is the misfortune of the State of Texas that she has no representatives of that great party which favors protection in the United States. It is the misfortune of the South that they have few Representatives upon this floor who can speak for the interests of the industries of that portion of the country which need protection.

Mr. CRAIN. I will state to the gentleman that on yesterday they had a valuable aid in the person of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] the floating member from Texas.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I did not catch the gentleman's remark.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I will only consume a few moments. I want to reply to the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], in which he stated that the effect of free trade in England had been to make 800,000 paupers in England, including with that, of course, the able-bodied and those who were not able-bodied. I read now, not from a work on political economy, but from a statistical work entitled Fiscal Legislation of England, by John Noble. Speaking of the time from 1836 to 1842, while the protective system prevailed, he said:

> The protective system had been long slowly undermining our prosperity, and the evils it had caused could not be removed by mere reductions of duty. The prospects of the country continued most gloomy; in two years there had been a falling off of nearly one-quarter in the whole amount of the excise revenue—a sure test of the condition of the working classes. The number of able-bodied paupers had increased from below 200,000 in 1836 to 407,570 in 1842, notwithstanding extensive emigration, the number of persons leaving our shores having increased from 44,478 in 1835 to 118,592 in 1841, and 128,344 in 1842. In the fifteen principal agricultural districts of England and Wales the increase in the poor rates between 1836 and 1842 was 21 per cent, and in the twelve manufacturing counties 30½ per cent. The total commitments for crime, which were 20,984 in 1836, were 31,309 in 1842; and the number of bankruptcies increased from 800 in 1838 to 1,500 in 1842. The national interests were accurately described in Parliament as being "in a state of the most complete prostration."

Now, I call attention to this point. Remember that in 1824 the population of England was about 17,000,000, and that it is 35,000,000 now. The number of able-bodied paupers had increased from below 200,000 in 1836 to 407,570 in 1842; doubling in six years under the effect of the highest protective tariff that ever cursed that country.

Now, I wish to reply to the general remarks, almost all of them, on the other side. They tell us that in the United States our great body politic is undergoing a wrenching and writhing in such a condition as the body politic has never known in the history of our country. Let us examine the causes. I will refer those gentlemen to a book, and recommend it to them to look over very carefully.

It is probably a little new, and some will object to its doctrines; but I find the four evangelists, all alike, give a description of a certain man who was beset by a legion of devils. When our Saviour approached the man to cast the legion out, you will remember that the devils asked to be let alone. Our Saviour then demanded that they leave, and before they left the man's body they threw him down. They wrenched him, they racked him, and they knotted and contracted his muscles, and he went through the most excruciating agony, and when eventually the legion of devils did go out of the man's body into the swine, and from there to the sea, that man arose and praised God, being a sound and able-bodied man.

Mr. HENDRIX. Was there ever any sympathy with the man who lost the pork? [Laughter.]

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I was going to make the application in a moment. I desire to say in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that after thirty years, during which our body politic has been possessed by a demon of the same kind and character, the accursed policy of Republicanism, very soon the Republican devils will go out of the man into the swine, and the swine will go into the sea and the man will rise blessing God. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding to discuss the pending amendment I desire to give a little hint to gentlemen upon the other side that they are going to be deceived as to the number of votes that they will get here in favor of placing wool upon the free list. I know more, gentlemen, of the Democrats of Ohio than you do. You think you are going to get the votes of all the Ohio Democrats here, but, judging from their history, you are mistaken. Democracy in Ohio is changeless evermore. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. How is it about Republicanism?

Mr. NORTHWAY. That changes occasionally, but Democracy never. Democrats never change, so I warn you that if they stand by their time-honored doctrines you will have 21 solid votes from Ohio against free wool. I was educated in the doctrine of protection to wool by the Democrats of Ohio, and for years we have been fighting the battle side by side. It has been a battle fast and furious, but whenever we have got into the heat of the contest the Democrats have generally got ahead of me in their ideas in favor of protection upon wool. [Laughter.] I can remember that when the Republican Congress in 1883 reduced the tariff on wool about 18 per cent every Democrat in Ohio rose up in wrath, and if ever there was any one man upon whom curses were poured out, not loud but deep, that man was Senator JOHN SHERMAN, whom some of our Ohio Democratic friends have been quoting here this morning. [Laughter.]

I can remember that the Ohio Democrats not only condemned Mr. SHERMAN, but damned him, because he had voted to reduce the duty on wool about 18 per cent. I can remember when, in the Democratic Legislature, a joint resolution was introduced demanding of our Senators and Representatives in Congress that they vote to restore the tariff of 1867 on wool, and I can remember that every mother's son of the Democrats in both houses of the Legislature voted in favor of that joint resolution; and I can remember, too, when the gentleman who preceded my friend from the Columbus district came to this Congress and introduced a bill to restore the old tariff on wool.

Mr. CRAIN. Did not JOHN SHERMAN vote for the reduction of the tariff of 1846 in the House of Representatives in 1857?

Mr. NORTHWAY. Oh, that is too far back. [Laughter.] I can remember, Mr. Chairman, when another Democrat, representing the district now represented by the free trader, Mr. HARTER, the rock-ribbed gentleman, Judge Geddes—peace to his ashes—came here and made haste to propose to restore the tariff on wool. I can remember another thing. When the Democratic convention of 1883 met, the first resolution they adopted was one condemning the reduction of the tariff on wool and demanding that the tariff of 1867 should be restored; and I remember that they came very near tearing down the house in which their convention was held with their thunders of applause when that resolution was adopted. [Laughter.]

Another thing, Mr. Chairman; the Democratic executive committee got out a circular, of which I have a copy in my hand, and I want to read you the title of it: "The reduction on wool. Republican tariff-tinkering costing the Ohio wool-growers $6,000,000."

Democrats never lie, you know; so that must be true. "Fleecing the flockmasters: How it was done and who did it."

That was the front page of their circular.

They issued their Democratic circular, and I want to read a little of it to show you that the Democrats in Ohio and the Republicans, while upon many things are "separate as drops," upon the wool question are "one as the sea." [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. What is the date of that?

Mr. NORTHWAY. Eighteen hundred and eighty-three.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. A long time ago.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I will come down to a later time.

I tell you that Democracy in Ohio never changes. That was Democracy in 1883. It is Democracy now; for you say you never change.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. But they have sent some free traders down here since that time.

Mr. NORTHWAY. But you have never had anything born in the Democratic party since the days of Jackson; you never refer to anything younger in Democracy than Jackson. The first thing you do when you come together in convention is to resolve that Democracy is changeless.

Now, I want to read a little further from this circular to show you that in Ohio we are all united. You may think you are going to get some of those Democratic gentlemen to vote with you; but you will not.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. NORTHWAY. I would like to have my time extended for about ten minutes.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for ten minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Now, as to the number of sheep in Ohio and as to the price of wool there, let me refer to the remarks of my colleague [Mr. HARE] this morning. If I mistake not he told us that the protective policy had reduced the price of wool in the State of Ohio. Now, I would give more for Democratic declarations on this subject than I would for census reports, because the Democrats always tell the truth. Now, this circular gives some information on this point. It goes on to give the figures:

Another fact should be noted. With the growth of the industry competition has wonderfully increased, and at all times has been exceedingly active. But it has never operated to reduce prices—indeed, it has been an equalizer. The following is a statement of the average price of the "wool clip" in the Boston market in 1870, 1875 and 1886:

1870	46 cents
1875	43 cents
1886	46 cents

The price being, it will be observed, the same in 1886 as in 1870—sixteen years before.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. From what is the gentleman reading?

Mr. NORTHWAY. I am reading what is sound doctrine in the State of Ohio.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. From whom does it come?

Mr. NORTHWAY. From the Democratic executive committee of the State of Ohio; it was published by them. They go on to say:

It is by no means a specious argument to assert that the influence of the reduction—

That is, the reduction of the tariff—

upon the value of the sheep and their product will be felt upon the value of the land. Every farmer knows that a flock of sheep is one of the best of fertilizers. It is a remarkable fact that sheep can subsist upon very poor land.

They proceed further:

The Democratic party—

Now mark—

as the facts show, has been steadily and earnestly opposed to the perpetration of this great wrong against the people.

That is, the reduction of 18 per cent on the tariff of 1867.

Their almost unanimous vote indicates that, as a political party, they are heartily in sympathy with the wool-producers' cause.

When did they change in the State of Ohio? Now comes their final appeal, which would draw tears from the eyes of the most hard-hearted man. It is a promise, a wonderful promise. They say:

Farmers of Ohio, can you trust the party that has, in our National Legislature, outraged and robbed you at the bidding of the capitalists of New England? Is there any hope for you from such a party, who have thus deliberately sacrificed your dearest and best interest? The party that created this great wrong can not be trusted to give you relief. The Democrats in Congress were your friends.

[Laughter.]

Great Scott! think of it.

They sought by every means in their power to prevent this wrong from being inflicted on you. Trust the Democratic party in this matter; it has promised to and will give you relief.

And the Wilson bill is the fulfillment of the promise.

With that circular the Democratic stump orators went before the people of the State of Ohio, and the Democrats beat the Republicans because they had voted to reduce the tariff on wool. They elected Judge Hoadley, of Cincinnati, as governor, and they elected a Democratic Legislature upon that question. When have you changed in the State of Ohio? Do you not see that I can pledge my friend over there [Mr. HOUK of Ohio] and others to stand by us on this question?

Mr. HOUK of Ohio. You can not pledge me.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I am sorry for that. As I understand it, Democracy in Ohio never changes. But I am learning something. When I came down here I supposed that we should stand shoulder to shoulder in favor of an industry which you say the Republicans undertook to injure in 1883; and lo and behold! you want to put the products of that industry on the free list.

Mr. SPRINGER. Did you understand before the election that we were to do it?

Mr. NORTHWAY. I understand that you are ready to do anything to destroy that industry if you can. And I want to tell you another thing. The promise that the Democrats of Ohio gave to the farmers in 1883 may be ignored now; but it will be fulfilled to the letter by the voters of this country, as you will learn a year from now.

Mr. ENLOE. I would like to ask the gentleman what promises they made in 1892?

Mr. NORTHWAY. Well, whatever they were they are not worth anything. [Laughter.] They never change in Ohio. They are always the same, as far as promises are concerned. If they made any different promises it makes no difference. How can you trust a party, Mr. Chairman, that is everlastingly changing? Look at what they did in 1884, and in 1888, when they resolved in favor of a tariff equal to the difference between the cost of the foreign and the American labor. In both their national platforms of those years this same policy was set forth. In 1884 they said that the custom-house duties have ever been, as they must continue to be, the chief source of revenue for the country, and now you introduce a bill that proposes to cut down the revenue arising from customs to the extent of a hundred millions of dollars. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Can the gentleman explain the difference between what he claims now was the Democratic policy in 1888 and that enunciated in 1892?

Mr. NORTHWAY. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman might just as well ask me to explain any other mystery as to explain the mystery of Democracy. [Laughter.] It can not be explained. Read your own platform. There is no single section of it that you can explain.

They wire in and wire out,
Leaving a person still in doubt
Whether the snake that makes the track
Is going south or coming back.

[Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan, because I am backed up by the Democratic voters of Ohio. The tariff is about what it was in 1867, and all the Democrats in Ohio voted in favor of it in 1883. You ought not to find fault with me if I vote good Democratic doctrine here to-day. I can go home and be consistent when you can not. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HUNTER. What about 1892?

Mr. NORTHWAY. I ask the gentleman what about 1893? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] And I will tell you another thing. Let me warn you—

Dinna ye hear the slogan?

Wait until next year. Why do not you ask the Democratic party of Ohio what about 1893, instead of 1892? I have heard that everything under heaven is attributed to the Democratic victory of 1892; scarcely anything but what was involved in that contest. If you can name anything from orthodoxy down to politics I would like to know it. [Laughter.]

Mr. PICKLER. How about the Hawaiian question?

Mr. NORTHWAY. No; I believe you had nothing to do with the foreign policy in your platform.

Mr. COGSWELL. They have a good deal to do with it now. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORTHWAY. Yes; you are in favor of queens now.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan for another reason—because it is common sense. This will be doing just what we ought to do. I believe in protecting all the industries of this country if we can. The gentleman from Kansas says, "Suppose that of ten men engaged in some industry one is protected to the injury of the other nine. Does the fact that one is protected benefit the other nine?" That is what we want to do in this case. We want a nation so great that we can raise all the shoemakers, blacksmiths, carpenters, wool manufacturers, and cotton manufacturers, and all other kinds of manufacturers who can prosper in their respective callings. We want a nation containing woolen manufacturers to produce if need be all the woolen goods that we use in this country. Is there any objection to having such a nation? The gentlemen over here want us to send abroad to buy everything. I tell you one thing, a nation of buyers is a nation of paupers.

Gentlemen over here talk about England. Why do they not refer to Ireland? In 1800 England forced Ireland into union with England against the protests of Grattan, the greatest of Irish leaders, through the treachery of Pitt. To bring about such a result the Irish people were to return certain tariff duties upon foreign competing products until 1827, when the list of such duties was wiped out. Ireland had a population of eight millions of people in 1800, and between that date and 1848 we are told that near two millions of her brave people had died from poverty and starvation, while another two millions had found a home on other shores, most of them in America. And to-day, as a free-trade country, Ireland is poverty-stricken, while England is growing rich upon that poverty. Why do not our Democratic friends allude to Ireland when they wish to illustrate the beauties of free trade?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I would not intrude in this debate again but for the fact that what I had to say on the 9th of this month has furnished occasion for a great deal of comment upon the opposite side of this Chamber, and I have been so misrepresented that I rise to correct certain declarations which have been made as to what I said.

I deny the correctness of the interpretations given of what I said by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] or my more immediate colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who this morning addressed you. I do not alter, nor qualify, nor retract one word of what I then said. It was a personal declaration of what I believed to be a true statement of affairs. It was not a party declaration, and I ask no man to share with me responsibility for what I believe to be the truth.

Mr. Chairman, I referred to a condition of affairs very grave and menacing in the Republic, not to the integrity of the Republic, but to the present comfort and well-being of many of its citizens. I believed, as I believe now, that the condition of affairs depicted was due very largely to the existence of a protective system. The course of reasoning by which I had reached that conclusion was simply upon the facts that had come within my knowledge. I will give a few of the facts, if the House will bear with me while I do so.

Within my recollection, half a century of time, I have seen the growth and development, if not the very foundation, of the great manufacturing systems of the Northeastern and the Northern States; and I know that in the early part of that growth every loom and spindle was occupied by a man of the country, and that the recruits who came to aid the workers of those days came slowly and in the pursuit of happiness, and because they believed that America was a country of liberty and of opportunity for mankind. There was no overcrowding, there were no strikes, there were no great labor disturbances, but as fast as one occupation filled itself full it gently and easily overflowed its surplus into others, and in that way the whole, under the American system of congenerated industries, was rising to a magnificence which was challenging the regard of the world, and above all furnishing comfort to the American people.

I know that a system of protective laws was created, and that immediately enormous taxation began to spread itself out over the country, and great fortunes began to be accumulated by the people who were the immediate beneficiaries of this system of protection. I know that the next step in that line, and a natural consequence, was that the laborers who were engaged under these manufacturers, and who felt that they were not receiving a full and adequate share of the profits that were being made by these manufacturing establishments, combining together, made trades unions and assemblies, which spread through all the industries of the country, in all the great centers. I know that after that they made their demands, their strikes began, their labor combinations were effective, and then came the shut-outs and then the great disturbances which have shaken down whole industries.

I know that after that, in order to meet and overcome these combinations, the managers of these protected industries shipped into this country great numbers of foreign workingmen, men who were brought here virtually under contract, at least substantially, with the promise that they would be given wages superior to what they were getting in other lands.

[The time of Mr. BLACK of Illinois having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended ten minutes.]

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I know furthermore that the consequence of that was that in those great centers in the Northeast, where American manufactures had their birth and from which they have spread throughout the length and breadth of this land seeking new fields of occupation, the men who were found at the loom and the anvil thirty, twenty-five, and twenty years ago have been exiled and driven away.

A MEMBER. Dead?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Not dead, but exiled from the land where they had their birth and their work, and I know that in their places to-day there are thousands and tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands who have come over under the circumstances and by the force of this system which I have described, so that to-day, in many of the great factories in New England, to my knowledge and the knowledge of many other gentlemen on this floor, there are great numbers of men just freshly arrived from over our borders, who have taken the places of those who formerly worked there, and taken those places at greatly reduced wages, men who have been brought there for the purpose of meeting the combinations of American workingmen and destroying them. Would you know what has become of the workingmen who have been shipped in to take the places of the former laborers? Some are at work at miserable wages, and many, very many, are to-day among the million who ask for bread and are fed by charity.

Now, then, I have never said, and I never will say, that I think the wages of the American citizen should be broken down. What I said was that I believed that it was the protective system which gave the power into the hands of men so to control industry as to compel foreign immigration to come in for the purpose of breaking labor down, and after breaking it down by bringing immigration in, and the instant they got to the point where they succeeded in breaking down the workers' unions for protecting wages of American labor, they broke down the wages. I said that that was a system that I would remedy by law, if I could, with my vote; and if that is wrong, if that is impolitic, if it is un-American, I will stand by it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The gentleman said that we did not have any labor unions here, or any strikes, as I understood him, until we had this protective tariff. I would like to ask the gentleman at what date he fixes the period when labor organizations were first formed in this country?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I did not make that statement in the way in which you have made it.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Dropping the remark I made, when did you say that labor organizations first commenced in this country?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I do not know the date at which the first labor organization was formed in this country; but I know that it has been in recent years.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Has it been since 1870?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. No, sir; it has not. It was some little time earlier than that.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Has it been since 1860?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I would prefer not to be further catechised by my colleague about the birth hour or the day of the first organization of labor. I know very little about the birth of the gentleman, but I know that he is a man of full vigor, that he is a handsome grown man, but when he was born I do not know——

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Thank you.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Neither do I know the precise time when labor first organized, but I know the general time.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Another question, if the gentleman will allow it. Does the gentleman pretend to say that there have been no strikes in this country until recent years?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Relatively, that is true. There were some strikes in Massachusetts a good many years ago in which Ben Butler took a part; but the number of those strikes were very small, and the influence was very much confined compared with later developments in that matter.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Does not the gentleman know, speaking relatively to the population, that fifty years ago there were as many strikes as there are at present.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. No, sir; and I do not think that that is true. I deny it.

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER. I would like to take the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BLACK] to ask his colleague from Illinois whether he makes the distinction between the former day strikes by the laborers, when they put themselves in a position that they could demand higher wages, with the later day strikes, when the laborers put themselves into positions to resist the pressure to force lower wages upon them?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The gentleman is wrong in his premises and wrong in his conclusions.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Then let me resume my argument.

Mr. Chairman, to-day, in this period of high protection, wages are less than was ever paid to American labor.

Mr. Chairman, I am in a great deal better temper than when my colleague [Mr. CANNON] closed his remarks. I am glad of it. I pass by all the bitterness that might have been evoked by his peculiar line of comment. I was not, when addressing this House, making a speech for the hustings, but trying to address myself to the reason of this committee.

I want to say a word before I take my seat in regard to the special subject under discussion, the wool schedule, and to describe things I have seen. I have seen the prairies of Illinois occupied by large flocks of sheep. That was at a time anterior to the golden age in the morning of which the gentleman from Aurora, well named, was born—an Auroral birth, let me say, in all respects. [Laughter and applause.] At that time the prairies of Illinois were for sale at $1.25 per acre, and there were thousands and hundreds of thousands of sheep ranging their surface. As men have come in there, by birth and by immigration, by hundreds of thousands, until 4,000,000 of people occupy the soil of that State, the land has risen to $50 and $100 an acre; during our long winters the sheep have to be folded and shedded and fed on high-priced hay and grain. Constant care has to be bestowed upon them. There is no longer room for profitable sheep-growing, and the consequence is—and what I say of Illinois in this respect is true in large degree of all the States of the Northwest—the consequence is that the number of sheep flocks is small and the number of sheep in each flock is small.

Now, go with me farther West and I will show you another picture. I happened to be in Utah one sunshiny day, down in the valley of the Great Salt Lake, when my eye was attracted by what seemed at a distance a movement of the surface of the earth itself. As it came nearer I saw passing before me a flock of from twenty to twenty-five thousand sheep. I could not estimate their number with accuracy; they are not half so easily counted as men, but they covered the whole ground as they went; and the number of men in attendance upon that great flock was about two, with two collie dogs. They feed on the mountain ranges; they pay scant hire for pasturage and little for shelter. There was where the men of the Northwest had crowded the sheep of Illinois and other Northwestern States to, and that is why the sheep-raising of the Northwest has ceased to be profitable and has been transferred to the West.

It follows, and this is the logic of all the petitions and memorials and applications filed here by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], that if protection is to be extended to wool at all, it is to be extended either to the men in Nevada and Utah and the far West upon a basis that will make their sheep-raising profitable, or else to the men of the States of the Northwest on a basis which will make their flocks profitable. But if you put on a tariff that will enable the farmer of Ohio and of Indiana to raise wool profitably see what gigantic fortunes you will put within the reach of those engaged in sheep-raising in the far West!

And, gentlemen, whether you urge, as Republicans and protectionists, that in the framing of this schedule you would fix your tariff rate for the benefit of the flock masters of Indiana and Illinois, or that you would fix it for the benefit of the men of Utah and Nevada, in either event all the protection you give, all the bounty you give, will be derived from taxation upon the great body of the people of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Do you not know that if it is true, as you urge, that the threat of Democratic ascendency has brought down the price of sheep until sheep sell for less than before, that would be a boon to the poor, who need cheap food and cheap clothes?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, it has been repeatedly stated upon this floor by gentlemen on the other side of the House, with a great deal of assurance and with much gravity, that the high protective tariffs of 1867, of 1883, and of 1890 upon wool had resulted in reducing the price of wool in this country. And with equal assurance and equal gravity it has been stated by gentlemen upon that side that the protective tariff during all these years has had the effect of increasing the price of all fabrics manufactured from that wool.

Mr. Chairman, I will leave the gentlemen upon that side of the House to reconcile these two statements, simply asking them how, if the high duty upon wool has reduced its price, that fact is to be reconciled with their other statement that a high protective tariff upon woolen goods has increased the price of those goods? I say I will leave the gentlemen to extricate themselves from the incongruous and illogical position in which they are placed by their own conflicting statements.

Mr. Chairman, the people of my State are not very largely interested directly in the production of wool. It is an industry, however, that is to be found in every county of the one hundred and one counties that constitute that great State, and, as was well said by my colleague to-day, that industry is one which is largely in the hands of the smaller farmers of the State.

But, sir, the great agricultural people of Illinois are desirous of seeing the farmers of Ohio, of West Virginia, of Texas, of New Mexico, and of the other Western States and Territories flourish. We are not, however, devoid of all selfish interest in that matter, because we well know—the intelligent farmers of Illinois well understand—that if the raising of sheep in this country shall be destroyed and the flocks composing the 44,000,000 sheep now in the United States shall give way to the flocks of South America and Australia, the lands where sheep are now raised will be devoted to the raising of cattle and horses, in which the farmers of my State are largely interested. [Applause.] I say to the gentlemen on the other side that the farmers of my State are intelligent people, and their intelligence has taught them——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MARSH. I would like to have a little more time.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I ask that my colleague's time be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, the intelligent farmers of Illinois have learned that the salvation of the agricultural interests of this country depends upon the diversification of their industries. Hence they favor every form of legislation that will assist in the direction of such diversification. Hence we would so legislate as to stimulate and encourage sheep industry in the country. We would so legislate as to stimulate and encourage the production of barley in this country, so that our people may have an American market for this great cereal, and not be compelled to share that market with the people who live in the country upon our northern border.

The wheat producers of Illinois have sufficient intelligence to know that if they are allowed to have the barley market of this country to the exclusion of the barley-raisers of Canada, thousands and tens of thousands of acres of land now devoted to the cultivation of wheat will be transferred to the cultivation of barley. And in that way, and in various other ways by which agricultural pursuits may be diversified, we hope to see the day in the near future when we shall not be compelled to accept 45 and 50 cents a bushel for our wheat.

Mr. Chairman, there has been a vast amount of sympathy poured out by gentlemen on the other side of this House upon the backs of the "poor, suffering farmer." [Laughter and applause.] I want to say to gentlemen on that side that the farmers of Illinois do not ask for your sympathy. When you have reported the Wilson bill here, claiming before the country that it is a revenue measure and that its purpose is to lighten the weight of taxation and to relieve the people from their present burdens while you place every agricultural product of this country substantially upon the free list, and levy a duty of 45 or 50 per cent upon the wearing apparel of the people, there is intelligence enough among the farmers of this country to know that you are a set of infernal frauds. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] I say that upon my own personal responsibility—that this placing of the farmer's products substantially upon the free list, while making him pay 50 or 55 per cent on his coat, is a fraud.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MARSH. I should like to have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the request as soon as order is restored in the committee.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment be closed at half past 3 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendment be closed at half past 3 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. BURROWS. Do I understand the proposition is that debate on this amendment be closed in fifteen minutes. [Cries of "Yes," "Yes."] May I inquire of the Chair how many names he has on his list of gentlemen desiring yet to speak?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has about eight on one side and four on the other.

Mr. BURROWS. I think that the time proposed by the gentleman from West Virginia for closing this debate is too limited. I am perfectly willing that we shall reach a vote on this question to-day; but I ask the gentleman to allow the debate to run a little longer. There are several gentlemen on this side who desire to be heard.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. The debate threatens to run the entire day, and there are other questions we would like to reach.

Mr. BURROWS. There are several gentlemen on this side who desire to be heard on this question; and it is a very important one, as the gentleman from West Virginia understands.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I appreciate its importance.

Mr. BURROWS. We will coöperate with the gentleman in procuring a vote upon the question to-day. I suggest that the vote be taken at 5 o'clock.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Say 4 o'clock. That will let in all the gentlemen whose names are down.

Mr. BURROWS. That will not accommodate all of those on this side who desire to speak.

Mr. McRAE. If the gentleman from Michigan objects to the agreement proposed by the gentleman in charge of this bill I make the point of order that further debate is not in order——

The CHAIRMAN. There are only three gentlemen on the minority side who have not spoken and who have asked for time.

Mr. BURROWS. Is the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] on the list?

The CHAIRMAN. He has not asked for time.

Mr. BURROWS. He desires to be heard for ten or fifteen minutes. I think that if 5 o'clock be named everybody can be accommodated.

Mr. McRAE. I object to that. We have already had two days' debate on this amendment. If the gentleman from Michigan objects to the proposition of the gentleman from West Virginia, I make the point of order that further debate on the amendment is not in order—debate upon this amendment has been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate according to the rule has been exhausted.

Mr. McRAE. There are other amendments upon which the Committee of the Whole desire and should have an opportunity to vote. Two days on a single amendment, in debating which gentlemen have not confined themselves to the amendment, can not be regarded as unreasonable. I want to give notice that I will insist upon confining the debate to the proposition under consideration and the enforcement of the rules of debate from now on.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. The gentleman from Michigan and myself can probably agree on an hour when the debate shall close and the vote be taken. Suppose we take one hour.

Mr. BURROWS. I propose half past 4.

Mr. McMILLIN. One hour is certainly time enough, considering the time that has been already taken on the debate.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I hope we can agree to close at 4:30. I suggest to the gentleman from West Virginia that we make it 4:30.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Well, we are only a quarter of an hour apart.

Mr. BURROWS. And that will give ample time for a vote to-night.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Very well, let us agree to take the vote at 4:30.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the request. Is there objection to closing the debate on the pending amendments at half past 4 o'clock?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless there be objection the Chair will divide the time equally between the two sides, and if there be no objection the Chair will recognize the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] to control one-half of the time, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] to control the other half.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair will have to control the time himself.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Will the Chair indulge me a moment? What was the order made?

The CHAIRMAN. To close the debate on the pending amendment at 4:30 o'clock this afternoon, the remaining time to be equally divided between the two sides.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. It was also understood though, Mr. Chairman, that the proposition contemplated that a vote should then be taken, because while the debate may close on this amendment other amendments may be offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands, and that was the understanding of the committee as the Chair believes, that the debate should close and a vote be taken at that hour.

Mr. SIMPSON. Then I withdraw the objection I made a few moments ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, if there be no objection the Chair will recognize the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] to control the time on the two sides.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The understanding is that the debate closes on the pending amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. That has been already ordered. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] asks an extension of time for five minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Michigan can control the time now under the order of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. BURROWS. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH].

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, in the three minutes to which by the indulgence of the House I am entitled, I desire to say that this bill is entitled "A bill to raise revenue," and yet confessedly it creates a deficiency in the neighborhood of $75,000,000. To judge by the speeches that have been made by gentlemen on the other side of this House, it is a revenue bill drawn upon free-trade lines, and yet dotted all along its lines with protective features.

The Democratic speakers in my district everywhere said in the campaign that if they carried the country they would give the people free wool hats and put the tax on silk hats. Yet this bill that you are trying to ram through this Congress, and force upon the people of this country, puts a duty of 35 per cent upon the poor man's hat and I have been unable to find where you left any duty upon the plug hat. Seventy cents of every $2 that the poor man's hat—the farmer's hat—costs is a tax.

Mr. SIMPSON. But they put the ram on the free list. [Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]
